However, there was some for renewed anxiety about the fleet of iron- fore, Charleston. Tennessee we hear that the Confederates are the Western part of the State, and that the admit the repulse at Beans Station. That is, hit "a loss of 200 men." The loss of the ates was, it is said, 800 killed and wounded, probable that the vanquished suffered rather an the victors. It is also allowed that the ates captured some wagons and several hundred , 225 having arrived at Bristol, Tennessee, on ultimo. There is a cool audacity about admitting f 200 men" that is almost admirable.

Federal General Averill reports that he made a n Salem, on the Virginia and Tennessee rail- l tore up fifteen miles of the track, destroyed mile of the telegraph, burnt breadstuffs and the value of $200,000, and captured eighty and 150 horses. He adds that his retreat was by the Confederate cavalry, but that he cut their lines with a loss of 100 officers and men. the rosecate account, and even it tells of a dearly triumph. But the report of the Confederate Jones gives another aspect of the affair. Army of the Potomac is about to move nearer gton, as the Confederates are troublesome.

The Richmond papers of the 11th December contain a report of a meeting of the members of the Tobacco Exchange, which was held at the Shockoe Warehouse on the 8th of that month, Mr. James K. Cookie, the president of the association, in the chair, to discuss the removal of the tobacco belonging to the French régie. Strong disapprobation was expressed with the supposed consent of the Confederate Government to this removal, and the meeting seemed to be of opinion that acquiescence in a partial suspension of the blockade at the gracious pleasure of the enemy was inconsistent with the dignity of an independent Government. Doubts were also entertained whether the greater part of the tobacco to be delivered had been, as alleged, purchased or contracted for prior to March 4th, 1861, and a committee was appointed to investigate this question.

With all due deference to those gentlemen, who, doubtless, understood their own business, it does appear to us that the favours of the Washington Government are in this case granted, not to the Confederates, but to the French Government, in preference to and to the prejudice of other neutrals injured by the blockade, and that it is for these to complain of partiality, and not for the Confederates, who are not in any way injured. Further, as it is the Federal and not the Confederate Government which proclaims the blockade, we do not see on what grounds the latter should interpose obstacles to the shipment, or why it should prevent the enemy from vitiating, and practically rendering void in the eyes of other neutral nations, his own blockade. Finally, if the tobacco is not already paid for, it will place to Confederate account in Europe some £650,000, and thus add that much to the financial resources of the Confederacy.

No man with the heart of an Englishman can read, without all the feelings of his nature revolting, the atrocious story told with the eloquence of truth in our columns to-day by a Norfolk lady. The wanton insults and indignities which are heaped on the wretched inhabitants of that unfortunate town, without the faintest pretence of military necessity, would exceed belief, were not Butler the chosen instrument of the Yankees for perpetrating them. There is a hellish ingenuity, also, which the Russians have not yet equalled, in making the cowards who feign Union sentiments build gallows for their brother rebels. The use made of the negroes for inflicting indignities on the whites, by quartering them in the houses of the wealthier class of inhabitants, and entrusting them with the work of a vexatious and arbitrary police duty, ought to satisfy the most sincere Abolitionist of the character of that emancipation, which on the one hand leaves the wives and children of the freedman to starve miserably, and on the other, employs him as the tool for gratifying a fiendish vindictiveness, and which aims at success only through sowing the seeds of an incurable feud between the two races.

The New York Herald calls upon the Government to imprison the crews of captured merchantmen until the end of the war. It says, "if our Government would do its own part, and retain every one of the sailors thus caught on prison fare, it would strike the severest blow at the contraband trade that it is now in the position to strike."

This and other ebullitions of rage against England are called forth by the rescue of the crew of the Chesapeake. When that vessel was brought to Halifax and handed over to the British authorities, the crew was landed, and released from custody by a crowd, which included some distinguished citizens. It is evident the British people do not sympathise with the Federal proclivities of the British authorities. The press calls the seizure of the Chesapeake piracy. This is, we think, an open questi captors had a Government authorisatio war on the enemy's shipping the act would But, however this may be, the conduct of authorities seems altogether indefensible. I am very glad to find that your confidence in General Bragg is unshaken. My own is confirmed by his recent operations, which in my opinion evince great vigor and skill. It would be very unfortunate to remove him at this juncture, when he has just earned, if not won, the gratitude of the country.

After seeing all the troops I shall write again. I respectfully suggest, should it then appear to you necessary to remove General Bragg, no one in this army, or engaged in this investigation, ought to be his successor. Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. E. JOHNSTON, General.

His Excellency the President.

TULLAHOMA, Feb. 12, 1863.

MR. PRESIDENT,—Since writing to you on the 3rd I have seen the whole army. Its appearance is very encouraging, and gives positive assurance of General Bragg's capacity to command. It is well clothed, healthy, and in fine spirits. The brigades engaged at Murfreesboro' are now stronger than they were on the morning of the battle—mainly by the return of the absentees brought back by the general's vigorous system. . . . My object has been to ascertain if the confidence of the troops in the ability of the army to beat the enemy is at all impaired. I find no indication that it is less than when you were in its camps.

While this feeling exists, and you regard General Bragg as brave and skilful, the fact that some or all of the general officers of the army, and many of the subordinates, think that you might give them a commander with fewer defects, cannot, I think, greatly diminish his value. To me it seems that the operations of this army in Middle Tennessee have been conducted admirably. I can find no record of more effective fighting in modern battles than that of this army in December, evincing skill in the commander and courage in the troops, which fully entitle them to the thanks of the Government.

In the early part of January, the country north of Granada being considered impracticable, I directed Major-General Van Dorn to bring to General Bragg's aid the cavalry of the Mississippi army, except such as Lieutenant-General Pemberton considered necessary to him. . . . I have been told by ——— that they have advised you to remove General Bragg, and place me in command of this army. I am sure that you will agree with me, that the part I have borne in this investigation would render it inconsistent with my personal honour to occupy that position. I believe, however, that the interest of the service requires that General Bragg should not be removed.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. E. JOHNSTON.

Thus the President consulted one of the most popular generals in the Confederate service as to the ability of General Bragg, and the result was an opinion "that the interest of the service requires that General Bragg should not be removed."

Messrs. Bates and Robinson, on behalf of Mr. Baker, of Liverpool, the owners of the Dashing Wave, have addressed Earl Russell in reference to the seizure of that vessel by the Federals. The Dashing Wave, having been for some time on the berth for Matamoras, and a cargo being procured by advertisement in the usual manner, left Liverpool on the 8th September. She was freighted with goods suitable for the Mexican market, and took out £12,000 in specie. She arrived at the mouth of the Rio Grande on the 2nd November, and on the 5th was seized by Captain Brown, of the United States gunboat Owasco, because the cargo included some quinine and chloroform. The vessel was taken to New Orleans, and in consequence of the incapacity of the prize crew received considerable damage on the voyage. According to the testimony of a person on board, the crew and passengers were treated with indignity and even brutality. Messrs. Bates and Robinson observe:—

Mr. Baker is wholly at a loss to know on what grounds the ship has been captured; he has never been engaged in any blockade-running or contraband trade, and the vessel was loaded by him in the ordinary course of his business. He has at the present time two ships on the berth, loading as general ships, for Matamoras, one or both of which he fears he will have to withdraw, as this is the second time that his trade has been interrupted by the illegal seizure of his vessels; the former case was that of the Magicienne, captured by the United States steamer Onward, but which vessel was released, the captors' own counsel declaring that there was not the slightest grounds for the capture, and through the representations of your lordship the claim of the owners for compensation is now being adjusted by the United States Government.

We wish to bring prominently before your lordship the injury done to the regular trade between this country and Mexico, if, without any justifiable cause, vessels are to be seized and carried to an American port simply on suspicion, and we trust that your lordship will make such representations to the United States Government as will not only secure to the owners, charterers, and shippers of cargo of the Dashing Wave ample compensation for the damage they may sustain, but will also prevent the recurrence of the seizure of British ships engaged in legitimate commerce.

Earl Russell, in reply to Messrs. Bates and Robinson, says Lord Lyons has been instructed to furnish a report respecting the case, but no promise is made of remonstrating with the Federal Government.

In the Federal House of Representatives, Mr. Holman proposed a series of resolutions to the effect that the Southern States had not ceased to be States of the Union; that the object of the war is to re-establish the supremacy of the Constitution, and "that all necessary and proper appropriations of money ought to be promptly made by this Congress for the support of the military and naval forces of the Government, and all measures of legislation necessary to increase and promote the efficiency of the army and navy, and … public credit, ought to be adopted; … vigorous prosecution of the war, peace … the union of the States and the supren… stitution, may be most speedily obtaine… lutions were tabled by a vote of 82 y… thus showing that the party in power h… disguise, and is now willing to acknowle… is not carried on for the purpose of resto…

The Richmond Enquirer says :—

For words there is no time and no room, save such plain words as may be needed in the business-like arrangement of the most simple and comprehensive war measures; unless, indeed, there be some senator or legislator who, rising to the height of this great argument, and inspired by the passion of patriotism, can pour all his soul into some burning word, flashing right from the heart, that may have power to kindle the stern resolution of the nation into even intenser life, and breathe into every action a superhuman energy. This Confederacy must not be, and shall not be, subdued by the dastard Yankee nation. Let all members of Congress make up their accounts to that, and act upon that with single mind. Let them be assured that if they do not help us with all their might, or if they stand too much in our way, they will be swept out, as other useless bodies have been ere now, and their vis inertiæ shaken from the arms of a people determined to fight out their independence or perish in its ruins.

The Richmond Examiner says :—

Congress will meet, we hope to adjourn no more during this war, on Monday, the day after to-morrow. The urgent question of the hour relates to the currency, and we can assure the reader that a most earnest effort is about to be made, and that measures of startling boldness and decision will be forthwith passed and put into operation to alter the present state of things, and produce an immediate contraction of the circulating medium. The idea has been widely circulated, we sincerely believe by the arts of those who possessed specie and property to sell, that the currency is past redemption; that Congress can do nothing now to contract its volume, and that it would abandon the task in despair, and suffer the present currency to die, in the hope of replacing it with some other. We again assure our readers that this idea is false as it is dangerous, and that it will soon produce the private ruin of those who are acting on it.

These quotations might be added to, but they are sufficient to show the spirit of the Confederate press, which, according to the Anglo-Federal organs, is inimical to the Government and representative of the people.

The Federal Generals Buford and Corcoran have lately died; the former from fever, and the latter from injuries received by falling from his horse.

The price of gold in New York on the 24th December was 51½ premium. On the previous day it had advanced about ½ per cent. in consequence of the canard about the disaster to the monitors before Charleston.

ENGLAND.

It is stated on authority that orders have been given for the return of the Channel Fleet to a port of the United Kingdom. This step has been taken in view of the complications likely to result from the attitude of Denmark and the German States.

It is stated that Parliament will meet for the despatch of business on Thursday the 4th February.

The Revenue Returns made up to the 31st December have been published. In every branch of the revenue, with two exceptions, there has been an increase. Under the head of excise the increase for the quarter is £753,000, under that of stamps it is £106,000, and under that of miscellaneous it is set down at £173,238. As compared with 1862, the total increase under the above heads of revenue, added to that under the heads of assessed taxes, Post-office and Crown lands, is for the quarter, £1,088,238, and for the year, £1,350,191. In the customs there is a decrease for the whole year of £615,000 as compared with 1862, and this decrease is entirely to be attributed to the lowering of the duty on tea. Under the head also of the property tax there is a decrease for the whole year of £1,298,000 as compared with 1862. The total receipts under all the heads of revenue were, for the first quarter of the year, £19,213,746; for the second quarter, £18,490,204; for the third, £14,411,504; and for the last quarter, £18,318,166. The total revenue for the year was £70,433,620.

The returns of emigration from the port of Liverpool during the past year have been completed, and are worthy of attention. The total number of persons who sailed from that port during the year, either for foreign countries or the colonies, was 137,982, being more than double the number of emigrants in 1862, in which year the number was 64,314. Of ships, 367 sailed under the Passengers Shipping Act, and carried 123,529 passengers, the remaining ships were 255 in number. Of the former class of ships 297 went to the United States of America, and carried 98,458 persons, all of whom were steerage passengers except 2,975. In point of nationality, it may be stated that 28,548 were English, 3,176 Scotch, and 61,312 were Irish. It is further estimated that at least 26,000 passengers have been carried by these very same ships from the ports of Ireland, at which the ships called on their outward voyage. To these we must add 16,963 adult passengers conveyed from Queenstown to New York by the vessels belonging to the Liverpool, New York, and Pennsylvania Steamship Company; it being also worthy of remark that not 300 of these were cabin passengers. Large numbers have also been conveyed by the extra steamers despatched by the Cunard Company, and by steamers belonging to other companies. So also the steamers belonging to the Montreal Ocean Steamship Company have taken considerable numbers from Londonderry, and the Atlantic Steam Navigation Company have done the like from Galway. It is to be observed that the transit by these fast steamers is too costly to be used by the class of passengers referred to, unless in cases where great encouragement has overcome pecuniary obstacles.

According to the returns of the pauperism in twenty-one unions of the cotton districts, it appears that on the whole year, from 31st December, 1862, to 31st December, 1863, there has been a net decrease of 186,350 paupers. On the other hand, there has been an increase throughout the past month attaining to 1,810 persons in the second week of December, 2,330 in the third week, and 900 in the final week, making a total increase of 5,040 paupers in three weeks. The aggregate population of these twenty-one unions is 2,080,000 souls. It is much to be feared that the severe weather which has now set in will largely increase the distress.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have published the official annual return of the name, number, tonnage, and other particulars regarding the steam and sailing ships composing the British Navy. The total strength of the effective ships of the Navy on the 1st of January was 975 of all classes. This number is exclusive of vessels doing duty in harbours at home and abroad, and convertible into block-ships for the defence of the coast, and exclusive also of a large fleet of iron and wooden mortar-boats laid up at Chatham. Of the 975 effective ships 72 are line-of-battle, and carry from 74 to 121 guns; 42 ships carry from 60 to 74 guns, 94 steamers and other vessels carry from 22 to 46 guns, and many of these are equal in size and tonnage to line-of-battle ships. There are 25 screw-corvettes, each carrying 21 guns, and there are 500 vessels carrying an armament of from 4 to 21 guns each, and among them are many iron vessels of enormous power. Next there are 185 screw gun-boats each carrying two Armstrong guns, and fitted with high-pressure engines of 60 horse-power. The ships in commission are 360, and the remainder are attached to the reserve squadrons at the various ports. During the past year nine vessels have been launched at the dockyards, and among them are the Achilles, ironclad, 35, 6,080 tons, 1,250 horse-power; the Ocean, 35, 4,045 tons and 1,000 horse-power; the Minotaur, ironclad, 50, 6,621 tons, and 1,350 horse-power; the Hector, ironclad, 32 guns, and the Valiant, ironclad, 34 guns. Four ironclads have been commenced during the year, among which is the Lord Clyde, 36, 4,067 tons and 1,000 horse-power. Seven ironclads are in course of construction, among which are the huge 50-gun ships Northumberland and Agincourt, and the cupola ship Royal Sovereign. There are also, besides these ironclads, 22 vessels, not ironclad, on the stocks, and among them are the Bulwark, 91 guns, 3716 tons; two 80-gun ships, and three 51-gun ships. The East India and China squadron, which is under Vice-Admiral A. L. Kupar, C.B., consists of 51 line-of-battle and other ships; the East Indies division being under Commodore F. R. Montressor. The North America and West India squadron, under Vice-Admiral Sir A. Milne, K.C.B., consists of 29 vessels. The Mediterranean squadron, under Vice-Admiral R. Smart, whose flagship is the Marlborough, 121 guns, and 4,000 tons, numbers 29 ships and gun-boats. The ships engaged on the West Coast of Africa in the suppression of the slave trade are 22 in number. The Pacific squadron, under Rear-Admiral J. Kingscombe, numbers 13 vessels, and there is a squadron of 11 ships on the south east coast of America. At the Cape of Good Hope eight line-of-battle and other ships are stationed, under Rear-Admiral Sir B. W. Walker, K.C.B. In Australia there is a squadron of seven vessels. Lastly, here is the Channel Fleet under Rear-Admiral S. C. Dacres, C.B., consisting of the Edgar, 71, 3,094 tons, the Warrior, 40, 6,109 tons; the Royal Oak, 35, 4,056 tons; the Black Prince, 41, 6,109 tons; the Defence, 16, 3,720 tons; and the screw gun-boat Trincolo, 2, 60 horse-power.

It is computed that since the first week in October 200 north country seamen have been lost in the gales. North and South Shields have alone lost ten ships' companies. The Mayor of Tynemouth, Mr. Joseph Spence, has commenced a subscription for the widows and orphans of the North Shields men. On the east coast the calamity has fallen heavily, there being no doubt that Great Yarmouth alone has lost 134 fishermen.

The Right Rev. Richard Chevenix Trench, D.D., was consecrated Archbishop of Dublin on the 2nd of January, in Christ's Church Cathedral; the officiating prelates being the Lord Primate and the Bishops of Killaloe, Ossory and Cork. Two days later the ceremony of "enthroning" was duly celebrated.

The Rev. James Craigie Robertson, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, the author of a "History of the Reformation," "Sketches of Church History during the first Six Centuries," a "History of the Christian Church," and other works, has been appointed Professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London; that office having been vacated by the death of the Reverend Alexander McCaul, D.D.

On Sunday last the Special Evening Services were resumed in the Cathedral of St. Paul, and a congregation assembled to the number of 3,000. The Lord Bishop of London preached the sermon.

Mr. William Makepeace Thackeray was buried on Wednesday the 30th December, at noon, in the cemetery of Kensal Green. At his special request, he was laid in a brick-built grave, beside one of his children. Upwards of 1,000 persons were present at the ceremony. Among the mourners were Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr. Tom Taylor, Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. Mark Lemon, Mr. John Leech, and the whole staff of the contributors to Punch; also Mr. Robert Browning, Mr. Anthony Trollope, Mr. George Cruikshank, M. Louis Blanc, Baron Marochetti, Mr. John Millais, M. Herman Merivale, and many other eminent artists and authors.

Mr. Mure, M.P. for Buteshire, in an address last week to his constituents, referred at some length to the American war. He agreed with the policy of neutrality, but expressed strong personal leanings in favour of the South. The question of slavery apart, he held that the South had every claim on the sympathy of England; on that subject he thought the North dishonest, and argued that it ought not to be counted in estimating the comparative merits of the two causes. He did not blame the Government for their conduct in regard to the seizure of the Alexander, but hinted that the verdict of the jury should have been considered final. He urged that in view of the enormous inconsistency of permitting the unmolested export of arms to the North, the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act should be reconsidered; and, finally, he stated his belief that the recognition of the South could not long be delayed.

It is stated on authority that, although the judge before whom George Victor Townley was tried concurred in the verdict, yet that he advised a further inquiry in order to ascertain whether the prisoner was or was not insane. The inquiry was undertaken, at the request of the Secretary of State, by the Lunacy Commissioners. Their report was accompanied by the certificate of two medical men, signed by three justices of the peace. Thereupon ensued an order for the immediate removal of the convict to a lunatic asylum, and his sentence is respited during her Majesty's pleasure.

THE CONTINENT.

THE answer of the Emperor of the French to the congratulations offered him on New-Year's-day by the diplomatic body is always looked for with interest. In critical times like the present it is awaited with anxiety. Men remember how much the few words of dissatisfaction which Napoleon III. addressed to the Austrian ambassador on the 1st January, 1859, presaged. The answer given this year to the Papal Nuncio—the usual spokesman—ought to be reassuring. But for the Dano-German quarrel, which is supposed by many to be beyond hope of other arbitrament than that of the sword, it would have been universally accepted as a pledge of peace. His Imperial Majesty, after thanking the diplomatic body for their good wishes, and accepted them as a happy omen for the year, said :—

"Notwithstanding the difficulties which have been brought about by certain events in different parts of Europe, I am confident that they will be removed by the conciliatory spirit by which the Sovereigns are animated, and that we shall be able to maintain peace."

The words we have quoted as the general answer of the Emperor are vouched for by the official journal. A remark which the Emperor is said to have addressed to Mr. Dayton rests upon the authority of the Temps. According to that journal, his Majesty expressed the hope to Mr. Dayton that the year 1864 would be one of peace and reconciliation for the United States. Reconciliation it is beyond the power of any man or men to bring about. Peace is of course possible, and no man can do more than the Emperor to effect it.

Just as in 1859 the new year's speech of the Emperor Napoleon was followed by one from Victor Emanuel, so is it in 1864. But there is a very great difference between the two periods. In 1859, Victor Emanuel used a language which thoroughly accorded with that employed in the Tuileries, and was undoubtedly dictated there. This year, whilst the Emperor proclaims his confidence in peace, the King, regretting that 1863 had not furnished a favourable opportunity for the redemption of Italy, considers that 1864 will bring about European complications, not well defined, which might offer the wished-for opportunity. The country might reckon upon the King, as the King might reckon upon the country. This language tells us nothing, and has not really anything alarming in it. It has always been certain that Victor Emanuel would seize the first favourable opportunity to attempt to possess himself of Venetia; and the foolish and unjust policy of Austria in the Slesvig Holstein question is naturally looked forward to in Italy as promising that opportunity. But Italy will not dare to move until she receives the sign from France, and so long as the Emperor Napoleon believes that it is his interest to preserve peace so long must Italy chafe in inaction. The sincerity of the Emperor Napoleon's desire to maintain peace cannot be doubted, and the fretting of King Victor Emanuel has therefore, for the present, little importance.

The draft of the Address prepared by the committee of the Corps Législatif has been published. It is by no means fulsome. It states that the distant expeditions to China, Cochin-China, and Mexico "have greatly disturbed the public mind of France, on account of the obligations and sacrifices they entail." It proceeds :—

"We acknowledge that these expeditions must inspire respect for our countrymen and for the French flag, and that they may also develope our maritime commerce, but we should be happy to see realised shortly the good results for which your Majesty has led us to hope."

It declares that the Chamber will investigate the measures of reform laid before it with a desire of seconding the Emperor's love for real progress; and on the Polish and Congress questions adopts this very sensible language :—

"The recollections of our history, and the feelings of humanity which animate us, excite the most earnest sympathies for Poland, and we have seen with grief the failure of the combined efforts of three great Powers. Neither can we, however, disregard that the sincere and cordial support of Russia has been useful to France on important occasions.

"We should regret any coldness in our friendly relations with that Power, and have therefore accepted with profound satisfaction the idea of an European Congress, which will be a lasting honour to your reign. France, on whom you have bestowed splendour and glory, is grateful to you for not having committed her treasures and the blood of her children in causes in which her honour and interests are not at stake.

"Leave without regret, Sire, the few unjust prejudices against accepting your loyal and pacific propositions. Noble and sound ideas make way in the world, and take root in the heart of the peoples. Await calmly the effect of your generous works."

An amendment asking that the Poles should be recognised as belligerents has been presented. The debate will commence, it is said, on the 11th. The Committee of the Corps Legislatif, to which the Bill asking supplementary credits was referred, has presented a report recommending that the credits should be granted. It says, however, "We are unanimous in advising that an end should be put to the Mexican expedition; far be it from us to say at any price, but as promptly as the interests and honour of France will permit. The expression of this wish certainly responds to the general sentiment of the country, and we think the Government of the Emperor will receive it with favour."

Happy the people which has no history. Happier still that one to which the constitutional sovereign has nothing to say in his speech from the throne calculated to create the slightest excitement. The King of Portugal has opened the session of the Cortes, and the only points the telegraphic agents can find in his speech which are worth transmitting, are that the tobacco monopoly is to be abolished, and that the budget is satisfactory.

The Federal execution was nominally directed to enforce from the Danish Government the withdrawal of the Patent of March and the Constitution of November, and the establishment of a system conformable to the German interpretation of the engagements of December, 1851. It is used to overthrow the authority of King Christian, and establish that of the Pretender. The Federal Commissioners have taken no steps to stop the proceedings of the partisans of Prince Frederick; they have allowed him to be proclaimed, and they have dismissed the legal officials to put in their places enthusiastic partisans of the Augustenburgs. The Diet has formally approved their conduct. Prince Frederick, having made his way into the duchy—he went from Hamburg to Gluckstadt by steamer, and then across to Kiel, and having issued proclamations, in which he practically assumes the Government—the representative of Austria at the Diet moved on Saturday that he be immediately summoned to leave the duchy. The motion was, however, lost; seven votes having been given for, and nine against it. The smaller States are, in fact, determined to sustain the Pretender at all hazards. Wurtemburg, Saxony, and Bavaria have concerted a plan of action, and as the war cannot hurt them, they will push the matter on against Austria and Prussia, whom they don't apprehend, because they believe that they are not sincere. The two great Powers could easily obtain a majority in the Diet if they chose; but both are unwilling to put themselves in opposition to the popular feeling. The only thing that would stop the South Germans would be the appearance of a French army on the Rhine.

The Federal troops are now in possession of the whole duchy. The Saxon General Hake, who commands the army of execution, is at Rendsburg. The Danes have blown up the tête de pont at Frederickstadt; but they had not, at the last advices, abandoned old Rendsburg and the Crown Work which protects it.

The Danish ministerial crisis is over. Bishop Monrad has accepted the post vacated by Mr. Hall. That is the only change of importance in the Ministry, and it does not seem to imply any change of policy. The King has apparently discovered that further concessions would be useless, and might cost him Denmark. Bishop Monrad does not entertain opinions differing greatly from those of Mr. Hall, who in all probability will shortly return to power. Meanwhile, the Government is preparing for war. Fourteen thousand men of the reserve have been called out. The King has proceeded to the army, and addressed a spirited proclamation to the troops. Reliance seems to be still placed upon English assistance.

The English Government seems to be extremely harassed. It feels bound to defend Denmark, but appears afraid to take any decisive steps. It is working to obtain a conference, but to that the German Powers are not disposed to agree, and the French Government naturally declines to allow its project of a general Congress to be supplanted by the English scheme of a restricted Conference. The recent conduct of Earl Russell has not been calculated to induce the Emperor to take any trouble to serve English interests. The Nord Deutsche Zeitung, the organ of the Prussian Government, declares that the English Government has stated to the Courts of Berlin and Vienna that if German troops cross the Eider, it would be unable to refuse the assistance Denmark would ask. That is the language England should long ago have held, but for all the authority of the Nord Deutsche Zeitung, we fear it has not yet been held. The truth seems to be that the Government is fettered by the influence of an exalted personage, who is almost as fervid a Slesvig-Holsteiner as the Duke of Saxe Coburg-Gotha. It is a significant fact that the Crown Prince of Prussia, immediately upon his return from London, busied himself in urging the immediate withdrawal of Prussia from the Treaty of London.

The budget of the Department of Foreign Affairs has been rejected by the First Chamber of Holland. It seems that the Chamber was not satisfied with the conduct of the Foreign Minister on the Polish and Dano-German and Congress questions. The Minister Jonkheer P. van der Massen de Sombreff, accepting the vote as one of no confidence, resigned, and the Minister of Marine, Jonkheer Huyssen de Kattendyke, has been provisionally charged with the Foreign Department.

A Dutch newspaper publishes a telegram from St. Petersburg, to the effect that King George I. had quitted Athens, convinced of his incapacity to regulate the confusion of the country. This is not the way in which such an important piece of news is likely to first reach England, and no reliance can therefore be placed upon it King George might, however, well despair of his task. The National Assembly seems incapable of the smallest amount of patriotism. Every real reform is resisted to the last, and with the best will on the part of the young King things are much worse than under Otho.

THE EAST.

FROM China we learn that the English mercenaries have come to grief. Captain Sherard Osborn and his comrades have been disowned by Prince Kung. The telegram runs thus:—"Prince Kung having refused to ratify the agreement made by Mr. Lay with Captain Osborn, Captain Osborn proceeded to disband his force. The European ministers protested against Prince Kung having the ships on his own terms, and Prince Kung then requested Mr. Bruce to sell the ships for him. Mr. Bruce having requested Captain Osborn to undertake their disposal, a part of the squadron were to sail for England, and Captain Osborn, with the Keangsoo, Quantung, and Amoy, had sailed for Bombay. Captain Osborn may be shortly expected in England." This is a fortunate escape. If the services of Captain Osborn had been accepted, the English Government would ere long have found itself charged with the administration of the larger or richer portion of the Chinese Empire.

News from Japan, directly contradictory to that which we gave last week, with a caution against its acceptance, states that Prince Satsuma has proposed a settlement of the difficulty, offering to pay an indemnity, and erect a mausoleum to Mr. Richardson.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

[The subjoined fills up the gap in our weekly series of Richmond correspondence, which was left by our correspondent's letter of the 30th November, published in THE INDEX of 31st December.]

RICHMOND, November 21.

IF the telegrams from the Department of Tennessee were not well nigh idiotic, what we receive with regard to the operations in that quarter might inspire us with the liveliest encouragement. The movement of Longstreet mentioned in my last letter has been plainly developed. Its purpose was the capture of Knoxville, and the expulsion or capture of the amiable Burnside and his command. Bringing a reasonable amount of common sense to the interpretation and reconcilement of confused and conflicting accounts, we may conclude that, pressing on in the direction of Knoxville, General Longstreet surprised the Yankees at London; that after more or less resistance they fled in confusion, abandoning their trains; that from 1,500 to 2,000 of them were "secured" in the flight, and that the residue got safely into Knoxville behind their works, which works General Longstreet was preparing to attack. Knoxville is probably not yet in his occupancy, though we may confidently hope that it will be in three or four days' time. An intercepted letter of Burnside discloses the fact that the Knoxville garrison is on the shortest allowance of provisions, so that with Wheeler's cavalry cutting up their transportation, it is likely they will be compelled to capitulate within a fortnight. The possession of Knoxville is of the first importance, intrinsically and strategically. It will relieve the whole of Eastern Tennessee. It will disembarrass our forces in South-Western Virginia. There will be no longer any apprehension with regard to the Salt Works. These advantages are immediate and obvious. But it will also compel the enemy to evacuate Chattanooga, perhaps to fall back without delay upon Nashville. Grant does not, indeed, rely upon the railway from Knoxville for his supplies (already brought down to "a handful of meal in a barrel and a little oil in a cruse," without the hope of miraculous interposition to extend the commissariat), but he does depend upon Burnside for the protection of his flank; and the latter's co-operation was indispensable for that rapid and overwhelming advance into Northern Georgia which was to reduce Atlanta, and cut the whole arterial system of the Confederate railways at that vital point. Without a strong Federal column to protect his left wing, Grant will be under a pressing necessity to withdraw from his present position. Such, at least, is the meaning I attach to the movement on Knoxville. As one of the "plans of the noble Longstreet" to be carried out "under the supervision of the heroic Bragg," it naturally absorbs as much of the interest of the moment as can be withdrawn from the activities at Charleston and the inactivities on the Rapidan.

At Charleston the enemy continues to hurl his masses of iron upon Sumter with little or no effect, and has begun the demolition of the city, not with the fury that was promised, but rather mildly, perhaps as matter of amusement to the grim Gilmore, in the way of relaxation from the serious business before him. Eighteen or twenty shells were thrown into Charleston daily, sometimes at noon, sometimes at midnight. The streets and dwellings are of course deserted. The hotels are not as yet closed, nor has the publication of the daily papers been discontinued; but no strangers are permitted to enter the silent and listless city, so there are few readers for the journals and few guests for the table d'hôte. Several buildings have been struck during the week, among them the office of the Telegraph Company, which has since been removed beyond the range of the bombardment, but in no instance do we learn that the "Greek fire" has lighted up a conflagration. Has this proved a failure, or are the Yankees restrained by the public sentiment of Europe from employing it? Perhaps their stock of incendiary shell is not yet large enough, and they are firing only to get the exact range of the accursed "cradle of the rebellion." Yesterday morning, before day-break, several barges, filled with Yankee troops, approached Fort Sumter, and, on being hailed by the sentries, discharged first a volley of oaths and next a volley of musketry, whereupon a fire was opened upon them by the garrison with small arms and by batteries Johnston and Simkins with grapeshot, which dispersed them in fifteen minutes. No casualties occurred within the fort. The loss of the enemy in the barges is unknown. The average of injury to the garrison at Sumter does not exceed the killing of one man per diem.

From the Rapidan nothing of great moment. The whole of Meade's force is represented as being south of the Orange and Alexandria railroad, and scouting parties have been seen on the Warrenton road within a few miles of Falmouth. It is not believed that they intend another invasion of Stafford, notwithstanding. That region is a desert, wholly destitute of grain, forage, and timber. The route to Richmond viâ Fredericksburg is not more practicable now than it was twelve months ago. Moreover, the winter season is close at hand, when the roads will become again impassable. The winter campaign will probably not involve any larger operations than cavalry combats. In this sort of fighting the success has been for the most part with the Confederates, and the bold riders of Stuart and Hampton are more than ever on the alert. On the morning of Wednesday, the 18th instant, about dawn, the latter general fell upon a cavalry camp of the Yankees within four miles of Stevensburg, Culpeper county, and after a very short conflict, in which his loss was one killed and five wounded, captured 175 men, with their horses and equipments, four wagons, and a cavalry forge. A Yankee major and three privates fell dead on the field, and fifteen or twenty were wounded.

The Northern papers are enlivened by sundry letters, intercepted on the Cornubia, from officers of the Confederate Government in France and England, the publication of which is, after all, a matter of no concern, when we consider how indifferent the Powers of Europe have been and still remain to the success of the Confederate States. It is hardly worth while to argue the question of recognition any longer; perhaps it is an impertinence to do so, in the opinion of Earl Russell and "Historicus," but to us it seems really amazing that England and France continue to regard with complacency the progress of a strife, in which freedom and civilisation are both imperilled on the Western Continent, and the final result of which, let it be in 1864 or 1894, can be nothing less than the disruption for ever of the Union they still profess to regard as the government existent and rightful. It is an absurdity to imagine that Seward and Co. will ever succeed in their efforts at the subjugation of the Confederate States. They may carry on the war indefinitely—they may transmit it, with its load of debt and disgrace, to their descendants—they may burn every dwelling, sack every town, devastate every arable acre, between the Potomac and the Gulf of Mexico; they may keep up the fight until not one of the original combatants, in either Cabinet, in either Congress, in either army, is left to witness the melancholy finale; but they can never restore the Union nor re-establish the hateful authority of the United States over these wasted territories. Let the Confederates be right or wrong; let the principle that a people has the right to change its form of government whenever the same be deemed by them oppressive or injurious be admitted or rejected; the matter is not changed one iota. The United States is engaged in a hopeless effort, as all Europe will admit. In that effort the United States is squandering millions of money; is exhibiting to the world by turns the painful spectacle of pitiable impotence and of diabolical cruelty; is causing some of the best blood of the earth to flow in the costliest libations to liberty and to license, on the one side and the other; is impoverishing a fertile region on whose agricultural industry much of the prosperity of the globe depends; and yet all Europe can look on, apathetic, nay, can help the stronger party against the weak in the maintenance of what is falsely called a neutrality—I say it is amazing that such things can be in the nineteenth century of the Christian era. England and France, all powerful as they are, may yet rue the policy they are pursuing towards the Confederate States, in the alienation of a brave people, who still hold in their hands the golden key of national wealth and who were disposed to be their firm and fast friends.

The radical difference in character between the Northern and Southern people, which must render any political union hereafter impossible, and which underlies the existing convulsions, is shown not less strikingly in the most trivial than in the most momentous affairs. Their cruelty towards non-combatants, their disregard of all constitutional restraints, their bad faith in the execution of the cartel for the exchange of prisoners, their inevitable bravado in continually fixing upon ninety days for the termination of the war, are not in more effective contrast with the conduct of the Confederates than their fondness for theatrical display and the flunkeyism they manifest on all occasions. Take par exemple the recent parade in Meade's army over the Confederate colours captured with Hoke's and Hays's brigades. The Confederates have taken hundreds and hundreds of Yankee flags since the beginning of the war. "Star-spangled banners" of all stuffs and sizes—banners emblazoned with the arms of the Yankee States in all their preposterous heraldry—but no Confederate general has ever made a fuss over them. The trumpery has been sent to the office of the adjutant-general, and lies there, a heap of bunting and silk, fringe and tassels. But General Meade "improves his opportunity," and gratifies the genuine Yankee love of display by making a scene of the reception of our flags. There was much oratory and martial music and effusion of patriotic feeling, and the whole business is stunningly reported for the New York papers. By way of contrast, take another and a social illustration. Last week two weddings were celebrated in what in America may be called "high life," the one in Washington the other in Richmond. The Richmond nuptials were very quietly conducted. A young officer of the Confederate army led a sister of Mrs. Jefferson Davis to the church, and the only announcement of the fact was that made two days afterwards in the hymeneal column of the daily newspapers. But when Miss Kate Chase "the eldest and accomplished" daughter of Secretary Chase, of the U.S. Treasury, "whose graces sparkle and radiate like gems of dazzling splendour" (vide Washington Chronicle), becomes the blushing bride of Senator Sprague, of Rhode Island, all Yankeedom is ecstatic. Jenkins is in his glory. The dresses, the supper, the showy uniforms, the bridesmaids, the arrival of President Lincoln, the beatified persons of both sexes who "assisted," the beautiful Episcopal service and the osculations—are set forth in all the Yankee journals with more of eloquent description than even the Morning Post could afford to the reception of the Princess Alexandra. The shoddy aristocracy must get up a laureate and a court journal. Since Secretary Seward has announced, in his speech at Auburn, that Lincoln will not "abdicate" at the close of his constitutional term of office, it becomes the Yankees to keep up the dignity of the Court.

The weather has been capricious during the past week. Ice has formed to the thickness of a window-pane. We have had the temperature of spring, and to-day the falling rain gives promise of miry roads for the whole winter season.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, January 5.

THE first of the year, with its thick mud and constant drizzle of half-melted snow, was a sad disappointment to more people than the vendors of new year's gifts in the booths of the Boulevards. All France, perhaps Europe, was waiting in anxious suspense the manifestation of the Imperial policy which rumour had been so busy with. The two phrases which have reached the public, the answer to the Nuncio's compliment, and the half-condoling good wishes for "peace and conciliation" addressed to Mr. Dayton, are equally meaningless. Still, when men have made up their minds to hearing a revelation they generally find the materials of one, and in the absence of words the quid-nunes insist on the particular tones with which each phrase was accentuated as it fell from the Imperial lips. Not having been present either officially or as the shadow of some official personage, I cannot pretend to describe a question in which there are so many versions as syllables. The Bourse has at least seen no fresh guarantee of peace in the events of that day, and under the influence of King Victor Emanuel's threatening words, still more, perhaps, from the monetary difficulties which continue to make themselves felt here, hardly any business has been transacted, and the tendency has been downward.

I sent you last Wednesday evening the France, which only reached me in time for the post, with the new year's gift it produced for its readers, and which I thought might be acceptable to some of yours. The correspondence between the President of the Confederate States and the Pope is much more than a diplomatic curiosity. Even in the beginning of this century, when the prestige of the Pope was at the lowest ebb, Napoleon ordered his ambassador to treat him as he would a monarch with 200,000 bayonets at his orders. Since then the Popes have regained a very large accession of influence, and, although they no longer make and unmake kings at their will—and it may be doubted if they ever did more than consecrate by their sanction the will of the intelligent majority—their recognition of a new Government is still not without its importance. The proverbial prudence of the Roman Court gives a significance to the answer addressed by the head of the Roman Church to the "Illustrious and Honourable President," which must strike even those who attach little weight to his religious authority. Those who recognise him as God's vicegerent, will, after this, think twice before selling themselves to bear arms in a struggle which he so emphatically condemns. The Temps cannot make out how the chief of religion can be so complimentary to the "representative of slavery;" but the Siecle does not wonder at the titles which His Holiness decerns to the President, broadly insinuating that Christianity has always been the religion of slavery.

If the Pope has thus done something that may stop the supply of Catholic soldiers to fight for the Northerns, even the Liberal papers here contribute information which should help to the same result. The manœuvres resorted to in New York to procure recruits, exposed in some of the American papers, are republished here; and I may call your readers' attention to the revelations of the Courrier des Etats Unis on the dragging and subsequent enrolling of seven French subjects; and of the Tribune, which says that three men drugged by these wretches (the recruiters) died a few hours after their arrival in camp.

It is honourable to the French Liberal press that it has unanimously blamed Mr. Lincoln's so-called amnesty. The Opinion Nationale says that the proclamation of amnesty had been received in the South as it had foreseen. "It has called forth unanimous protests, and in its application assumes all the characters of a measure of repression." In virtue of this proclamation General Butler began, on the 15th December, to administer the oath prescribed by President Lincoln, to the inhabitants of Norfolk. 2,000 persons have yielded to this order; all who refused to take the oath must leave the town and the Federal lines. . . . Silence would have been more dignified and more prudent, for, as it is interpreted and applied, the President's proclamation amnesties no one, and becomes, on the contrary, a new excuse for wholesale proscription of the citizens who cannot take the oath proposed to them." The Presse is still stronger in its language. "It seems to us that the telegraph and the newspapers were very indulgent in giving the name of amnesty to this declaration of war—this manifesto of selfishness and fear. When it is a question of covering over the ruins of a civil war, of burying the memory of sanguinary hate, we cannot admit that an act of amnesty should contain provisoes which render it only a bitter jest. The first duty of the victor, in his own interest, is to have his victory forgotten, but he is far from consigning it to oblivion when he excludes from his amnesty the worthiest names, the persons who have played the greatest part in resisting him, and to whom only a smile from Fortune was wanting to make them, even in the eyes of the conquerors themselves, heroes." "War to the death, or unqualified amnesty; it was between these that President Lincoln had to choose. Between these extremes there are only dangerous expedients that give to an amnesty, which should be an act of strength, an unmistakable character of fear, weakness, and selfishness."

It is still doubtful what part France will take in the German-Danish quarrel. Halting between the respect for recent treaties and the new theory of nationalities, perhaps coquetting with the question to punish the English Cabinet for its point-blank refusal of the Congress, the Imperial policy seems still undecided. If there be any inclination to embark again in war, it will be for an object more nearly affecting France than a reconstitution of Poland, and it will not be manifested until circumstances shall seem to leave no alternative but an appeal to the sword. The French nation is quite as peacefully disposed as the people of England; they have learned to count the cost of war and the profits of peace. The Address to the Emperor, as proposed by the Committee of the legislative body, was read yesterday. It is highly pacific. It gives a sigh for Poland, and a laudatory paragraph to Russia, a gentle blame to Mexican and such like expeditions "which have caused great anxiety to many in France, on account of the sacrifices they have entailed," and the realisation of the good results promised from them is anxiously looked for. "France has no other ambition than to secure quiet at home, to develope its material well-being, by labour and peace, its moral well-being by the sincere and gradual introduction of civil and political liberty."

The Archduke Maximilian is expected here in about a fortnight, and it is generally rumoured that he will sail from Saint Nazaire for Vera Cruz some time about the end of February. It is expected that a part of the French army of occupation will return immediately after his arrival in his capital.

There is in this evening's Presse an article on American finance, which would be curious if I had time to translate and comment it, for its facts are in some respects disputable, and its conclusions singularly false. I may return to it next week.

THE FEDERAL GODDESS OF LIBERTY.—"It is a curious circumstance that the statue of Liberty, which has just been unveiled on the top of the Capital at Washington, represents a coloured woman. For fear of discolouration, the excuse is, an acid has been employed, which stains the surface of the figure, and makes the colour weather-proof."—World. The above is another proof that the present delusion has reached its culminating point. France reeled on in madness until she put up a prostitute as the Goddess of Reason. We have capped the climax of our insanity by raising, upon the dome of our Capitol, a statue of freedom in the person of a negro wench. —The New York Day-Book.

NORTHERN NEGROES AND SOUTHERN.—A private letter from an officer at Hilton Head says there is as little companionship between the Massachusetts negroes and those of Carolina as there is between blacks and whites. The Massachusetts darkeys think it beneath their dignity to associate with the unfortunate "freedmen" (?) from the plantations. The "First South Carolina" (negro) regiment undertook on one occasion to visit the "54th Massachusetts" (also negro), but the latter refused to receive them, and peremptorily ordered them off, as a "pack of dirty contraband niggers." The Rev. Mr. Higginson's teachings are clearly needed by his own men.—The Hartford (Conn.) Times, Dec. 19.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE political article in Blackwood this month is entitled "The European Crisis," and, as might be inferred from the title, is written in a somewhat alarmist tone. The writer's view of the Polish question is, however, remarkably clear, just, and impartial; perhaps somewhat too favourable to Russia, but yet not conceived in an unfriendly spirit towards the Poles. The consequences of a great crime are frequently such as to make reparation simply impossible, and place all parties hopelessly in the wrong. This has been the case in Poland. The original partition of that country was a monstrous, almost an unparalleled wrong; but it is with nations as with individuals—interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium; and we cannot enter into a discussion of rights based upon a state of things which was forcibly and wrongfully disturbed a century ago. Russia is in possession and cannot be asked to give up that possession. Europe, injured and disturbed by her possession, is not yet entitled to call upon her to resign it, and is bound by treaties which have recognised her title. The Poles have never acquiesced in their subjugation to Russia, and have from time to time, by unsuccessful revolt, asserted their claim to independence. They are not, in the wrong; they deserve honour for their patriotism and self-devotion; and if they would have shown wisdom in accepting their fate, they have shown heroic virtue in resisting it. The Czar is not in the wrong, as judged by the ordinary standard of human morality, whatever may be his position in the sight of a tribunal which exacts obedience to a higher law than that of nations. Alexander I. was lenient and kind to the Poles, and the result was the rebellion of 1831. Nicholas kept Poland quiet, but he did it at the price of a tyranny which any man of a less stern conscience or a more susceptible heart could not have borne to inflict. Alexander II. desired to govern Poland kindly and well; but he was resolved to govern, and Poland was resolved not to be governed by him. Under such circumstances a terrible and merciless conflict was inevitable; and if in that conflict both parties have committed grievous crimes, yet both stood originally on an inexpugnable ground of right. Meantime, the position of the other European Powers is one of infinite perplexity, which is well sketched by the author of this essay. England has no interest in the matter, except as a signatory of the Treaty of Vienna and a well-wisher to Poland. Austria has deep interests of her own involved. She needs an independent Poland between herself and Russia. She would purchase this advantage gladly at the cost of a war and of the cession of Gallicia. But to make war with Russia, and to be forced to accept anything short of this at its close, would be for her simple, absolute, irretrievable ruin. She would lose Hungary and Venetia at the first moment when Russia found a favourable opportunity of taking revenge. And she does not wish to be brought into conflict with Prussia as the ally of France and England. The position of France, says the author, affords the key to the whole labyrinth of entanglements. The French people—for, though bearing no goodwill to Napoleon III., the writer is forced to see and willing to confess that the ambition he censures is that of the nation rather than of the Sovereign—is eager to help Poland; and events may occur to-morrow which would make it impossible to resist that eagerness. At the same time, France has designs of her own. A war with Prussia would not be allowed to pass without an effort to secure the frontier of the Rhine. France would not allow the Emperor to forego this object; England will not, and Austria dare not for her very life, allow him to attain it. Hence the impossibility of a European intervention on behalf of Poland; hence our strenuous language and our apathetic inaction. The writer approves in the main Lord Russell's Polish policy, though he is evidently a bitter opponent of the Minister; but he doubts whether, after all, England may not, in her own despite, be hurried into a war.

"Meanwhile the Poles fight on. They make no progress—the insurrection even wanes; but still they fight on. They knew from the first that they could not cope single-handed with the colossal power of Russia. From the first they have placed their hopes in foreign aid. And that aid may yet come. They have nothing to hope for from Russia now. This is the second time they have risen in fierce revolt. They know the iron despotism that followed the suppression of their first rebellion; they can be at no loss to understand their fate after a failure of the second. Russia will not allow herself to be embarrassed by the continued existence of so rebellious a nationality. Humane as the Russian Emperor unquestionably is, he cannot allow his empire to be placed in jeopardy by a repetition of such revolts. If the Poles find that movements are on foot which will bring them the expected aid by-and-by, the insurrection may sink into its embers, and await the breath that is to arouse them again into fire. But if they have no such hope, they may be expected to play the part of desperate men more desperately than ever, and to court a struggle with their oppressors of so sanguinary a character as to compel the active intervention of other Powers. We are a staid people—and all the good sense of England is arrayed in favour of non-intervention in the quarrels of the Continent. But even with us, there are gusts of national excitement which bear down everything before them. The affair of Sinope decided the question of the late war with Russia. And among the contingencies of the future, there are some which would gravely affect our interests, and others which would passionately excite our sympathies. Despite the decisive No with which our Government has met his proposals for co-operation, the Emperor Napoleon does not yet despair of winning our support—even though he knows that to some of the objects of his policy, if revealed, England will be unanimously opposed. The European crisis seems only to deepen; and it is not without anxiety, though without alarm, that we look forward to the events of the year."

Of the Slesvig-Holstein imbroglio we find in the same article a very lucid account—dealing, of course, only with the immediate circumstances of the case; for to give a detailed history of its merits in an intelligible form is beyond the power of mortal man. He gives credit to Austria and Prussia—especially to the former—for an honest effort to keep faith, and maintain the Treaty of 1852; but he points out that the Prussian Government is under strong temptations to yield to the demands of the people, and recover by a single stroke the popularity it has forfeited by a long conflict with the representatives of the people; and that the two great German Powers cannot, from their position in the Diet, hold aloof altogether without leaving the rest of Germany free to run riot in the wildest excesses of aggression. He believes, we may remark, that Austria and Prussia really intend the army of occupation in Holstein to shield Denmark against the filibustering bodies which are being collected in various parts for the service of Duke Frederick of Augustenburg. Like most other observers, he thinks the Germans imprudent to the verge of madness in entering on a quarrel which they cannot hope to decide in their favour except by war, and in which, if war should break out, England must take the side of Denmark, and France be left free to do what she will with Prussia and the minor German States; Italy, the while, watching eagerly for the signal which shall loose her splendid army upon Venetia, and Hungary ready to avail herself of any opportunity that may occur to extort her own terms from Austria. In truth, the Germans are as mad as the Yankees seemed to be in December, 1861; and they are not likely to be so easily restored to sanity. The madness of the Yankees is that of an hysterical girl, to be cured by a sharp threat or a bucket of cold water; that of the Germans is the fury of an insane enthusiast, who fancies that he has sustained some wrong or been deprived of some right, and is utterly careless of consequences in his pursuit of vengeance.

The other articles in Blackwood are as good as is usual with this excellent magazine—the most attractive among them being an account, rather rambling and incomplete, but full of interest, of the great Foundation School of Winchester—the parent of Eton, and the oldest public school in England. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in the name of Pisistratus Caxton, furnishes a clever jeu d'esprit in verse—a dispute between the aspiring Mind and worn out Body that—

> "Clubbed up in one whole, by one title defined,
> Were called a Great Man."

In verse Sir Edward is elegant, scholarly, and tasteful, but never reaches the height of poetry. He sets, however, an example sadly needed by the poets of this generation; and never fancies that rhyme and metre may be made the substitutes of grammar and good English. "Tony Butler" goes on as usual, and Captain Speke affords the material for a very readable review.

The opening article in Fraser, on "The Highway of Nations," contains some very pertinent criticisms on the absurd and Quixotic sacrifices of England in accepting the Declaration of Paris, and on the clumsy phraseology of that convention. But in dealing with the American question the writer displays something more than partisanship. He goes out of his way to prove the case of the North in the matter of the Alabama and her consorts, and vindicates the reckless violations of municipal and public law of which, in the Northern interest, the British Cabinet has been guilty He has nothing new to say on this head, and we may pass over that portion of his article without remark. But when we find him affirming the effective character of the blockade of the Southern coasts, without one word of reference to the definition of effectiveness by the Treaty of Paris, or to our express engagements with the South to recognise no other definition thereof, we are compelled to call attention to the unscrupulous disengenuousness of a writer whose omissions cannot be attributed to ignorance or carelessness. "Stephen on Criminal Law" is an excellent review of an invaluable work; a work of interest not merely to lawyers, but to all men who have any claim to be considered as educated politicians. Every one who thinks he has not time to read the book should read this review of it; and most who read the review will make up their minds to read the book. "Japan" is well treated in a sensible and practical, if not perfectly fair article; and the weakness of the English case against that country is forcibly though temperately exposed in a passage which deserves the more attention that the writer subsequently shows a disposition to deny the right of the Japanese to hold aloof from intercourse with the civilised world.

"If we consider the relative strength and knowledge of the two nations, a treaty between England and Japan is very much like a contract between an infant and a grown man. Perhaps we should not have gone to war with them if they had refused to have anything to do with us; and, according to Sir R. Alcock, the Americans most undoubtedly would not. This, however, was not their view of the case. They no doubt received kind and courteous treatment from Lord Elgin; but, admirable as his qualities were, it is obvious that it was not to them, but to the ships and armies which they supposed to lie behind them, that they really gave way. Talk about peace, commerce, civilisation, and the like, is plausible enough; but the practical application of the sermon—its convincing power—lies in a silent glance over the shoulder to the war steamers anchored in the bay or known to be within call. In short, what we called agreement to a treaty of commerce was in reality submission to superior force, and what we call breaches of the treaty were in substance partial, fretful, and ignorant attempts to shake off what the Japanese regarded and could not but regard as a foreign yoke forcibly laid on their necks.

"To these general considerations which apply to almost all our relations with Eastern powers, some others must be added which have a special application to Japan. In European diplomacy it may always be ascertained who is the sovereign, and who has a right to make treaties and bind the nation. No one would think of accepting a treaty with England signed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, nor would any one be content with the consent of the President of the United States, unless he acted with the approbation of the Senate. It is hardly possible to say, with respect to Japan, who is the proper person to make a treaty or what are the parties whose consent is required to make it valid. Even now, after the country has been opened for three years, in a sort of way, it is by no means clear what are the respective rights of the Mikado, or Spiritual Emperor; the Tycoon, whose technical position appears to be that of an officer appointed by the Mikado; the Council of the Daimios, and the individual Daimios themselves; some of whom, like our antagonist the Prince of Satsuma, are obviously very like independent potentates. This being so, it must be owned that from their own point of view the Japanese may very probably be right. For what we can tell, they may be under nothing which they would recognise as an obligation to allow of our presence in their territory at all; and this renders our position far more intricate than it was before. We do not know with whom we have made our bargain, with whom we are fighting, or with whom we are at peace."

The number is remarkably good, containing an unusual number of articles of weight and value, relieved by a couple of essays, one of which is signed by A. K. H. B., an instalment of "Late Laurels," and the conclusion of a translation of the Sanscrit "Story of Nala and Damayante," poetic and well versified.

Macmillan contains an article on "England's Neutrality from the Federal Point of View," by Professor Cairnes, as unreasoning, violent, and untruthful as might have been expected from a man whom no refutation can shame and no exposure deter from the repetition of statements proved to demonstration to be not only false but absurd. He rests his case on the argument "that a ship is an article of contraband which can be used from a neutral shore"; and as this is not true of a ship which leaves a neutral port unarmed, the utter worthlessness of all his reasoning is apparent from the outset. The "Competition Wallah" continues his Indian letters, and sends an amusing and instructive epistle "About the Hindoo Character, with Digressions Home." The Hindoo is not, what he is called by boys fresh from Europe, a "nigger"; but he has some of the negro vices in a higher degree than the African himself. He is inveterately lazy; he is an incurable thief; he is a shameless and conscienceless liar. Your servant may grow attached and loyal; perhaps he would die for you; but he will never cease to shirk his work, and he will rob you to the end of his days. As to the truth, no Hindoo ever dreams of speaking it so long as a plausible lie will serve his turn; and he bears false witness against his neighbour as readily in a matter of life and death as in the pettiest case of petty larceny.

"India is the country for those conscientious barristers who have doubts about the morality of advocating a cause which they believe to be unfounded. If Felix Graham came out here he would lead the bar within five years, and his pretty wife would be a charming addition to Calcutta society. He would be utterly unable to make out whether his client was the wronged or the wronger, guilty or not guilty. He might say to himself, 'We employ perjury, it is true, but the other side employ both perjury and forgery. We bring forward fifteen witnesses, who would not speak truth if they could, but the other side brings forward as many who could not speak truth if they would.' Last month, at Mofussilpore, I witnessed a case which came before Benson, and which he referred to Tom. A shopkeeper complained that, as he was walking across the street one of his neighbours fell on him, knocked him down with a cudgel, and, as he lay insensible on the ground, robbed him of thirteen rupees. He produced seven witnesses, who confirmed circumstantially his whole statement. It eventually turned out that the prisoner struck the prosecutor on the back with a light switch, and that the rupees and the insensibility were an episode which had no foundation in fact."

"The fire-arms in a planter's house are always in condition for immediate use; so the host loaded a rifle, and went out with one of his guests, while Mildred and the other remained among the soda-water bottles. After some time a shot was heard, and soon after the pair returned, pale and agitated. The master of the house said, 'Mildred, I believe I have shot a man, but we did not dare to go and look.' It appears they could not find the jackal; so, in the wantonness of men who were full of meat, and drink, and smoke, they took a shot at a sheep which was feeding about a furlong off. As the gun was fired, a man sprang up out of the grass behind the animal, and dropped again before he was well on his feet. Mildred went to the spot, and found a peasant stone dead, with a ball through the heart. Now for the sequel. The relations of the poor fellow prosecuted the planter for murder, and more—that he had tied the deceased to a tree, beaten him cruelly, outraged him in the most foul manner, and finally put him out of his misery by deliberately firing at him from the distance of a few yards. This vindictive, wicked lie was supported in every particular by a number of the villagers. The presence of his three countrymen, a happy chance, and nothing more, saved the prisoner from condemnation. 'From that day forward,' (such was the conclusion which Mildred drew from the circumstance) 'I resolved, if ever I was on a jury, never to convict a European of a capital crime on native testimony.'"

These anecdotes may suggest to some Abolitionest readers—and Macmillan has many of them—that there may be good reason in the rule of law which excludes the testimony of negroes in Southern courts of justice. Mr. Charles Kingsley contributes a review of Froude's "History of England;" in which he curses the Roman Catholics with all the fury of an Irish zealot and all the eloquence of bitter hate. When will Mr. Kingsley understand that when a gentleman reads this sort of rant his only feeling is one not very favourable to the writer; and that, when a man of education and a minister of the Gospel talks of Papists and Popery, and calls the faith of three-fourths of Christendom a lie, he only displays his own lack of the breeding of a gentleman and the temper of a Christian? As earnest Protestants, we protest against such language, as a reproach to Protestantism; as sincere Churchmen, we abhor it as utterly unworthy of an English clergyman. Let Mr. Kingsley leave this kind of language to men like Dean Close and Mr. Newman Hall; a Cambridge Professor should be able to argue in a Christian spirit, and to convey his strongest censures in language not unbefitting the lips of a gentleman. His brother does something to atone for this disreputable article by the very gentlemanly tone and feeling which pervades his charming Australian story, of which this number contains four chapters, ending with the thirteenth And Mr. Maurice, whose character and language afford a striking contrast to those of his friend the Rector of Eversley, contributes a quiet, thoughtful paper on Renan's "Vie de Jesus," containing no word unworthy of the Master in whose service—we will not say in whose defence—it is written.

The Cornhill contains one heavy article, on "Money and Money's Worth," not clear enough to impress us with confidence in the writer's mastery of his subject. This magazine is as famous for economical paradoxes as Macmillan for economical heresies. "Ulysses in Ogygia," by J. Noel Paton has some fine thoughts and some very feeble lines; on the whole it is not a bad specimen of the school of Tennyson. "Respecting Asses," one of the breed writes a great deal of nonsense that is less amusing than it ought to be. Nonsense, to be good, should have a disguised flavour of sense about it, and this has none. "Parliamentary committees" is a very readable caricature, which the author fails to pass off for a portrait. "Shylock in London" is a paper on usurers, which promises much and is very disappointing. Margaret Denzil goes on her way, and has been joined by another lady, entitled Cousin Phillis, of whose history the third part is here presented. "The Small House at Allington" has not yet shut its doors on our curiosity. There is a good, but somewhat ponderous paper on sermons, and one on "Yorkshire," which is rather too long. On the whole, we think this number of the Cornhill decidedly below its average, while most of the other magazines are above theirs.

Good Words is much what it has always been: sensible, quiet, and well-written, but not attractive. A magazine with a purpose is like a story with a moral: spoilt by the attempt to unite two incongruous aims. Nevertheless, there is much good reading between these brown paper covers; and if it be likely that people in general will skip the articles which are the speciality of this magazine, and for the sake whereof it was called into existence, nevertheless the writers of those articles have done their duty, and will find, no doubt, a certain number of appreciating readers. A sermon by Dr. Vaughan (we don't, of course, mean the notorious Independent preacher and writer, who has lately published an eulogy on the murderers of Strafford, but the eminent divine who refused the Bishopric of Rochester,) is always deserving of reverent attention, even though it be preached in a monthly periodical, and inserted between an historical essay and a romantic poem; and the essay and poem are also, in their way, worth reading. Still, we don't like the admixture, and we suspect that readers in general are of our mind.

London Society is true to its title and its original character; it is always pleasant reading, never becomes tedious, and never aspires to be instructive; and deserves its name by nothing more than by the skill which contrives to extract amusement from the scantiest materials. There is nothing in any of its stories; but they are all pretty, sparkling, and pleasant; its social sketches are good-humoured, well-bred, and novel; and its illustrations are admirable.

The St. James's Magazine contains nothing that calls for especial remark, except a particularly silly poem, signed "Isca," upon "Big Ben," of which the following verse is a specimen:—

> "Come first, great bells
> Of quarter knells
> In a lo la lo lu rhyme;
> Then clang clang clang
> With a mighty bang,
> Rings the anvil of old Time!"

NEGROES IN THE NORTH.—I declare that, of all the miserable and woe-begone objects I have ever beheld out of a Russian gaol or an Italian lazar-house, the free negroes I have seen in New York are the wretchedest and most forlorn. Take away those who are coachmen or body-servants in private families, and who are clad in some kind of decent livery by the employers; take away a proportion of mulattoes and "bright" coloured people, among which class the women are often given to tawdry finery in apparel, but seldom to personal cleanliness; take away a few, a very few old negroes, who have made money by storekeeping, and wear broadcloth and tall hats; and the residue is a listless, decrepit, drowsy, cowering race, always going to the wall, always sliding and slinking away, always ragged, always dirty—lying and pilfering and tipsifying themselves in a feckless, shambling kind of way—horribly overgrown children—cretins whose goitres are on their brains instead of in their throats. In the back slums of New York you meet them prowling about with baskets full of scraps and offal. When the police rout out some dilapidated tenement at the Five Points, they are sure to find negroes lurking and snoozling among the rubbish. Let a streak of sunshine be cast across the pavement, and you are sure to find a negro sitting on a doorstep, basking in the radiant warmth. The negroes of Washington are sturdier, comelier, more intelligent fellows. They are admirable waiters, and still more admirable barbers. At Baltimore the railway porters are athletic, active, and willing negroes. Only the day before yesterday they were slaves. Turn them loose in the blessed land of freedom, and see how long it will be before they hopelessly deteriorate.—New York Correspondence of the Daily Telegraph.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1864.

Independence and Recognition.

AT the commencement of a new year, marking the fourth year of the contest in America, and in view, moreover, of the coming session of Parliament, it does not seem out of place to pass in contemplation—not the accomplished acts of England in reference to the American war, nor the relations existing between England and the Confederate States—but the duties of the former and the rights of the latter Power. In other words, it seems advisable to take the opportunity of examining briefly some of the grounds on which we believe the Southern Confederacy to be entitled to a formal recognition from the Governments of Europe.

The President, in his Message to the Confederate Congress, stated that "by consent, the initiative in the matter of the war on the American continent had been conceded by the Powers of Europe to the two great maritime Powers, England and France." That view of the case is correct, and it may be taken for granted that recognition by England and France will be followed by recognition at the hands of all the smaller and the inland Powers. It may also be assumed that any action towards that end taken by England will receive the earnest co-operation of the French Emperor. It is clear, then, that the whole responsibility in the matter rests with England alone, that she is free to act, trammelled by no considerations but those of justice.

The independence of a State affords an irresistible claim to recognition. That is an axiom; but the whole difficulty of the question turns upon what constitutes independence, or rather, upon the nature and character of the independence. A people or a section of a people may rise in arms against the sovereign authority under which they were formerly held. By military or naval success they may free the country which they inhabit or claim from the presence of the forces and officers of the sovereign Power, thereby bringing about the practical cessation of hostilities on the part of the old State; they may consolidate their new State so as to be in a condition to maintain international relations with other countries; they may possess a Government acknowledged by the persons over whom it is set, and able to assume the reponsibility of their conduct towards the subjects of foreign Powers. A people which has fulfilled these conditions has a right to recognition. The Government which they have established may be of a character disapproved by foreign Powers; their institutions, their social organisation may be at variance with preconceived ideas; their policy may seem to be revolutionary or aggressive; yet they possess an independence, they constitute a sovereign State; they demand, and have a right to, recognition. If a definition were needed, such an independence may be defined as an independence de facto. It is a right recognised alike by publicists and statesmen, and is consecrated by the authority of precedents.

Now, it has been argued that the right of recognition can never arise unless all these conditions have been fulfilled; that the independence out of which the right of recognition springs cannot be of a character other than that defined. It has escaped notice that a distinction may, and must be, drawn between an independence de facto and an independence de jure; in other words that, provided all other conditions precedent have been fulfilled, cases may arise in which there may be a "waiver" of that condition which has reference to a cessation of hostilities.

With the exception, then, of this condition, does any fact exist negative of the independence of the Southern States? It is by no means difficult to conceive valid objections to a claim of this character. It may well be that in the people or the Government seeking the sovereign dignity, an absence of cohesive stability may prevail, likely to eventuate in the dissolution of their organisation and the annihilation of their autonomy. In such a case, the Powers which have conceded recognition might fairly deem themselves bound to cherish and support their foster-child. Such a contingency has been exemplified by the kingdom of Greece and the republic of Mexico; and it must be admitted that those results do not encourage similar experiments. On the other hand, history scarcely affords a single example of a people, who, in attempting to free themselves from another Power, have not jeopardised order and liberty within themselves. Yet the Southern States, though engaged against enormous odds in the most terrible struggle for existence, have so just a confidence in themselves, their Government, and their Constitution, that they have maintained unimpaired that perfect liberty of expression and action, which has hitherto been deemed possible only under Governments long established, and in periods of the most profound repose.

Again, the organisation of the new State, her laws, and her social institutions, may be considered destructive of civilisation, of society, and the rights and interests of the human race. Can it, however, be gravely contended that such a charge can be urged against a State, whose crime and misfortune it has been to adhere too devotedly to the laws, the maxims, and the principles, ordained and bequeathed by the great founders and vindicators of the Republic of the United States?

Again, the establishment of the new State may be subversive of the vested rights and interests of an old State; and that subversion may compromise the relative powers and positions of other sovereignties. The integrity of the kingdom of Denmark is a doctrine to which English statesmen stand committed. That integrity is by them held to be essential to the interests of Northern Europe, and on such a ground the recognition of Slesvig and Holstein may fairly be combated. But even the most devoted adherent of the Monroe Doctrine would not commit himself to the monstrous absurdity, that a mere section of the community, in whose favour the doctrine was held, could, as against the will of another section who had repudiated that doctrine, have a "vested right" to the submission to one Government of all the people between the Canadian frontier and the Gulf of Mexico. Moreover, the expression, "vested right" implies "dominion" over that in which the right is claimed; but even if the dominion of the Union over its members were assumed, the dominion of one section of the Union over another section would not follow; for the dominion would cease with the dissolution of that which alone gave it existence.

There remains but one, and that perhaps the most formidable objection, to a claim to an independence de jure, and that is, the hopelessness of the enterprise of the new State. At this very moment multitudes of men in Western Europe hold that the Poles have a just claim to be free. At the same time, the general opinion is that their cause is hopeless. Indeed, it is admitted that the contest is maintained in the expectation of foreign aid, and would be abandoned with the abandonment of that hope. If this were true with regard to the Confederate States, if the verdict of public opinion pronounced their resistance hopeless, there would be a definitive bar to their claim. There must be a reasonable expectation, a judgment based on that degree of certainty upon which the actions of ordinary life proceed, of the ability of the South, not to crush the North, not to reduce the North to the loss of the last man and the last ship, to the expenditure of the last dollar and the capture of the last gun, but to withstand the attempts of the North to subjugate the South. On that issue we appeal confidently to the enlightened classes of England, to the opinion of military men, to the facts of the last two years. The Emperor of the French has told the Government at Washington that subjugation is impossible. That is the opinion of the princes of the House of Orleans. It is the opinion of the able English soldier who has recently visited the seat of war. No Northern general has pronounced the task feasible. General Scott never believed it so. Mr. Lincoln's language as to his own plan of warfare proves that he has no such expectation. There is only one man in office who has prophesied such a result, and the value of his prophecies has long ago been ascertained. By an expenditure of more than £300,000,000 sterling, and the waste of more than 1,000,000 lives, the North holds New Orleans and has penetrated to Chattanooga.

Now the distinction which we have drawn between a claim arising from an independence de facto and one arising from an independence de jure is not a fancy of rhetoric or a subtlety of pleading. On the contrary, it has its root in the foundation of the whole moral code of human actions. It is based on the distinction between "might and right." Of course, if it is affirmed that political ethics have no existence—a proposition which involves the negation of private ethics—our argument goes for nought. We assume that in the political world there may be "right" as distinguished from "wrong," and then that "right" may exist without "might," and that "wrong" may coexist with "might." These are propositions to be assumed, not to be argued. Yet, strangely enough, the theory of an independence de facto as the only admissible kind of independence, is a denial of the second and the most important of these axioms. That an indefeasible claim to independence may arise by sheer "might" is admitted. But it has been contended that it can arise in no other way. In other words, "brute force" has been substituted for "justice and right," and the extravagant theories of the Vox populi vox Dei, and of the irresponsible will of the majority, have been outdone. Yet the whole fabric of the argument against the recognition of the South rests on this foundation. Its corner-stone is a denial of the possibility of "right" in the absence of "might." It is stamped with the same characteristics as the theory of arbitrary power, and argues a similar kind of moral obliquity.

We have, then, considered the objections that may be urged against the claim of the Confederate States to independence. On the affirmative reasoning it is not necessary to dwell at any length. It will be enough to take a definition of a State to show how completely the South has fulfilled all conditions. For this purpose the language of the Queen's Advocate may be cited. "A State," he says, "may be defined to be a people permanently occupying a fixed territory, certam sedem, bound together by common laws and customs into one body politic, exercising, through the medium of an organised Government, independent sovereignty and control over all persons and things within its boundaries, capable of making war and peace, and of entering into all international relations with the other communities of the globe." It seems impossible to find a particular in which the Confederate States have not fulfilled the obligations of this definition. We say, then, that where a new State has placed herself in a position in respect of other communities in no way distinguishable from the position occupied by an old State, when it has all the attributes and characteristics of an old State, when there is no [illegible] inability to maintain its independence, [illegible] the mere fact that it is waging a war [illegible] with another Power, [illegible] as might be done by [illegible] claim to the recognition by neutral States of its independence, [illegible] an old State [illegible]

But it is [illegible] people have revolted against the [illegible] Power, it is [illegible] States. [illegible] was no [illegible] Power. [illegible] spring from a [illegible] terminology, [illegible] dangerous in political science. What can be more [illegible] than to speak of the Confederate States as "rebels," or "insurgents"? Against whom have they rebelled? [illegible] States, [illegible] special purposes and on special conditions, [illegible] nominated [illegible] because the special purposes had been frustrated and the special conditions broken. The North consummated a revolution. It [illegible] a geographical section, and thereby annihilated the fundamental principle of the Union. Having then formed itself into a homogeneous mass, it sought to usurp dominion over another geographical section. Its primary action created at least two Powers. It never pretended to be other than revolutionary, for it declared that the Union must be [illegible] in obedience to the "higher law." The South clung to the Constitution, and sought protection under it. It was driven out and forced into being a separate State and a hostile Power.

But it has been argued that foreign Governments are bound to recognise the United States as an entity—that they have always had relations with a Government having its seat at Washington and speaking in the name of the entire community. By the principles of the common law, the judges in Westminster Hall take notice of the Constitution of foreign States, and à fortiori must the Ministers of the Crown do so. Instances, too, such as the ratification of the Ashburton Treaty by the State of Maine, have occurred, in which the independent sovereign character of the several individual States of the Union has been recognised. If this view be sound how can it be held that it is the duty of England to consider eleven of such States rebels against the remainder? But the Union is set up as an existent tangible entity, and it is said that against that there is a rebellion. If this were so, then most certainly the termination of the rebellion in favour of the supposed Union would have the effect of restoring the Union and its component elements to its former condition. Is that possible? How can the old Union exist when its Constitution is dead? and how can the Constitution be other than dead when every guarantee and every provision that distinguished it is annihilated? It is idle to talk of restoration. The North avows its intention to destroy, not to repair; to subjugate the South as a geographical territory, not to readmit it into that dead Union which the North has neither the power nor the wish to resuscitate.

This much, then, we have endeavoured to show: First, that the South has fulfilled every condition precedent to her claim to recognition as an independent sovereign State, according to the rules laid down by the strongest opponents of her demand, with the single exception of the condition of the cessation of hostilities. Second, that to exact the performance of the excepted condition is to confound two great and distinctive principles, which have their foundation in the primary distinctions of "right" and "wrong." Third, that there can be a just claim to an independence though the excepted condition has not been fulfilled, and that the South has made good that claim. Fourth, that in respect of hostile efforts against the new State, the power to maintain its independence, not the cease of efforts to subdue it, is the true condition of recognition. Fifth, that in respect of this condition the South has an [illegible] passed [illegible] in the [illegible] a [illegible] Power [illegible]

Having [illegible] our argument on the question of "right," we [illegible] word on the [illegible] a case where it is [illegible] or a State that [illegible] the [illegible]

Is it nothing for the [illegible] that a [illegible] should be [illegible] North [illegible] American [illegible] system [illegible] the [illegible] not the [illegible] of the world [illegible] peace? It is a remark true and [illegible] the productions of the Southern States [illegible] the moral and physical well-being of [illegible] none are prejudicial to him. To England [illegible] only serves to prove, if proof were [illegible], how enduring is the blow inflicted on her [illegible] prosperity, how utterly and disastrously all efforts have failed to supplement the [illegible] by the American war.

So then, our interests and the interests of the world coincide with the dictates of law, justice, and humanity. The feeling of the [illegible] and educated classes of England agrees with these considerations. The [illegible] of France agrees with them. The English Ministry is alone unmoved. But we anticipate with confidence the meeting of the English Parliament, for the cause of the South courts and profits by discussion. An appeal will be made to the [illegible] for that justice which is refused by a minister.

A Method of meeting Southern Engagements.

Political Economy is, unfortunately, like [illegible] medicine, a science which is [illegible] understood only by a few experts, and these are too prone to abuse their monopoly in a manner which would be utterly impossible if society at large had ever taken the trouble to understand the very [illegible] framework on which their monstrous propositions are based. Mad doctors—as they are vulgarly called, with a disregard of grammar which does not involve a corresponding departure from accuracy of description—will talk the wildest nonsense in courts of justice, because they know that the jurymen have never given any attention to the subject of their studies; whereas, if these had but mastered so much as the legal definition of insanity, they would at once discern the utter futility of all these pseudo-medical theories advanced to give impunity to murder, and undermine the foundations of morality. Certain political economists play a similar part in the House of Commons and elsewhere. Their jargon of free trade is like that of the experts in lunacy: very perplexing to [illegible]

[illegible] of "Leave trade to its natural course." [illegible] by a contest between foreign traders and a foreign enemy, or by the national government.

It is of no advantage to the Confederacy that [illegible] British subjects [illegible] profits by a peculiar trade. These profits are not the result of mutual gain, [illegible] They are not the [illegible] Confederate States for the benefit of strangers. [illegible] Confederacy. [illegible] The Index [illegible] of the Confederacy [illegible] A speculative trade of the worst kind has been forced into activity, a description of which is given in emphatic terms by the Richmond correspondent of the Times:—

Go this day to the great auction sale of blockade-running goods exhibited by Messrs. Kent and Paine, in the principal street of Richmond, take note of the army of young and able-bodied men who might, if they were men and not sharks, swell Lee's host to 100,000 bayonets, and who are engaged in scrambling over each other's backs to buy silks and muslins, and to invest some of the Confederate notes which they have in two years and a half of unscrupulous greed amassed, in materials and fabrics which, whether the Confederates sink or swim, must still command gold.

And discontent, bitter but not unnatural, is fostered by the spectacle of luxuries for the rich introduced into a country where all except the rich have much ado to live. What business have the ladies of the South, just now, with silks and muslins? What have her rich men to do with champagne and Chateau Lafitte? It is not with such things as these that blockade-running ships should be laden; it is not on such things that Southern money should be spent. Better that no cargo at all should enter the port than such cargoes as these. Yet these are the cargoes that pay the importer best; and, therefore, while the importation remains in private hands, these are the cargoes of which there will be the greatest abundance. If the Confederacy wants cloth, shoes, powder, it must purchase them itself in England, and provide on its own account for their transportation.

The export trade also works ill for the country. It tends in some measure to divert labour from the articles of which the nation has need to those which exporters will buy. It enhances abnormally the value of gold, to the great injury of the public interests. And if it does a little to benefit individuals by raising the price of cotton—and it does very little in this way—it does a far greater injury to the Administration and to the Confederacy at large by sending down the price of Confederate bonds which depend on cotton for their value. At present, a man may send over gold or goods, and purchase cotton at less than threepence per pound. Naturally, therefore, the bonds are, for those who wish to purchase cotton with them, worth no higher price than they need pay in gold or goods for cotton. And further, the effect of this trade on the value of exchange tells terribly against the blockaded country. Every cargo landed in the Confederate States enhances their debt to England, and diminishes the value of that with which the Government must meet its current obligations in England; while cargoes exported on private account fail to balance this debt, and redound chiefly, if not entirely, to the profit of the exporter.

For the sake, therefore, of its credit at home and abroad; for the sake of its finances; in justice to the poorer citizens, and to its foreign creditors, it does seem that the Government of the Confederate States would do wisely to take the control of the foreign trade into its own hands, and put a stop to all private exportation of cotton, except in payment of State bonds. It is not difficult to raise objections to such a policy; but they are all objections based on principles applicable to a normal, and not to an utterly abnormal, national condition. It is affirmed that a Government can never carry on trade so lucratively as private individuals. The answer is, that this is true of a time of peace; though even in time of peace the English Government, among others, carries on a lucrative and enormous business as letter-carrier, yielding millions to its revenue. But in the present condition of the Confederate States, trade has ceased to be trade; it is a part of the belligerent operations of the country, and partakes so much of the character of naval warfare that it may well be placed under Government control. Nations do not victual their camps by private agency; and it is not unfair to consider the South as one great camp, and the blockade-runners as—if their function were properly performed—the agents who supply it with food and clothing. It may be said that the Confederate Government would have to find capital to carry on this trade, which it could ill spare. The answer is, that practically it does find the capital, but does not receive the profits. And if, finally, it be urged that even in time of war finance should not be made to serve the purpose of sumptuary laws, it may be replied that the dealers in luxuries should be free to import them, under such duties as a Government in extreme need may levy on luxuries, but that they shall not be paid for out of a fund required for national purposes, to wit, the cotton stores of the South.

Those stores are worth, in England, more than one hundred millions sterling; in the Confederacy, they are worth about one-twelfth of that amount. It is evident, therefore, that if the Government can pay for whatever purchases it wishes to make in England with cotton at present prices, it can make them with infinite advantage to itself and the country; and there is no violation of any rule of theoretic or practical economy in its so doing. There are three interests to be considered: those of the Confederacy, those of its creditors, and those of the cotton owners; and the problem is, how to advance the first to the utmost while doing full justice to the two latter.

The holders of the cotton bonds would of course be exempt from any embargo on cotton; and such an embargo would at once relieve them from the present competition they undergo from purchasers in the open market, who can now obtain cotton at from 2¼d. to 3d. a pound. And, so long as the Confederate Government fulfils its bargain with them, and does not—which of course it will not—deliver cotton to others on better terms than to them, they will have nothing to complain of because it does sell cotton. Of course, no measures must be taken inconsistent with their right to receive every facility for the export of such cotton as they may choose to demand in payment of their bonds; but, with this proviso, they cannot claim any right to interfere with or remonstrate against any steps which it may deem expedient. Indeed, their interests will be greatly served by an embargo, which will render their bonds the only means of obtaining cotton for less than the Liverpool market rate. This, in itself, would tend immediately to raise the value of their stock; and as it would speedily be followed by a greatly increased confidence in the financial strength of the Confederate Government, it would not improbably result, within a few months, in bringing the bonds back to the rate of issue.

The owners of cotton in the South must not be wronged. There may be cases of absolute necessity which justify spoliation, as there are cases which justify the devastation of territory, without compensation, in the face of an invading foe. But no such necessity now exists; and, in its absence, the spoliation of one class of property-holders—the imposition on them of great pecuniary sacrifices not exacted from others—is not permissible. Now, an embargo on cotton would annihilate its value in the Southern States, and amount to a robbery of its owners. These, therefore, must be compensated; Government must take upon itself the risk and loss that would otherwise fall on them, so far as that risk and loss are occasioned solely by its own act. It is not bound to do more than this. It is not bound to purchase cotton wherever it may be and however ill it may be stored; but it must offer such terms as will prevent any real wrong being done to them.

Now, to purchase the whole cotton crop, wherever that may be, would be to confer a favour on the holders at the expense of the community, and to deprive them of all inducement to vigilance in the custody of a property no longer their own. On the other hand, to purchase only what the Government wants and as it wants, and to lay an embargo on the rest, would be a measure of wholesale confiscation. And in any case it is plain that the purchase cannot be made with money, metallic or paper; for the former is not to be had, and to issue the latter in sufficient quantities would be to reduce it to the value of assignats.

While waiting with some anxiety to learn what the Confederate Government will actually propose, one plan is suggested at once by the considerations above detailed. If the Confederate Government were to lay an embargo on all cotton, excepting only such as might be exported by itself or in payment of its bonds; if it were to offer the present market price for all cotton to be handed over to it in a specified condition at certain places named or to be named by itself; and if it were, further, to take powers to purchase at that price all cotton it thought proper to require—it would accomplish all that appears to be necessary, and obviate every objection that has been alleged. It would be necessary to pay not in currency, but in bonds at a fair rate; say in eight per cent. stock at the market price. Thus no one would be wronged; and yet the Confederate Government would obtain possession of a means of payment worth twelve times as much in England as in the Confederate States—would obtain, in fact, a means of discharging its liabilities here much more cheaply than it could do in time of peace.

It might be found necessary, also, to lay an embargo on bullion, for the sake of maintaining the power of paying interest on the debt in coin, and thus preserving the credit of the Government and the value of its paper. In this case, as it would be difficult for the blockade runners to obtain a return cargo, the Government might not improbably be forced to take the whole foreign trade of the country, or nearly the whole, into its own hands; and it would do it, probably, with much more efficiency, and to much greater national advantage, than is done at present.

Hitherto, as was remarked in THE INDEX last week, 130,000 bales of cotton have been run through the blockade in the course of a year. The Government could afford to work more energetically, and to run greater risks. Suppose it to export 400,000 bales per annum, and to land 200,000 in Liverpool. This would give it (at 2s. per lb., or £45 per bale of 450lbs.) £9,000,000 a year in England—a sum sufficient to pay off all obligations which the owners might wish redeemed in money here rather than in cotton in America, and to meet all its European expenses; adding meantime only £1,600,000 a year to the capital of its domestic debt. And suppose it to purchase in all 2,000,000 bales at the present market price of the South, to export 800,000, landing 400,000 in Liverpool, and to have on hand at the end of the war 1,200,000, the account would stand thus:—

Debt incurred, at £4 per bale....	8,000,000	Value received in England	18,000,000
Interest for 2 yrs. at 8 per cent...	1,280,000	Value of Stock on hand at 1s. per lb., £22 10s. per bale (it would not be less on conclusion of peace)	27,000,000
	£9,280,000		£45,000,000

Leaving a gain of £33,722,000, or more than 370 per cent.—an ample margin to cover all losses incurred by fire and accident, by hostile inroads, and by the vast enhancement in value of the currency in which the Confederate debt is computed, which must follow the attainment of peace.

It can hardly be doubted, with such advantages in prospect, that the Confederate Government will follow the advice of Mr. McRae in laying an embargo on cotton; or that the Congress will assist and support it in the measures which may be requisite to carry that measure into complete and successful operation.

The Federal Gains in the Past Year.

AT the close of the third year of the war in America, waged, not for the redress of a real or imaginary wrong, the rectification of a frontier, or the succession to a throne, but for the avowed purpose of subjugating a territory larger than half Europe, it may be interesting to examine the real progress that has been made during the past twelve months towards the accomplishment of that aim, and the data it furnishes for calculating the day of Mr. Lincoln's final triumph. Most great men have identified themselves in their time with their national struggles in the hour of revolution. A speech which has had the effect of an inspiration, an act which has saved the Commonwealth, a resolve which has made a people wonder—something of this kind is associated with the memory of every leader of a popular cause. What is it that will hand down President Lincoln's name to a grateful posterity? We must leave it to the Yankees to decide. But there is one of his sayings which so completely historicizes the war from a Northern point of view, and which so aptly illustrates the blind brute-force strategy of General Halleck, that we venture to adopt it, as the most thoroughly expressive and characteristic description of the conduct of the war. It is "pegging away"—that is President Lincoln's "idea." No matter at what cost of life or treasure, no matter how long the struggle may last, if the North will only "keep on pegging away," some day the Union will be restored. Well, during the last year there is no doubt the North has "kept on pegging away" with marvellous vigour. During the whole twelve months there has scarcely been a slack day. Not a month has passed but has brought us its tidings of great battles, ended or imminent, and of tremendous expeditions, each big with the fate of a territory large enough to maintain a distinct and powerful European nationality. Some £150,000,000 sterling have been added to the debt of the United States, some 250,000 soldiers have been lost to the Northern army by battle, disease and desertion. New York has been in flames and in the power of an angry mob. The cities of Pennsylvania have stirred to the tread of Confederate soldiery. Every constitutional right of which Americans boasted has vanished, and a more helpless and down-trodden race of men than the citizens of the United States the world does not exhibit. Still they pride themselves, with their President, on "pegging away," and now that we have to some extent counted the cost, we may try and discover the results.

Now these must be looked for territorially. The one object of the war is territory. Let us see how far 1863 has satisfied the North in this respect. We will begin with Virginia. Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg may be counted into the Virginian campaign within the year. In January, 1863, Burnside occupied the northern bank of the Rappahannock opposite Fredericksburg, with Acquia Creek as his depot of supplies. The Confederates had not a troop of guerillas north of the Federal cantonments at Falmouth. In January, 1864, Meade has gone into winter-quarters much further North, and Confederate guerillas are

THE CAUSES OF THE AMERICAN WAR

BY A. T. BLEDSOE, LL.D., PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

No. 6

When I began, many years ago to study the causes of the American war, it appeared to me most strange, as that subject lay most upon the surface and was most sought after and heard of in words," was the chief reason of them. But this was a great mistake; a most limited, partial, and superficial view of the subject.

The Estate of the country existed, indeed, a much older fact than that which existed in the subject of slavery, even older than the Constitution of the United States itself, and which had repeatedly threatened the dissolution of the Union. This was the fact between the two great sections of the late Union, which were called then as now, the North and the South. In the Convention of 1787, by which the Constitution was formed, James Madison, its most illustrious member, declared that the great necessity to be settled, the great conflict of interests and passions and prejudices to be adjusted, was that which existed, not between the large and the small States, but between the Northern and Southern portions of the Union. This sentiment was uttered by him, and by other members of the convention, at the very time that the struggle between the large and the small States had brought the Union to the verge of dissolution, and almost entirely extinguished all hope of its longer continuance. And the whole history of the country, from that day to this, has only served to verify this opinion, an opinion which was, therefore, far more deeply felt, and far more earnestly uttered by George Mason and Patrick Henry than by Madison himself. For although "the father of the Constitution," as Mr. Madison has been called, felt this antagonism of the two sections to be the great difficulty in the way of the convention, he firmly hoped that it had been successfully and permanently settled by the new Constitution; whereas Mason and Henry both confidently predicted that it would break out afresh, and sooner or later, work the dissolution of the Union itself. George Mason, in particular, expressly predicted, that it was in the nature of man for the larger portion of the Union to secure to itself all the advantages of the new Government to itself, and to do an injustice to the smaller portion, with whom it would have no sympathy—a prediction which has been most exactly verified by the unequally and fluctuated sections. Madison may have been, and doubtless was, the idolater of the age and country, Mason and Henry were certainly its cool and prudent.

The same history also reveals to the just time and manner in which the quarrel about slavery was drawn out, and assumed subservient to, the great struggle of sections, among the slavery was, for the most part, was one of the subordinate causes, or rather occasions, of the more important one in Union—one of the many apples of discord in the great element for political power by which the conflict was sharpened and the angry passions aroused. If we look for the real cause of this conflict, we shall find that it is to be found in something other. We shall find, indeed, that its causes lie as deep as the foundation of human nature itself, and that its consequences are as wide as the interests of humanity.

The history of the world may be summed up in two great facts: namely, in the struggle of one portion of mankind to rule over and oppress the other, and in the struggle of the other to maintain its independence. Precisely such has been method, like the French infidels of the eighteenth century, for the regeneration of mankind. On the contrary, they reject and repudiate all such pestilential nostrums, all such whirlwinds of doctrine, all such panaceas in politics. They oppose them as vehemently as they were opposed by Edmund Burke, or by the great nation in whose behalf Burke poured forth his floods of eloquence and the vast stores of his wonderful wisdom.

It was thus, and not otherwise, that the great struggles of sections deepened into a conflict between freedom and fanaticism, between liberty and license, between social order and social chaos, between the powers of light and the powers of darkness. It was thus, that in the conflict between the two sections the North and the South were separated, and ranged on different sides in the great struggle which embraces and divides the universe. If the South had possessed the numerical majority, she would, in all probability, have sought to rule over and oppress the North. For as Aristotle said more than 2,000 years ago, and as all history has shown, "The weak always desire what is equal and just; but the powerful pay no regard to it."* Hence the people of the South have reason to be most profoundly thankful for their present lot, however sad and deplorable; since under the administration of an almighty and righteous God, it is infinitely better to be the victims than the authors of oppression.

The South was most distinctly and solemnly forewarned, by the Sewards, and the Wilsons, and the Hodges of the North, that, if she should dare to withdraw from her implacable enemies she could not be "let alone." On the contrary, she was assured that all the nations of the Christian world, in imitation of John Brown, would rush upon her in one raid of universal hate, and sweep her from existence. The Yankee nation is, however, the only one which has thus far attempted to fulfil the prediction of its prophets. For this Christian nation has, in imitation of John Brown, endeavoured to stir up a servile insurrection, and subject all ages and all sexes to the indiscriminate slaughter and brutality of a race no better than themselves. No design so horrible was ever conceived by the most ferocious Jacobins during the most furious period of the French revolution. The Massacre of St. Domingo, it is true, followed the proclamation of emancipation by the French Assembly; but this formed no part of the design of its authors, and never entered into the imagination of its prophets. But the Government at Washington, failing in the accomplishment of its dire purpose of subjection by the usual means of civilised warfare, has aimed to stir up a servile insurrection, and instigate another massacre of St. Domingo on a still more stupendous and awful scale.

But while the nations of the Christian world have not joined the North in its raid on the South, they have given far more aid and comfort to the strong than to the weak—to the mighty North struggling for empire and despotic sway, than to the South struggling for independence and peace. The South stands to-day, and she stands alone, in the Thermopylæ of the universe; pleading, as best she may, the great cause of freedom and humanity—pleading the great cause of freedom against fanaticism, and the great cause of humanity against outrages which, in the words of an English statesman,† "Christian times have seen nothing to equal, and at which the whole world stands aghast almost to incredulity." "Go, tell the Spartans we lie here in obedience to her laws," are, as every one knows, the imperishable words on the tomb of Leonidas and his small band of heroes. Be this, then, the inscription on the tombs and monuments of Southern heroes: "Go, tell the Christian world we lie here in obedience to her principles and laws;" and this will be their sublime revenge—this simple record of their injuries and wrongs.

PRIVATEERS CONDEMNED AS FELONS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, November 15th, 1863.

SIR,—I beg to direct, through the columns of your journal, the action of the Confederate Government to a case which requires their attention, lest, for want of prompt application of the lex talionis, cruel and irreparable injustice be done to three unfortunate gentlemen.

You will remember the seizure, on suspicion of being a Confederate privateer, by the authorities of the United States in this harbour, of the schooner J. M. Chapman. For a full account of the trial you are referred to the Weekly Bulletin of 17th October, and the other daily and weekly papers of San Francisco, of that date. It appears that the chief, or rather the only conclusive evidence, against the vessel was a "letter of marque and reprisals" from President Davis, which was found on board. In consequence, the vessel was condemned by the United States Circuit Court, and of the persons implicated in her equipment, three, Mr. Greathouse (formerly a banker at Yreka City, Siskyon county,) Mr. Harpending, and Mr. Rubery (the latter an Englishman) being found guilty of high treason against the United States, were sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary and a fine o $10,000 each. A fourth, Mr. Baldwin (a son of Judge Baldwin), made good his escape.

This terrible sentence is about to be carried into effect, and the fate of these unfortunates will, in all probability, remain unnoticed, unless their friends succeed, by your aid, in evo ing the energetic interposition of the Confederate Government.

Yours anxiously,

A FRIEND.

YANKEE VESSELS UNDER THE ENGLISH FLAG.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—When so much is said of English neutrality and the points of law involved in the Alexandra case, it may not be out of place to call attention to laws which are daily and in the most systematic manner infringed or evaded, to the great advantage of one of the American belligerents, and the serious detriment of the other.

American vessels are being registered by wholesale under the English flag, and our customs officers are instructed not to be too particular in their inquiries, when the declarations of ownership are to be signed. American captains pass our Mercantile Board, so as to obtain the certificate necessary to command these vessels. The ownership, the command, the character of the vessel thus remains unchanged; only by a mockery of forms, which is connived at and even encouraged by intimations from the highest authorities, we lend our flag to the Yankees to protect them from Captain Semmes and his colleagues.

Accordingly, the Stars and Stripes are rapidly disappearing from the high seas, though the trade which it now no longer covers goes on as prosperously as ever, and Brother Jonathan chuckles over his keenness in not only outwitting the Confederate cruisers, but also the simple-minded and credulous John Bulls. For you will not fail to observe that while we are doing a grave injustice to one of the belligerents, we are not the less injuring the interests of our own shipowners, underwriters, and public at large. The trade which our lovingkindness for the Yankees thus screens from the risks of war, would, by a more rigid and impartial enforcement of our laws, have been shared by bonâ fide British bottoms, instead of Yankees in disguise. The shipping interest of this country, by an unwarrantable invasion, is defrauded of the legitimate advantages belonging to neutral commerce, the slightest of which is the difference in the premium of insurance.

The question which I wish to bring under your consideration is not, whether the Government will remedy an abuse which is too much consistent with the "warm neutrality" of the Foreign-office not to be intentionally permitted, but whether the British Government will protect, in event of seizure by a Confederate cruiser, the owners and freighters of the disguised vessel against palpable evidence of fraud in her assumed character? I know that the Confederates are closely watching the ships which have changed flags, and the question is therefore very likely to arise practically. The vessels themselves are easily known in their disguise. As the laws of the United States do not permit the registration of foreign-built ships, the build, unless there has been really a bonâ fide sale to an English subject, will go far as primâ facie evidence. Again, vessels of this sort are generally insured in America, and no English shipowner ever insures his vessels in America.

This last circumstance, alone, should make the mercantile public cautious on what vessels they entrust their goods; lest, in shipping under an English flag, they find that the responsible parties in case of average, bottomry or the various marine casualties, can only be reached through Mr. Lincoln's courts. And underwriters who take lines on the cargo should be well satisfied that the vessel also is insured in England.

I have only to add, that among the ports where the nefarious practice to which I call your attention, is chiefly carried on, Bristol holds a conspicuous place.

Respectfully yours,

A CITY MERCHANT.

BUTLER'S RULE IN NORFOLK.

THE following extract from the letter of a sufferer of Butler's infamous and cowardly warfare on women and children, needs no comments. It is addressed to a lady friend in Europe:—

NORFOLK, December 15.

I have had a struggle before I could make up my mind to inflict our deep and desperate sorrow and sadness upon you. You have great cause to rejoice evermore that you are out of this degraded down-trodden city. Volumes could hardly tell you the miseries and indignities which that fiend Butler has heaped upon our stricken people. To be defeated in fair fight we can endure, but to be overcome by petty tyranny and abject cowardice is more than flesh can bear. He is making war on women and children, and the few men that are left in the town are mostly non-combatants. His orders are pictures of his brute nature. On Friday he issued his orders for the whole population to take the oath or be prisoners of war. Another order is, that where a family is not large enough to occupy the whole house, though it belongs to the occupants, any negroes can move in and take possession of the vacant rooms, and there is no redress against the indignity. He only professes to protect us from actual personal violence, but he takes care not to know who commits personal violence. The negroes and soldiers are allowed to come into your house at all hours, take anything, and commit any outrage they please. Every pulpit and school is closed. All means of living are suspended. Only day labour is allowed. Everyone from the country has to take a pass to come into town and to go out, each way, paying a $1.00 for it, and this pass can only be got with the oath. Within one mile from the town you are subject to four different searches from negro patrols, and their acts are so atrocious that females cannot go beyond the city limits. The few families in the neighbourhood have found it safer to move into town, bad as that is. It is forbidden to sell land or other property, or to give it away. To hide any article is a penal offence. In fact, the only thing that is not forbidden to do is to steal, and of this permission his black and white minions avail themselves freely. But I am surprised that he allows others to follow his trade; it must be that he has gorged as much as he can swallow, or that the spoils of our poor town are not worth his monopolising. Did you ever conceive of such an unmitigated villain!

To-day was the last day of grace allowed for taking the oath, or go to prison, and have everything confiscated. The fiend thought that all would refuse, and he might imprison the men, and either send the women and children into the already overburdened Confederacy, or leave them to the tender mercy of his blacks. For even what he calls protection from their outrages, we can only get on condition of being loyal. In most fearful cases of wrong, otherwise, we are told, that the United States Government can only protect its own citizens, and rebels must go to their own Government for redress or protection. On Saturday a few of the principal old men had a meeting, very secretly of course, and decided to take the accursed oath, as not to do so would be playing into the hands of these wretches. Accordingly, the crowd of oath-takers, mostly women, was like a hotly-contested election, and Barnes had to telegraph to Butler at Fortress Monroe to extend the time. Some still say they will die and rot before taking it, but all will have to come to it at last. —— says he will not; I have never seen him so sad; he lies awake all night, and looks twenty years older since you saw him. If my taking the oath would save my husband's doing so, I could resign myself to it though it would almost kill me. If I could put the torch to all we have, and keep the scoundrels from getting it, I would do it. If I could get away without taking it, I would leave home and all behind until better days. Oh, you ought to rejoice that you are not here; and however much I miss you and long for you, I would not bring you into our misery, if I had a magician's wand. I never dreamed of such sorrow; I never thought that such could come upon us. To think that it is the will of God makes one shudder, and there are times when my heart hardens even in prayer. God forgive me!

I cannot tell you half the horrors of our situation. The negroes, headed by free negroes from the North, had a meeting the other day in their church, and openly debated the expediency of a general massacre. It was postponed, but from certain mysterious movements, we fear that they will make some demonstrations between Christmas and New-Year's-day. Many ladies, for fear of this, have taken the oath, who would not have been induced by any other consideration, and have entreated individually for protection or leave to go away The renegades fare no better than those who face the danger.——who pretended to be a Union man, was made to help building the gallows for poor Dr. W. He was seen to do t before daylight, and therefore cannot deny it. He says he was forced by threats. So to pretend what you do not feel does not save you from insult or degradation. Mrs. —— had to give a sworn certificate that her husband was on the point of death, or else she and her eight children, one only two months old, would have been turned into the streets, to make a negro barracks of her house. After the oath we shall, if possible, be even worse off. Military law will make quick work with those who are accused of "breaking" it. No male is permitted to leave the place, even after taking the oath, until the draft is made; and what few able-bodied men the conscription may find among us will be made "Union" soldiers of, to fight their brothers or sons in the Southern army. I do not pity them, if there are any, who have not gone to help driving these devils in human shape from our homes.

CAPTAIN SPEKE'S JOURNAL.*

TRAVELLERS have well nigh exhausted the New World, as well as the Old. The interior of South America is more familiar to us than was that of Turkey or Russia to our great grandfathers. Egypt is a regular part of the grand tour, and we should no more expect to find anything new in a journal kept during a voyage from Alexandria to Khartoum than in the letters of a visitor to Paris or Vienna. The treaty which opened Japan to European curiosity produced a wonderfully abundant crop of literature in a marvellously short space of time; and it would be easy, we presume, without stirring from the library fireside, to make a journey along the whole coast of China. There are very few fields open to the traveller who desires to find untrodden ground, or to the sportsman in search of game not already frightened by European guns. The steppes of Asia have been traversed and mapped out, and no one cares to hear anything about a country which produces nothing but savages and their herds, and periodically starves even these to the verge of extermination. Mucq remains to be learnt about India, but it is not within the function of travellers to teach SUBSTITUTES IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.—MR. Sparrow from the Military Committee, reported back the following Bill to the Confederate Senate, with the recommendation that it pass :—" The Congress of the Confederate States do enact that no person liable to the military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service, nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted or enrolled in the military service of the Confederate States; and that all laws heretofore passed permitting or allowing persons liable to military service to furnish substitutes for the same, or authorising the acceptance, enlistment or enrollment of any such substitute in the military service, be and the same are hereby repealed." Mr. Wigfall moved to strike out the last clause of the bill, which, being rejected the Bill was passed and sent to the House.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Jan. 6.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THE Bank official minimum continues 7 per cent. and the rate out of doors among the brokers is 6¾ to ⅞ per cent. In the discount department at the Bank, there has been very little business and the average demand appears to be slightly decreasing. Still, until the payment of the dividends shall have been arranged, and the public shall have ascertained the effect of the railway deposits, it is not likely there will be any important change in the appearance of the general money market. In the course of the next few days the influence of these payments will have in a great degree been felt, and it seems to be imagined that if no untoward result then arises we may look for a temporary ease. Afterwards, it is feared, if the desire to push public companies is further developed, there will be a strain upon the supply of capital, which may every now and then prove inconvenient. Affairs will probably for the present continue in a quiescent state, and much will depend upon the issue of the present struggle in Slesvig-Holstein. The discount brokers are working quietly and cautiously, because they wish to see the spring well advanced before they release their resources. The terms for money on the Stock Exchange have been comparatively full—say 5½ to 6 per cent., owing to the adjustment of the monthly accounts in Consols. This afternoon the rates were slightly easier, 5 to 5½ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion and specie movements this week have been only on a limited scale, the amount of gold sent into the Bank being only £61,000, against a withdrawal of £45,000 for transmission abroad. Most of the late arrivals of gold have been purchased for the Continent. The arrivals of specie have been to the extent of only £221,928, all from New York. The next mail for the East will take out £80,078, of which £43,040 is silver and £37,083 gold. The respective proportions are £21,553 for India, £43,000 for China and the Straits, and £15,485 for Alexandria and Aden. There has again been considerable demand for gold for the Continent, and some large amounts have been sent away. Bar silver has also been in good request, and the arrivals by the last West India mail have been disposed of at 61¾d., being an advance of ¼d. upon previous sales. Mexican dollars have not been in demand, and the late arrivals are still to be disposed of. The shipments of gold since the departure of the last mail from Melbourne amount to 60,625 ounces, valued at £240,500. The Prince of Wales from Australia is still out with £142,000.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 50,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place at the Bank of England this day. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta, 27,00,000 rupees; to Bombay, 21,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 200,000. The minimum price declared was as before—1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11⅝d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 370 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 2s. will receive about 13 per cent.; on Bombay at 2s. ⅛d., about 34 per cent.; on Madras at 1s. 11⅞d., about 60 per cent; and all above these prices, in full.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Business in the English stock markets since the commencement of the year has assumed a somewhat healthier appearance, but prices have been kept down by the unsatisfactory news, with regard to the unsettled state of political affairs on the Continent, and particularly with reference to the dispute between Denmark and Slesvig Holstein. The large decrease in the stock of bullion in the Bank of France is also causing uneasiness, fears being entertained that the Bank of England may again be under the necessity of increasing the rate of discount. Late this afternoon, however, a rather better feeling predominated, and the market closed a shade firmer. The latest price of Consols for money was 91 to ⅛ ex. div., and the same for the account, which is a comparative decline of ¼ per cent. Exchequer Bills, on the other hand, are better, having improved to 5s. dis. to par. A large speculative business has been transacted in foreign stocks, and for most of the favourite descriptions there has been a retrograde movement in prices. Greek Stock closes at 23¾ to 24¼, being a decline of ¾ per cent. Mexican have receded 1⅛ per cent., leaving off at 36¼ to 36⅜. Spanish Passives are ¼ per cent. lower, being 33⅞ to 34⅛; the Certificates, however, are steady at 13⅞ to 14⅛, and Turkish continue firm, the Six Per Cents of 1854 being 89½ to 90½, and those of 1862, 67½ to 68 ex. div.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and railway securities have been more restricted than for some time past, and the general tendency of prices is unfavourable. The dealers show but little anxiety to operate in these stocks since the receipt of the chequered intelligence with regard to the operations of the Federal forces. The annexed are the only dealings recorded: United States Five per Cents., 69¾ ex. d. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 77; Do. do., Pennsylvanian Section, 80. Erie $100 Shares all paid, 65 and 65½; Do. Seven per Cent., Second Mortgage, 69. Illinois Central, $100 Shares, $90 paid, 22¾ and 24 dis. Marietta and Cincinnati Railway, 71, 70½, and 69. Michigan Central, 73½ and 73½, and New York Central $100 Shares, 79¾ and 80.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for English railway shares has been very fairly supported as regards business, but without anything of a speculative tendency being apparent; but in the majority of the dealings lower prices have been accepted, though in some few instances there has been an improvement. The most important changes, as compared with this day week, are a decline of 1¼ per cent. in Metropolitan and Midland, of 1 per cent. in Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and London and North-Western; of ¾ per cent. in London and South-Western and South-Eastern; of ½ per cent. in London and Brighton, Sheffield, North British, North-Eastern (Berwick) and do. (York), and of ¼ per cent. in South Devon. On the other hand there has been an improvement of 1 per cent. in Great Southern and Western (Ireland) of ½ per cent. in London, Chatham, and Dover, and of ¼ per cent. in Great Northern, and South-Eastern. In foreign shares business has been less animated, and prices remain comparatively steady. For shares in British Possessions there has been rather more inquiry of late, and good business in them has been transacted at steady and full values.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There is no new feature to affect the price of this stock; the quotations have varied between 37 to 39 and 38 to 40, at which latter we closed. The business done has been very limited.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the London Dock Company yesterday, a dividend of £1 15s. per cent. was declared, less the income tax. The chairman congratulated the proprietors upon the steady and satisfactory progress of the business of the docks.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

Several new joint-stock undertakings have been brought forward within the last few days; amongst them are the Grand International Alliance Hotels Company, with a capital of £300,000 in 12,000 shares of £25 each, a portion of which will be to bearers. It is proposed to establish a thorough system of hotel accommodation between Holland, France, Belgium and England, by means of hotels belonging to the Company in Holland and Belgium, acting in correspondence with first-class hotels already established in France and England belonging to other companies. The advantages of such a correspondence will, it is believed, secure convenience and security combined with moderate charges. The present Company proposes to erect only two hotels, one at Amsterdam and the other at Rotterdam; but these structures, it is intended, shall be models of their kind.—The prospectus of the British and Foreign Contract Company has been issued, the capital being fixed at £3,000,000, in 30,000 shares of £100 each; of which only one-third is intended to be issued in the first instance, whilst not more than £25 is to be called up. The prospectus states that "the extensive and increasing scale on which works of public utility are progressing in all parts of the world having called into existence several large financial and credit companies for the purpose of affording the necessary monetary support, it is conceived that great advantage would arise from the formation of powerful companies having for their special object the undertaking or guaranteeing the execution, on fixed conditions, of enterprises of a sound and well-ascertained commercial value. The Company will afford to the public the opportunity of participating in the large profits derivable from carrying out public undertakings in this country, which have hitherto been monopolised by private contractors." With regard to foreign undertakings, the Company will not only share the profits of contractors, but derive additional advantages from an interest in valuable concessions, and the premiums on such shares as may be taken in part payment for works. The directors, it appears, have secured the services of a gentleman who was for many years the manager of one of the most eminent contractors of the day, and under whom he superintended the execution and the financial arrangements of extensive railway and other works, both in this country and abroad.—The Kumaon and Oude Plantation Company is another new Indian agricultural company, just announced, under favourable auspices, the directors themselves, it is said, taking a large share in the enterprise. Three estates in Kumaon, comprising about 4,400 acres, and two others in the north of Oude, comprising about 10,000 acres, have been purchased, where tea, cinchona, silk, cotton, and other crops are to be produced. The price of the estates is £29,000, of which £12,000 will be payable in money and £17,000 in shares, which are not to be entitled to any dividend till 8 per cent. has been in some one year paid out of the net profits of the company upon the capital paid up on all the ordinary shares. The vendors guarantee a dividend of 8 per cent. for the first three years of the operations of the company. The capital is £100,000, of which £60,000 is to be issued in the first instance in 6,000 shares of £10 each.—The prospectus has been issued of the British Nation Fire Insurance Company, with a capital of £1,000,000, in 50,000 shares of £20 each, the first issue to be limited to 25,000 shares. The undertaking is brought forward under the auspices of the British Nation Life Assurance Association. It is stated that the company has every element for securing at once a large and profitable business. The Fire Company will at once obtain the advantage of the whole working staff of the Life Company. One of the chief advantages of the junction of the two undertakings is, of course, the saving of expenses which it will effect, both immediate and prospective.—The Panuncello Copper Mining Company (Chili) has also been brought before the public, the capital sought to be obtained being £200,000, in 50,000 shares of £4 each. The object of the Company is to purchase and work the Panuncello Copper Mines, situate in the province of Walle in Chili, about 43 miles from the port of Coquimbo, to which a railway is in course of construction, and more than half of it completed. The undertaking is introduced under an influential directorate, and the property boasts of the largest produce of any mine in the world. The lode of clean ore is 60 feet wide, at a cost of extract of only 10s. per ton. Seven furnaces for running the ore, with regulus and other plant, are already in operation; the transfer has been secured on satisfactory terms.—The prospectus of the Australian and Eastern Navigation Company (Limited) has been issued this afternoon. The capital proposed to be raised is £2,000,000, in 40,000 shares of £50 each, with power to increase. Deposit on application, £1 per share, and on allotment £1 per share. The directorate is very influential. The company is formed on the basis of an amalgamation of the "Black Ball," "Eagle," and "White Star" lines of packets, sailing from Liverpool, to Melbourne, and the services of the agents, both here and abroad, have been secured on satisfactory terms. The main object of the company is to establish between England and Australia a line of auxiliary screw-steamers, of large capacity, which, the promoters have proved, can be profitably employed in the trade. It is intended that these steamers shall be worked in connection with the clipper ships belonging to the above lines, and it is proposed to employ smaller vessels on the coasts of Australia and New Zealand. Arrangements have been made whereby the steamers Great Britain, Royal Standard, and Great Victoria, now on their voyages, will, as they respectively arrive in this country, pass into the hands of the company, at valuations to be fixed by arbitration. The company proposes to commence business at an early date.—The Tamar, Kit Hill, and Callington Railway Company is another undertaking brought out this afternoon, the object of the company being to facilitate the transit of goods, merchandise, and mineral produce between the port of Plymouth, by the Tamar river at Kelly quarry and wharves, and the town of Callington, the centre of a great and increasing mining district, as well as the northern district of Cornwall, up to Five Lanes and Launceston. The distance is about seven miles, so that various mines will have a ready, quick, and economical means of conveying their ores to the sampling quays on the Tamar, together with the same facility for obtaining coals, timber, iron, and other necessary materials in constant requirement. Arrangements have been entered into with a contractor, who has commenced operations on the line, and who will take payment for two-thirds of the amount in the stock of the company. He also offers to take the line on lease, and guarantee 5 per cent. on the capital. The proposed capital is £60,000 in 6,000 shares of £10 each; £1 per share to be paid on application, and £2 on allotment.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the American produce markets, transactions since our last have been upon a very limited scale, but as a general rule prices have been very firmly maintained. Arrivals continue light, and although the deliveries from warehouse are only moderate there is no undue accumulation of stocks, and holders regard the future course of the market with confidence. For cotton the demand has at intervals been extremely active, resulting in an advance of 1½d. to 2d. per lb.; and although the activity has latterly abated, the market still shows great stability. In American provisions a steady business is passing, at full rates, for all descriptions. Fine butters are especially firm in price. The old stock of American bacon is now nearly cleared off, and quotations are nominal, whilst the fresh arrivals are held above the views of buyers, and prices therefore are not as yet established. The grain markets continue very firm, and for fine samples of American wheat 1s. more money has been paid. American oil-cake is more in demand in consequence of the weather. Petroleum sells somewhat less freely, and refined may now be quoted 1s. 11d. to 2s. per gallon. Linseed oil, after bringing 36s., now offers at 35s. 6d. to 35s. 9d. Rape oil, on the contrary, has advanced to 43s. for pale, and 41s. for foreign brown. In sperm oil no quotable change has occurred. The metal trade has again been very active, attended with a general advance in prices. For spelter £21 has been paid on the spot; for soft English pig lead £20 17s. 6d. to £21; the price of English tin has been put up £2, and the price of English copper £3 per ton. The only article in which any reaction has taken place is Scotch pig iron, which, from 68s. cash, has receded to 65s. 6d., owing chiefly to speculative sales. In drugs and drysaltery articles there is as usual at this early period of the year but little doing. Dyes, whilst inactive, are mostly steady, but at the cochineal sales to-day Teneriffe grain went 1d. per pound cheaper. The sugar market is very firm, and prices are once more at the highest point attained during any part of the speculative movement.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 6.

SINCE the turn of the year there has been considerable animation in our cotton market. A large speculative business has been transacted, and prices have advanced all round. To-day, however, there has not been so much business, and dealings have been effected at about ¼d. decline, with a tendency to further depreciation. The sales this week have been 44,000 bales, of which 20,500 were on speculation and for export. The total imports of cotton during the past year have been 1,932,164 bales, against 1,445,085 bales in 1862, and 3,035,724 in 1861. The imports of this year comprised 133,389 bales of American, 136,679 of Brazil, 247,577 of Smyrna and Egyptian, 24,310 West India, &c., and 1,390,209 bales of East India. The total stock in this country on the 31st December last was 327,525 bales, against 433,950 bales in 1862, and 699,300 bales in 1861. The stock at the close of the past year comprised 38,382 bales of American, 2,446 of Brazil, 26,811 of Smyrna and Egyptian, 872 West India, &c., and 252,014 bales of East India. The total sales at Liverpool during the past year were 2,618,410 bales, against 2,755,750 bales in 1862. The total imports last year were 1,666,646 bales, and in 1862 they were 1,253,881 bales. Exported last year 476,201 bales, and in 1862, 420,555 bales. Taken for consumption last year, 1,325,200 bales, against 1,183,560 bales in 1862. Taken on speculation last year 758,690 bales, and in 1862 1,114,310 bales. The total stock of cotton at Liverpool on the 31st December was 299,319 bales; at the same period in 1862 it was 392,460 bales, and in 1861 622,560 bales. The latest official quotations were:—American, 28¼d. to 30d.; Egyptian, 28¼d. to 32d.; Bahia, 26¾d. to 28¼d.; Maranham, 28¼d. to 29d.; and Surats, 16¾d. to 25¼d.

MANCHESTER, January 5.

On its becoming known here on Thursday last that the stock of cotton in Liverpool was only 18,000 bales in excess of the brokers' estimated stock, a strong speculative demand set in for all classes of yarns and goods, the former advancing fully 1d. per lb., and shirtings, in some instances, as much as 1s. per piece. Many spinners who had taken contracts in the early part of the day went to Liverpool to purchase cotton, but they could find none offering, as nearly all descriptions were withdrawn from the market. Friday and Saturday being holidays nothing was done.

On Monday, an active demand sprung up in Liverpool, and an advance of ½d. to ¾d. per lb. was obtained for cotton. Notwithstanding this our market was quiet, and very little business was effected.

To-day continental politics are of such a gloomy character that our market has been brought almost to a standstill. Prices, although quoted firm, are only nominally so.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON's Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The war still languishes. The Federals seem utterly exhausted by their efforts of the summer and autumn, and but for the ceaseless activity of the Confederates, who will not allow the enemy to enjoy winter-quarters, there would be a complete truce to hostilities. A corps of Southern cavalry has made a circuit of Meade's army, here and there raids are made upon Federal lines and supply trains, General Longstreet, whose gallant soldiers are in many cases shoeless, has taken up a position in East Tennessee which is easily defensible, and which movement necessitates the presence of a large Federal force to protect the positions now held by the North in that part of the State, a Confederate force, descending the Bayou Lafourche, Louisiana, has burned some Federal steam boats, at Charleston an attack of gun-boats has been repulsed, and General Gillmore is dropping a few shells per day into the City, not for any military purpose, for none can be observed by such a proceeding, but for the possible sport of killing or wounding a few women or children that may chance to be within range. If we add to this brief summary that General Morgan is within the Confederate lines and ready for service, and that, according to the Richmond Journal, General Joseph Johnston has assumed the command of the army at Dalton, we have given an outline of the war news of the week—except two items which are sufficiently important to demand special notice.

The telegram per Java, announces that "The Federal Government has postponed the draft till the middle of January." Considering how urgently reinforcements are required, and that if recruits are to be of any use for the spring campaign they ought to be in training by this time, the postponement of the draft is an unmistakable sign of Northern exhaustion.

And never did the Northern Government stand in greater need of recruits. The beginning of mutiny is always a bad omen, for no one can foresee its extent. We understand, and fully excuse, the pains that the Northern Government has taken to suppress the details of the negro revolt at Fort Jackson, but in another part of our impression we publish a letter, from which, as well as from the latest intelligence from New York, it is easy to perceive that the outbreak is serious. The coloured troops have possessed themselves of Fort Jackson, and have hung thirty of the white officers and men over the ramparts. The Federal authorities said there was no blood shed, which, we suppose, is intended as a grim joke, because death by hanging does not involve the shedding of blood. Two white regiments were sent against the mutineers. These were unable to recover the fort, and returned to New Orleans. We now hear that some gun-boats have been sent to Fort Jackson.

Besides this affair, it appears that some negroes in New Orleans have been treated by the police with flogging, a punishment peculiarly odious from the coloured people, and apparently illegal, since by the terms of their enlistment they are exempt from corporal punishment. Now nothing is more natural than that the negroes should turn against the Federals. Contempt for the Yankee has been a characteristic of the coloured race in the South, and attachment to their masters has been a ruling passion. Such a prejudice and such a sentiment are difficult to remove, and Confederates, who know the negroes well, have always maintained that the North could not rely on the fidelity of its coloured troops—or rather upon their obedience to their masters and country for the Confederate States is the country of the negro. But if there was any doubt about the treatment of the negroes who have taken service on the side of the Yankees, a sufficient account has been given in the South. The negroes are well fed, well clothed, well armed, in times of trial and distress, and they are not called upon to work on heavy tasks. Does not this show that the North would make them free, and that the negro finds freedom is plenty to eat and to wear? What has been their actual treatment? They have been driven into the army to fight for the "Union," and have been used as screens for the Yankee troops. Poor African children have been left to starve. In New York their fellows have been hung by the rope, and Mr Lincoln himself has solemnly recommended them to get out of the country for which they are now called upon to fight. Southerners have always maintained, in opposition to the fanatics of New England, that the negro is not intellectually inferior to the white race, but they have never asserted that the negro is so idiotic as to be gulled by the professions of the Yankees.

We have received Mr Memminger's Report, which we will publish in our next number, and at present it will be sufficient if we give a brief summary of the financial condition of the Confederacy as set forth in that document, and of the means proposed to meet the liabilities and expenditure of the Government. The public debt on 1st September last was $1,050,366,130, of which $700,147,513 was unfunded. The estimate of the Government expenditure to 1st July, 1864, is $475,448,193, but if the estimate is extended to embrace the remaining 12 months of the year this amount must be doubled. Now to this all. On the 30th September last there was a balance of appropriations already made by Congress and not drawn by the Treasury, amounting to $476,451,749. Therefore, according to the estimate submitted to Congress by Mr Memminger, the total sum required is $1,427,448,138. However, in fact, Congress has voted greatly in excess of the amount of the respective appropriations. The most and most necessary part of the debt Mr Memminger points out the rapid depreciation of the currency, and explains the failure of the Government plans from causes over which the Government had no control. As soon as it became evident that the South would have to fight for the maintenance of her independence, the Government at Richmond, supported by a patriotic Congress, prepared to ransack every corner for carrying on the struggle with the utmost possible vigour. No country has ever made so great a war without incurring a large debt, and as to increased taxation the fact is notorious that the people of the Confederate States have been and are ready to submit to any amount of taxation, that is, to anything in reason. Congress [illegible] and the Government [illegible] Treasury by [illegible] The Confederate Government [illegible] Treasury [illegible] Texas, the South [illegible] been repeatedly confounded with his Georgia namesake, has ere this safely reached the Confederacy.

It has been asserted over and over again that the resources of Virginia were exhausted, and, considering that the Old Dominion has for so long been the scene of warfare, it is not surprising that this Yankee invention should meet with some credence. We are happy to say that there is no truth in the statement. The Legislature of Virginia called upon Auditor Bennett for a return of the number of horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs in the counties of Virginia now within the Confederate lines. The following is a part of Mr. Bennett's report :—

In February, 1860—Horses	207,886
In February, 1863—Horses	181,864
Loss in three years	26,022
1860—Cattle	561,567
1863—Cattle	496,821
Loss in three years	64,746
1861—Sheep	469,912
1863—Sheep	541,304
Gain in two years	71,402
1861—Hogs	923,758
1863—Hogs	770,502

Commenting on this return, the Richmond Enquirer (December 22) observes :—"In February, 1863, there were in the counties now within our lines 181,864 horses, 496,821 cattle, 541,304 sheep, and 770,502 hogs. These are the returns of officers of the revenue made last February, and if we deduct from these the consumption from February, 1863, to February, 1864, we may, without error, safely assert that on next February, there will be 100,000 horses, 400,000 cattle, 500,000 hogs or pork; and as sheep have increased nearly 15 per cent. we will put them down at 550,000." Auditor Bennett's return is one among many proofs that when President Davis said the war could be carried on in Virginia for twenty years he was not using a mere figure of speech.

The Message of Governor Lubbock to the Legislature of Texas announces that the income for the year was $2,468,061, and the expenditure less by $15,810. The governor recommends an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the purchase of arms and munitions for the benefit of the State. Meanwhile, Texas has been contributing largely to the supply of the wants of the South. From December 1, 1861, to August 31, 1863, the State factory of Texas manufactured 2,258,660 yards of cotton goods, and 293,298 yards of woollens. The gross earnings of the establishment for the above-named period were $1,174,439, and the expenses $468,653. Governor Lubbock calls upon the States west of the Mississippi to prepare for carrying on the war whilst they are comparatively isolated from the rest of the Confederacy, and he declares that for Texas there can be no peace until the independence of the Confederate States is acknowledged.

Governor Clark has addressed a proclamation to aliens in Mississippi, which will estop all future complaints on the part of foreign settlers in that State. He warns aliens between the ages of 18 and 45 that they will be liable to service on or before the 1st March next, unless exempted on other ground than that of alienage. He also notifies that all persons, under or above the conscript age, are liable to militia duty; but if aliens have no stomach for the fight they have still an opportunity to flee from it. The South does not want unwilling soldiers in her patriot armies, and therefore Governor Clark requests Confederate officers to grant passports to all aliens who desire to leave the State under the provision of the law. We wonder if there are any aliens in Mississippi who will avail themselves of Governor Clark's generous offer. If so, the South is well rid of them.

The Yankee papers announced some months ago that the people of Mobile were suffering from famine, and that it was difficult for the rich to suppress the bread riots of the poor. The Mayor of that city has lately presented his annual Report, and certainly it is impossible to trace in that document any indication of the famine over which the Yankees were gloating. The Mayor says distinctly there has been no actual distress in Mobile, and he shows how the poor have been saved from the sufferings incidental to a time of war. The citizens contributed $130,000 for the support of the free market where 4,000 persons received good and substantial food; and 1,000 families have been clothed at a cost of $70,000, also contributed by the citizens. The cash receipts in the city treasury for the past year are $56,000 above the expenditure, and the total balance in the treasury is $186,300.

Governor Bonham, in his Message to the South Carolina Legislature, observes :—"The State Legislatures have no unimportant part to play in this great drama. They can aid the Confederate Government by assisting in clothing the troops, in repelling the raids of our enemies, and in feeding the families of our soldiers in arms. In all measures which you in your wisdom may adopt, looking to the successful issue of this great struggle, you may, gentlemen, rely upon my hearty co-operation."

Governor Shorter, in his Message to the Alabama Legislature, announces that the finances of the State are in a sound condition, the balance in the Treasury being $311,155. He congratulates the Legislature on the harmony between the State and Confederate Governments. This is Governor Shorter's last Message, he being succeeded in office by the Hon T. H. Watts.

The Richmond Sentinel states that for the months of September and October General Pillow has enrolled, from Alabama and Mississippi, 26,000 men, in infantry and cavalry.

Our Richmond Letter of this week, dated 15th December, gives some interesting particulars of the treatment and condition of the Federal prisoners. Our correspondent, accompanied by the correspondent of the Times, visited the Libby Prison and the prison encampment on Belle Isle. Only three per cent. of the captives were in hospital, and the rest, so far from exhibiting any signs of want, were in robust health. The prisoners are in well ventilated places, and are better supplied with food and fuel than the Confederate soldiers in the field. Besides necessaries, there was an abundant supply of luxuries from the North. The prisoners in the Libby, about 1,000 in number, were amusing themselves with cards, chess, and novel reading. What a contrast to the condition of the Southern prisoners on Johnson's Island!

A Mrs. Patterson Allan has been examined before Commissioner Watson at Richmond on the charge of holding a treasonable correspondence with the enemy. About the guilt of the accused there is little question, though the examination was not concluded at the latest dates we have from the Confederate capital. Mrs. Allan was nearly as harmless as she was malignant, and her information could not have been worth much to the Federal Government, except so far as it afforded an excuse for suspecting the good faith of political opponents in the North. The letter which led to Mrs. Allan's arrest is, in its way, a masterpiece of feline spite, and bears strong testimony to the determination and unanimity of the Confederates. This letter, dated Richmond, June 8, signed "Santa Trinita," and addressed "Caro Signore," under cover to the Rev. Morgan Dix, states that the Rev. M. D. Hoge was about to run the Charleston blockade on his return from London, "where his apparent business was to collect Testaments and Bibles, but where his real object was to write for English journals, and exert his influence for the Southern cause." Those who were acquainted with Dr. Hoge during his stay in this city, and who knowing him could not fail to be impressed with his singleness of purpose in procuring Bibles and religious publications, will readily admit that in one essential Mrs. Allan is a genuine representative of Yankeedom. After disposing of Dr. Hoge, the informer proceeds to name several ministers and other persons of both sexes in the North, whom, she says :—"Should all be sent to the South." She also recommends that Mr. Vallandigham should be imprisoned, saying, "Put the wretch in Fort Warren." Those who have deified a midnight assassin of helpless women and little children, ought to honour Mrs. Allan for her genuine New England piety. She asserts, that General Stoneman had "within his grasp the plantations of several of the most prominent rebels, . . besides the farms of hundreds engaged in the Southern service." Then, maddened by the reflection that Stoneman did not burn and destroy all these homesteads, she exclaims, "Oh, for the hour when the avenging angel shall appear with torch in one hand and the avenging sword of justice in the other, and consecrate to death and destruction this land, and these people, rewarding them with a fate they so richly deserve! When, when will that time arrive?" Mrs. Allan does what she can to egg on her fellow-countrymen to afford her some instalment of the feast of blood, for which she and they so ardently long. She writes, "It is a truth, the rebel soldiers live on rats, and anything else they can get. Corn and wheat, green and from the field, are common articles of diet. If the Northern army cannot vanquish such a miserable set of starved and naked wretches, then may the Yankee nation become a byword with all nations on earth!" But like Mrs. Stowe, this Mrs. Allan is not clever enough to avoid bearing unconscious testimony to the worth of her enemies. In "Uncle Tom's Cabin" we learn that the Southerners have not hindered but promoted the progress of christianity amongst their slaves, and in the "Santa Trinita" letter—a genuine Yankee never loses the opportunity of a little blasphemy—there is fresh testimony to the devoted patriotism of the Confederates. Mrs. Allan writes, "In the North, treason stalks forth in the broad daylight! Here everything is subservient to the cause. . . . Many a man wearing the Federal uniform is a traitor, and where the menare true their wives are false. It is this which has so often proved ruinous to the Union cause. Here every mind, heart, and arm are bent to serve the cause of the South. Money, property, crops, everything is sacrificed for the main idea. Thus the South has been able to maintain its position so far." So much for Mrs. Allan. Oftentimes surprise has been expressed at the horrible orgies the lowest of the low women of Paris indulged in moments of revolutionary phrensy; but what will posterity think of the story of the Yankee woman, a fair representative of her country, who, in cold blood, clamours for the extermination of a whole people?

Commenting on the sham Union Conventions in the South, the New York Herald observes, "It makes honest Union men indignant when they read the resolutions of the conventions in Louisiana and Florida, which are sought to be passed off as expressions of revived Southern loyalty. The fact of the nigger being allowed to sit on terms of perfect quality with the white man in these gatherings is in itself sufficient to expose their real character. They are made up, not of Southern men, but of the cormorants who follow in the wake of our armies, and who seek by thus imposing on the Administration and the country to postpone or defeat all genuine expressions of Southern feeling, and to maintain themselves in the possession of their ill-gotten gains." The London Yankee journals may learn a lesson in honesty, even from their transatlantic contemporaries.

It appears that General Butler has superseded General Meredith as the Federal agent of exchange. This is indisputable evidence that the Northern Government does not wish to carry out the cartel. If it did, it would not appoint a man as commissioner who is execrated, not only by the Confederates, but by all civilised nations.

Lieutenant Rooks, said to be a British officer, has been arrested in New York on the charge of carrying Confederate letters, and has been sent to Fort Lafayette by order of Mr. Seward.

The Federal House of Representatives has appointed a committee to report on a National Bankrupt Law. A New York paper observes, "We ought to have a good Bankrupt Law now—we trust are to have it this winter. The system of universal credit is passing away—we trust never to return. Let us, then, clear away its wreck and get ready to do business as it should be done, and not leave half our most energetic and capable citizens crippled and paralyzed by debts that they can never pay while thus fettered. Let us rub out old scores and begin anew!" This proceeding evinces a great deal of foresight.

In the South the men are urged to enlist for the defence of their homes, to protect the honour of their women, and to maintain inviolate their national independence. In the North the inducements held out are large bounties, considerable pay, the hope of plunder and the prospect of indulging brutal passions in the enemy's country. The special order issued to the Army of the Potomac in reference to granting furloughs for thirty-five days to officers and men, offers another bribe for the men whose terms of service will shortly expire to re-enlist. It is notified that "When three-fourths of the men of a regiment or company re-enlist, such portion of the regiment or company will be allowed to go home in a body and take with it its arms and equipments. In all other cases the arms and equipments of the men granted furloughs will be turned over before leaving camp to the division ordnance officer, by whom they will be transferred to the officer in charge of the ordnance depot, to be held subject to his call on the return of the men to duty." The Yankee soldiers must be particularly simple, if the permission to carry the rifles to their homes is a sufficient inducement to make them continue in a service which they would otherwise leave.

The late prize-fight and defeat of Heenan have given rise to increased ill-will, if it is possible, against this country. The New York Herald has had some leaders on it, in one of which it remarks, "the British lion, or the British bull, whichever it is—or a British beast made up of the contrary qualities of bull and lion, with the stupid bovine stubborness and the feline treachery"—was victor on four occasions, but that Yankee honour must be redeemed. In another leader, which commences with a parody on the Bible, it is charged that Heenan "was shamefully swindled out of the prize by men who pretend to be fond of fair play, and the London Times, with its immense stultification, says the fight was a fair one." These, it is true, are but straws on the surface; but they indicate the current of public opinion in the United States. It is almost a matter of doubt whether the Yankees hate the Southerners so much as they do the English.

In General Averill's report of the late raid on Salem, we read, "We captured about 200 prisoners, but have retained but four officers and eighty men on account of their inability to walk." Whether General Averill means that he kept the eighty-four because they could not walk, or because they could walk and the rest could not, is not very clear. A more ingenious excuse was never devised.

The Chesapeake affair still engrosses much attention in the North. According to the reported testimony of Lieutenant Braine, C.S.A., who had charge of the expedition, he was duly commissioned by the Confederate Government, did what he could to avoid bloodshed, and only permitted his men to use their weapons in self-defence. Lieutenant Braine thinks that the British authorities will have to surrender the vessel to the Confederates. The rescue of the prisoners at Halifax was an important demonstration, because the persons who did this were some of the first men of the place. It is not that our fellow-subjects in Canada are less obedient to the law than we are, but the incident shows that it is dangerous for a Government to manifest an unjust impartiality. Whenever English Governments dared to violate the law, or to sacrifice the honour of their country, we were never backward in opposing the Executive. The Halifax people made an energetic protest against the cringing of the British authorities to the Federal Government.

Every mail brings us accounts of disloyalty in the North. In New York a fresh batch of merchants has been arrested for carrying on a contraband trade with the South, and Mr. Segur, formerly Federal minister to San Salvador, his family and friends, have been sent to Fort Lafayette for taking passages on the Oliver Cromwell for New Orleans, that vessel being detained for having contraband goods on board. It is reported that Mr Segur had in his possession bills trading for fifty barrels of lard, which upon being examined were found to contain upwards of 1,000 navy revolvers.

the bombs and other weapons, gave them complete instructions, found on the person of Greco, supplied them when they started with 4,000 francs (£160), and gave them an address in London to which to write to him for more money, if they should need it. They did need more money, wrote for it, and it was duly sent, but only arrived after their arrest. Two of the prisoners are Garibaldians, wearing the Marsala medal; one of these two heroes having been convicted, under different names, of swindling in France and theft in England. Without further evidence we cannot believe in the guilt of Mazzini; but if upon investigation the above proves a true version of the affair, we must express our earnest hope that the English Government will lose no time in securing Mazzini and his accomplices if they are still, as is most probable, on English soil. Fortunately, the law will now allow hirers of assassins to be brought to justice, and the whole country would heartily rejoice to see awarded the extreme penalty due to such a horrible design.

The Corps Législatif has passed by 232 to 14 votes the Bill granting the Government the supplementary credits for which it had asked. The debate was rendered important by the reappearance of M. Berryer in the tribune. He made a very effective speech, showing no sign of any diminution of his great powers, and obtained a signal rhetorical success. After criticising severely the financial policy of the Government, he made an energetic appeal to it "to preserve peace in all circumstances in which our honour is not concerned, our independence is not menaced." The only other noteworthy speeches were those of M. Emile Ollivier, which was a powerful argument for peace, and the reply of M. Vuitry, the Vice-President of the Council of State, in which he disposed with great skill and success of the criticisms of M. Berryer.

The members of the Opposition have presented several amendments to the Address. They are directed against official candidatures, the law of public safety, the restrictions upon the press, the law against coalitions of workmen, in favour of municipal institutions, gratuitous primary instruction, liberal institutions for Algeria, an immediate end to the Mexican expedition, the evacuation of Rome, and the rupture of diplomatic relations with Russia. No one of these amendments, however, has obtained the support of the whole of the small fraction of the Chamber which is styled the Opposition. Those relating to Mexico, Rome, and Poland are especially poor in signatures.

The debate commenced on Monday. The leading speakers on that day were MM. Thiers, Rouher, and Jules Favre. M. Thiers demanded the re-establishment of the liberty suspended by the empire, and especially insisted upon the restoration of liberty to the national representation and the reintroduction of ministerial responsibility. France, he said, was ripe for liberty. "If the chief of the State does not know how to cede, the country would exact that which it now respectfully requests." Upon this condition he promised his unreserved support to the Government. M. Rouher observed that the Government did not fear the threat used by M. Thiers, contended that the Parliamentary system M. Thiers wished to bring back had had its day, declared that the Emperor reigns and governs, and that liberty would follow when the time had arrived. M. Jules Favre took the same line as M. Thiers. The debate was continued on Tuesday. After a few speeches of no importance the general discussion was closed, and that upon the amendments commenced. The first amendment relative to the election was rejected.

The Slesvig-Holstein question remains well nigh in statu quo. The Danes still hold the Crown Work at Rendsburg, and are actively engaged in strengthening their great line of defence, the Dannevirke. Prince Frederick is still at Kiel, receiving homage, and is still allowed by the Federal commissioners to depart himself as if he were sovereign of the duchy. Austria and Prussia, it is officially announced, have the most complete understanding as to the course they shall pursue, and have addressed identical notes to the smaller States upon the subject of the stay of the Pretender in Kiel. The committee upon the affairs of Holstein has reported to the Diet that the Treaty of London is unfair in point of absolute justice, illegal in its bearings upon the right of nations, and fundamentally violates the rights of Germany and the duchies. This strong language does not seem, however, to be accompanied by any proposal to recognise the Pretender, and moreover has not yet been adopted by the Diet; so that, at present, it can only be taken as the view of Herr von der Pfordten, the Bavarian plenipotentiary, and a majority of the Holstein committee.

Austria and Prussia have renewed their motion in the Diet, that Denmark should be summoned to withdraw the new constitution, under the threat of the immediate occupation of the Duchy, and the vote is to be taken upon the proposition on Thursday.

Meanwhile Earl Russell is labouring to obtain a conference, but apparently without the slightest prospect of success. The Diet laughs at his appeals and warnings, and the French Government refuses to help him out of the mess in which his own rudeness and ignorance have led him. A long despatch addressed to Sir A. Malet, dated 30th December, has been published, in which, after reprobating strongly the course taken as well by the Diet as by the two great Powers, his lord ship insists upon a conference, and the maintenance of the statu quo.

A telegram from Berlin professes to give an analysis of a circular note of the French Government, which would indicate a determination on the part of France to leave Denmark in the lurch. It describes the work of the London conference as condemned by events, and declares that the new conference must take as its starting point the state of things now existing in Holstein, and that it can only discuss questions which the Diet is willing to have discussed.

It is said that the Austrian Government is determined not to allow the claim of the Pretender to be brought into the dispute with Denmark, and to occupy both duchies only to enforce the stipulations of 1851-52. But it really matters very little what it may have resolved, if it means to insist upon the occupation of Slesvig. The Danes cannot consent to abandon the duchy, and war once breaking out objects are soon extended.

Mr. Quaade, the Danish Minister at the Court of Berlin, has accepted the post of foreign minister in the Monrad Government. Lord Wodehouse, having done all the mischief he could, has left Copenhagen. The Federal commissioners have organised a new government for Holstein. The central administration is to be carried on at Kiel instead of Plon, as heretofore, and under a form of an entirely new pattern, consisting of a president and five members, all, we need hardly say, partisans of the Pretender.

A telegram from Altona informs us that the Prince of Augustenburg is said to intend declaring Kiel a free port. The announcement, whatever it may mean, has not the slightest importance. The person who despatched the telegram is not likely to know the prince's intentions, and assuming that he has faithfully reported them, there is yet a long way from the intentions of the prince to their execution. It reminds us, however, that Kiel is just the place of which Prince Frederick, in the event of the complete success of the German project to wrest the duchies from Denmark, would be unable to dispose. The duchies separated from the Danish crown, the claims of the Emperor of Russia, renounced in favour of King Christian and his line, revive to Kiel and some other portions of the Duchy of Holstein—claims which are far better founded than those of the Augustenburgs to the Duchy of Holstein—claims which, as against them, would be regarded as conclusive by any impartial tribunal, and claims which they must acknowledge as conclusive when urged, as they undoubtedly would be, with all the power of Russia.

The Germans are putting a rod in pickle for their own backs. Russia in Holstein, and adieu to all their fancies of playing a great part in Europe.

The Prussian House of Deputies seems resolved to force the King and his Ministers into their plan of war against Denmark, by the novel mode of refusing the supplies necessary to prepare for it. The committee to which the Bill for the Loan was referred has unanimously recommended the rejection of the Bill, and the House will, we may assume, adopt its recommendation. It is not certain that it would not equally reject a loan if war should be declared to gratify it. It has an intense objection to giving any money, and wants to force the Government to use a sum lying in the State treasury. The Prussians are very patriotic until they are asked to pay for their patriotism. Their kings, even when absolute, found it impossible to raise any money, and even now the Prussian taxpayers expect that a Prussian army can be sent to Slesvig without incurring any extra expenses. They want glory for nothing. They will find in the end that they will have to pay heavily only to load themselves with shame. Asked by Herr von Vorchow whether Prussia, as the new constitution had not been recalled by the King of Denmark on the 1st, would withdraw from the London Treaty, Herr von Bismarck gave the smart answer, that he would reply to the question as soon as the House should come to a resolution upon the loan.

The Spanish budget has been published. It shows an increase of revenue, but the Minister, at the same time, proposes fresh taxes. If the Government adopts the views of Marshal Narvaez, who has declared that he always considered that Gibraltar belonged to Spain and regretted that Spain had not long since claimed it, and takes steps to carry them out, the taxes will require a very considerable augmentation. Why did not Narvaez claim Gibraltar when he was prime minister and almost omnipotent in Spain?

As we predicted, in announcing that the Moldo-Wallachian Chambers had sequestrated the property of the monasteries, the step has brought the Government into trouble. The suzerain of the Hospodar and the British, Austrian, Prussian and Russian legations, have protested against the measure, and if their protests are not attended to will probably interpose more energetically.

The Italian Senate has been debating the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with France; the President of the Council, seizing the opportunity to express the indignation felt by the country at the plot against the Emperor Napoleon. The Chamber of Deputies has been discussing the Bill for the repression of brigandage, and has passed it by 150 to 46 votes. The minority would have been much larger if so many of the Radical deputies had not resigned their seats in disgust at the measures of the Government in Sicily.

The clerical party has won the election for the city of Bruges, and the small majority of the Liberal or Government party in the Chamber of Representatives is thus practically destroyed. The Ministry are expected to resign.

THE EAST.

The announcement, apparently coming from official sources, has been made, that after long discussions, extending over three days, the agents of Prince Satsuma have agreed to make immediate payment of the indemnity, and have promised in writing not to relax in active search for the murderers of Mr. Richardson, and to subject them, when discovered, to capital punishment, in the presence of one or more British officers.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, January 12.

THE Lord Lyndhurst (in speaking of politicians one no longer says the Nestor) of French orators, M. Berryer, has since I last wrote electrified France with his splendid speech on the state of the finances. Erect beneath the weight of his seventy-five years, speaking, as he says, "without passion and with the desire of finding in the financial administration of the last twelve years, not faults to be blamed but warnings to be used with profit," he showed that the talent which has for more than thirty years commanded the admiration of France has still no need of the veneration which age inspires. For more than three hours the Assembly hung on his lips, and the dullest fancied that he understood the difficult matter the orator grappled with, so methodically were facts brought forward, so precise the figures quoted, whilst the sleepiest was kept awake by the delicate irony which from time to time enlivened the dullness of his subject. Those who could not agree with him in all his views were still forced to admire, and it cannot be questioned that this speech on francs and centimes will ever rank with the greatest triumphs of French eloquence. To heap up francs, and even centimes, is a pleasant toil, whose sweetness all have a taste for; but to discuss their outlay, more irrevocable than winged words, and to make the discussion pleasant to the spenders, may well be called the very witchery of talking. Perhaps the charm consisted in the undercurrent of opposition, so dear to all human nature, and above all to French humanity; perhaps it was akin to that which the ruined spendthrift enjoys when he hears the bead-roll of his extravagance read out; but whatsoever its origin of this there can be no doubt, that Mr. Berryer found an echo in every Frenchman's bosom. If, as it is said he intends, his next appearance is to be a special pleading in favour of the Northern States of the late Union as established by Louis XVI., his eloquence will have a harder task and meet with less general approbation. Even his friends of the noble Faubourg will withhold their assent, as they now deprecate his advocacy of such a cause. In this only is M. Berryer a man of his—not the—age. The un-love with which Frenchmen regarded England eighty years ago was expressed in the love and admiration with which they cherished the young bantling they fancied they had helped into the world. M. Berryer perhaps clings to the tradition, as the misconduct and ingratitude of a favourite child seems only to render its claims on the affections of old age the stronger.

President Davis's Message, translated into French, has been distributed to the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. Fragments had already appeared in the French papers, faithfully enough translated, but so chosen that they conveyed a very false idea, if not of the situation of the South, certainly of the position of France in the question. The extracts of the Journal des Débats were singularly well arranged—a praise which, indeed, can seldom be denied to this paper—for while showing the servility with which the English Cabinet panders to the North, they suppressed entirely the unpleasant fact that the position taken up by France, if more dubious, is not a whit the fairer. The question of the blockade has hardly yet attracted attention in the Paris papers, but we shall probably see it well handled in the debates on the Address. These debates are more important, far more important, than English readers imagine. After the inordinate license of half a century, the free speech of the French representative body has been curbed, so that it is only on the occasion of the annual Address that it now finds vent. The solemnity of the occasion, if it tempers the language, adds weight to the opinions expressed. The debates extend in consequence to a length unknown in England; and this is so well understood that the Bill for the loan has been discussed and passed before the Address to the sovereign has been voted. The conditions of the new loan will be published in the beginning of next week; they are not yet officially known, but rumour says that they will be such as to offer a premium of 4 per cent. for ready money.

The discussion on the Address began yesterday, and M. Thiers opened the debate. He demands liberty—liberty of four kinds: individual liberty, press liberty, electoral liberty, and representative liberty; to all which he adds the demand that the sovereign shall be irresponsible. He does not speak of the new conspiracy just discovered, apropos of individual liberty, nor of the September laws he himself passed to correct the license of the press. In claiming electoral liberty he might have illustrated the subject by a reference to the practice of Louis Philippe's government and the 250,000 electors who then composed the governing body in France; but he is candid on the fourth of his demands, representative liberty, and acknowledges he has a great itching to badger the Ministers. He winds up with a threat, or something so like one that his eloquence will hardly carry conviction to the governing powers or to the great majority whose aspiration is quiet: "I declare, then, that if these liberties are conceded, thinking as I do that the country has the most serious want of them, that I accept them, and that I may be counted among the

January 13.

There have been two chief political events during the week, and each of them has its interest and importance. The Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Massey, has addressed his constituents at Salford, and the able and scholarly Federal advocate, Mr. Forster, has been equally liberal of his attentions to the electors of Bradford.

The most noteworthy feature in Mr. Massey's speech—which, like Mr. Forster's, was largely occupied with American affairs—was the difficulty he manifested in hitting upon a middle tone between his outspoken utterances of two years ago and the dull humdrum in praise of that do-nothing policy under which Lancashire is entering upon its third year of pauperism; and in this he succeeded so unsatisfactorily that, at the conclusion of his speech, when the question was put to him point blank, he was driven, without any apparent reluctance, to uphold his previously expressed opinions. It would be of little consequence to remark upon such a naturally expected matter of fact, were it not for the sake of correcting a ridiculous but no less ... misrepresentation in Monday's Star. "Mr. Massey," observes that journal, "is well nigh a convert on the American question. This time last year ... he deemed the war between North and South an unintelligible, undefinable quarrel without any sensible origin or object," &c., &c.

The thoroughness of Mr. Massey's conversion to the opposite opinion will be sufficiently gathered—sufficiently, I mean, even for a Federal organ like the Star—from the following extract from the report published by such another Federal organ as the Examiner:—

"Mr. J. D. Morton (amidst a storm of hisses) said he wished to ask the honourable member whether he was prepared to stand by his speech made in that room two years ago, in which he said that the American war had no beginning, would have no end, was without cause and effect, and was a war which no man could understand.

"Mr. Massey said, with regard to that question, he really thought that, in the speech referred to, he had given a very good definition of the American war, and a better one than he had done this evening. He was quite prepared to adhere to it."—Examiner and Times, January 9th, 1864.

The pith of Mr. Forster's speech is contained in the following singular extract. "Certainly, they had heard lately of spasmodic and convulsive efforts being made by Southern Clubs to cause England to interfere in American affairs; but thanks to the success of the Federals and the comparative non-success of the Confederates, there was no reason to believe that Parliament would depart from the opinion they had already expressed that any intervention

[illegible] ... would ... Providence ... [illegible]

... again, it is to be hoped that Mr. Forster's theory of "Providence" rests on a surer foundation than he lays down in the foregoing extract from his speech. A plain-spoken disputant might call such an argument fanatical, but perhaps it would be more moderate to confine oneself to the expression of a doubt as to the propriety of introducing into a question of this kind the assumed sanction or support of Providence. According to the military creed, Providence goes with superior numbers of good soldiers and effective artillery, and the advocates of this theory have a good deal to say in its favour; but according to Mr. Forster, when the civil war in America began, Providence could not but oppose the South, because its cause was vicious, while the cause of the North had nothing to recommend itself until the issue of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation. Mr. Forster must not be surprised if people tell him that his theory of Providence guiding human affairs does not appear more satisfactory in this particular application than the ethical aspect illustrated in the earlier part of his speech. Does Mr. Forster believe that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation contained an unreserved intent to emancipate the slaves? If he does, great is his faith, but greater his simplicity; if not, this proclamation was an imposition, and Mr. Forster can scarcely claim for it the approbation and support of Providence.

Mr. George Thompson, whose dictum as an Abolitionist was that "the dissolution of the Union was the object to be kept steadily in view," is now on the eve of renewing his visit to what he styles the "United States," and his compatriots of the North in Manchester have proposed, if not to serenade him, at least to offer him some sort of equivalent for that Yankee honour. The affair is announced as a "farewell soirée to George Thompson, to present an address to that gentleman on his final departure from England for the United States." It is consolatory to observe from these words that after Mr. Thompson has left us we shall not necessarily have seen the last of him. It may be the last time he will leave England for the United States, but the terms do not preclude the possibility at some subsequent date of his taking a "final departure" from the United States for England. The ... character of the forthcoming entertainment can only be appreciated from the concluding words of the announcement: "George Wilson, Esq., Samuel Pope, Esq., and other well-known friends will take part in the proceedings. Tickets: Gentlemen, 2s. 6d.; ladies, 1s. 6d., to be had at the offices of the Union and Emancipation Society, 51, Piccadilly, Manchester."

An appeal, it seems, is shortly to be made for Lancashire aid on behalf of the sick and wounded in the army and navy of the Northern States of America. A ... intimation to that effect was made public yesterday through the ... medium of the Manchester Examiner, and we were at the same time not too ... reminded that a favourable response is expected from us upon ... The writer appears to have been in blissful ignorance of the disgraceful circumstances attending the distribution of the so-called American flour, in Stephenson-square on the 16th of

... "I have read ... the statement made," ... [illegible] ...

[illegible] ... In Ashton, according to the report of the ... we have only one-twentieth part more of our factory population and its dependencies at work, than we had during 1862, January to December. The guardians of the poor are distributing less than one-half of the funds they gave a year since. The Relief Committees are still more cramped by the meagreness of the grants made by the controlling bodies. There is neither clothing, food, nor fuel distributed, and the necessities and sufferings of the operatives are mightier than in our most miserable period of the last eighteen months."

Independently, however, of the growing distress we have to grapple with, there is another fact of great significance and importance which came out at the last meeting of the Central Relief Committee—a fact which in its way bears with peculiar emphasis upon the "Confederate Cause in Lancashire." It has been ascertained, from statistics compiled for the purpose that during the past nine months the working population of the manufacturing districts has decreased by nearly 34,000 persons, and that of this number more than one-half have emigrated, principally, of course, to America. In considering this outpouring, the Manchester Courier fears that many who have joined in the exodus have gone to the Federal States under the impression that the war has made plenty of room for them; and adds, that no doubt the Federal Government is doing all in its power to encourage this delusion. Congress, we are reminded, has provided ample funds for the promotion of immigration, and one of the earliest acts done by the House of Representatives was to vote $20,000,000 for this purpose. The Courier concludes by speculating upon the possible, perhaps probable, fate of a considerable proportion of "our poor dupes." They will be drafted, either as substitutes for those "citizens" who dislike fighting, or as "voluntary mercenaries, into that army which will again go forth in the spring, either to fall by the sword or to perish by disease."

MANCHESTER, January 6.

[The following letter was accidently omitted last week.]

PERHAPS the most important of "extra-sessional utterances" yet to be delivered during the brief remainder of the recess are those we may shortly expect to hear from Mr. Massie. Mr. Massie's is no uninfluential voice, and the honourable gentleman may assure himself that on Friday evening next a crowded and eager audience will bear testimony to the consideration in which his words are held. It is now two years since he met his constituents directly for the purpose of addressing them on political affairs; and the question which on that occasion chiefly occupied men's minds and engrossed nearly the whole of the honourable member's attention during a speech of an hour and a half, still remains as one of the most absorbing topics of the day. That question, as handled in January, 1862, by the honourable member for Salford, may be stated in these words: "What is the duty of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the American war?" Even in those days the question was thus pointedly put, and it redounds to Mr. Massie's honour to say it was scarcely less pointedly answered. Speaking (he said) in the interests of peace and desiring the freedom of commerce, he declared that—for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the interests of the civilised world, for the sake of the people themselves who were involved in this mad and hopelsss and aimless contest,—it was the duty of the great maritime Powers to consider whether the time had not come, by mediation and by friendly interposition, to endeavour to put an end to this state of affairs.

When we consider it is now two years since sentiments like these callled forth ringing cheers from the constituents of Salford—two years of continued carnage in America, and two years of unabated wretchedness in Lancashire—it is nothing surprising that we should anticipate, with more than ordinary interest and not without impatience, the speech that has been promised to us the day after to-morrow. We also bear in mind that Mr. Massie was equally outspoken on the question of the blockade. He plainly told us that, according to the law of nations, the blockade was no blockade at all, and that it had only been recognised through the courtesy and forbearance of the maritime Powers of Europe. Thus it was we submitted to be deprived of the staple material of our industry, rather than construe "too strictly" the question of compliance with the law of nations. But how much longer, asked Mr. Massie, in January, 1862, was that to last? Was this inefficient and paper blockade to be eternally respected? Were we to submit to be starved? Were we to expect our great neighbour, France, to submit to be starved? It was no state secret to divulge, but, on the other hand, it was a notorious fact, that the French Government had even at that time repeatedly and earnestly "remonstrated" with our Government, with a view to concerted action in putting an end to that which was no blockade. And warming with his subject, and encouraged by the plaudits of a sympathising audience, the hon. gentleman concluded that portion of his address as follows:—Were we in this year of 1862, for the sake of favouring a ferocious and frantic war, to allow the great ports of commerce to be closed, all the operations of trade to be suspended, credit to be deranged, unoffending persons to be subjected to unparalleled privations, and many of our poorer fellow-countrymen absolutely to be reduced to penury and starvation? It was his opinion that the time had come for the great maritime Powers to offer friendly counsels, and such was the policy he meant to support in the House of Commons. Adverting to the question of slavery, the hon. gentleman disposed of it in half a dozen sentences so comprehensive and logical as to answer beforehand everything the Union and Emancipation Society (then unborn) might in after-days be foolish or unscrupulous enough to advance. If there was one delusion more than another which clouded the unhappy subject and prevented people from reading it in its true lineaments, it was the notion that the war was waged against slavery because the North were at war with a people who held slaves. Never was so foolish a notion, or one so unfounded and so delusive. Instead of yielding to that error, or of sympathising with the North on account of an accident for which the North was entitled to no credit, we might rather say to the South, "It is not your fault that your wealth is invested in such property as this; we look upon it as your misfortune, not your fault." If anything was likely to lead to the abolition of the institution of slavery, it was not the reconstruction and reconsolidation of the Union under the protection of a mighty flag which covered half the world; but it was that the slave States should be separated from the free States, and should be subjected to the action of the public opinion of Europe; and by means of treaties of commerce and other measures that might be brought to bear, he believed that the best and only prospect for the amelioration of the slave was to be expected. Upon the question of the "right of secession," Mr. Massey did not condescend to bestow any serious amount of attention, and a fortiori we may expect to hear less from him upon that not very profitable subject on Friday evening next. When the hon. member for Salford was last with his constituents, the American struggle, he thought, had long passed the point where questions of right cease to possess interest, and give place to the more weighty arguments of fact.

Apropos of slavery, Mr. Massie may have observed that a short time ago, the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society addressed a memorial to Lord Palmerston (!) for the purpose of dissuading his Lordship from lending a willing ear to the representations of the Southern Independence Association, upon the ground, forsooth, that it was a "pro-slavery organisation" got up in Lancashire to thwart the North in its holy crusade against the accursed abomination of the South. Could anything be conceived more old-ladyish than going and telling such nonsense to Lord Palmerston, of all men in the world? The memorial, however, had appeared in such congenial prints as the Daily News, Morning Star, Manchester Examiner, Anti-Slavery Reporter, &c., and was well worthy of an answer, if an answer could be found worthy of it. This rather difficult condtion has been very happily fulfilled by the accomplished and influentia vice-chairman of the Southern Independence Association (W. Romaine, Callender, Esq.) who addresses the editor of the anti-slavery organ as follows:—

"Sir,—I do not wish unduly to occupy your columns, but as I cannot believe you would make a wilful misrepresentation, I ask permission to state my own opinions on the American contest—opinions which, so far as I know, are shared by every member of the Southern Independence Association. I cannot do so more concisely than by quoting from the Manchester Examiner, a paper distinguished for its advanced Liberal opinions, and generally supposed to be the official organ of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. During the presidential contest between Buchanan and Fremont, the 'aspirations' of the Examiner were in favour of the Democratic candidate—the issue being very similar to that at present involved, with this important difference, that the Abolitionist feelings of Colonel Fremont were well-known, while the opinions of Mr. Lincoln have been at least ambiguous. An expression of hope on the part of the Examiner that the chances of success were in favour of Mr. Buchanan drew forth a severe attack from the anti-slavery advocate, to which the Examiner, in a leading article, September 9, 1858, replied as follows:—

"'The movement is one of the North versus the South—the manufacturers against the corn and cotton growers—the advocate of a United States Bank with a monetary monopoly and an unlimited paper currency against the hard cash political economists—the supporters of a prohibitive tariff for the benefit of a domestic industry against those who are for buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market, and doing a profitable business with the whole world. . . . . For our part we cannot afford to deal in such philanthropic generalities; we are compelled to take things as they are, even at the cost of giving a check to Pegasus. We believe that morality and truth are infinitely higher than any material interest, and we challenge the production of a single sentence from the columns of this journal which implies the contrary; at the same time we do believe that commerce and manufactures are of some slight importance to the twenty-six millions who inhabit these islands, and we cannot sacrifice this conviction to an empty rhetorical flourish. We agree with the bulk of the Abolitionists in believing that the interests of the slave are not identified with the success of Mr. Fremont. We believe the attempted identification is a mere political ruse for objects which would be mischievous to the United States, to this country, and to the world.'

"And on September 13th the same subject is again referred to:—'The chief hope of the United States at the present crisis lies in the reserve of patriotism and common sense among the people. Their public men of all parties are utterly unsafe guides; they deal with questions affecting the welfare of the republic as they would with a set of ninepins, and seize those views which will bowl down the greatest number. . . . . The present agitation is unhappily calculated to produce animosities, which will delay rather than hasten any practical measure for the enfranchisement of the slave; the question is made one of political preponderance—the worst of all issues for one of philanthropy.'

"When the result of the election was known in this country the Examiner gave the following character of the Democrats, (Nov. 22, 1856):—

"The party on whose shoulders Mr. Buchanan has been raised to power, though inspired to a great extent by high notions of the destiny of the United States . . . . are prompted by the strongest motives to cultivate amicable relations with Great Britain. The Democratic party represents the great producing interests of the United States, whose welfare is bound up with the maintenance of friendship and free trade with the people of this country.'

"Such were the views held but a short time ago by the followers of Mr. Bright. Such would be endorsed now by every sympathiser with the South; and I protest against the application of an offensive epithet to a society as much opposed to slavery as your own, and comprising every shade of religious and political opinion. Believing that the war is carried on to gain political preponderance and mercantile monopoly, convinced that the North can never subjugate their opponents, we advocate "Southern Independence,' in order to prevent the waste of life in America and the demoralisation of the operatives in Great Britain.—I am, &c.,

WM. ROMAINE CALLENDER, Jun.,
Vice-Chairman of the Southern Independence Association."

"Manchester, December 31, 1863."

With regard to the operations of the society which is thus fortunate in the influence and morale of its executive, it may be safely anticipated that, between now and the opening of Parliament, nothing will be left undone that may tend to give to the Confederate movement in Lancashire all the co-operative power that can be produced by unity of purpose, methodised action, and resources equal to the occasion. The public mind has now been so fully educated that the "implements of knowledge" may be put on one side, and undivided attention given to gathering the fruit. Memorials and petitions, some to Her Majesty the Queen, others to Lord Palmerston, others to Earl Russell, but the majority, in duplicate, to the "Lords Spiritual and Temporal," and "To the Honourable the Commons in Parliament assembled," are now in process of being signed in every town and almost in every cotton-mill throughout the district. The latest success, it may be remembered, that crowned the efforts of the association, was at Burnley, where, in an open meeting held a week or two ago, some thousands of the inhabitants, under the auspices of the civic authorities of the borough, declared by an overwhelming majority that it was the duty of the Government to enter into concert with other European Powers with a view to medicating between the belligerents. The following is a copy of the petition now in course of signature in that town:—

"To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled. The petition of the undersigned, the inhabitants of the Borough of Burnley, in the County Palatine of Lancaster:—

"Humbly sheweth, that your petitioners, in common with all their countrymen and the whole civilised world, view with feelings of the utmost pain and abhorrence the fratricidal war now raging in the States of America.

"That they regard the restoration of the Union, whether upon the old or upon any other basis, as utterly impracticable.

"They also consider the Southern Confederacy as having both the right and the power to maintain their present position as a nation, independent of the Northern Federation.

"Believing this, your petitioners look upon the attempt of the latter to coerce the former into terms of union by a further continuance of the war to be at once hopeless, unjustifiable and an outrage against humanity.

"They therefore beg most respectfully to press upon the Government of this country that it is due to the Southern Confederacy, as well as to the rest of the civilised world, whose commerce is so seriously disturbed by this hopeless strife, that England, in concert with other European powers, should recognise the existence of the Confederate States by receiving their ambassador and opening diplomatic communication with them as an independent Power.

"And your petitioners," &c., &c.

SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE ASSOCIATION OF LONDON.

The following is the Constitution and List of Committee and Officers of the Southern Independence Association, just formed in London:—

PUBLIC opinion is becoming enlightened upon the disruption of the late United States, and upon the character of the war which has been raging on the American Continent for nearly three years. British subjects were at first hardly able to realise a federation of States each in itself possessed of sovereign attributes: while, deriving their views of American history from New York and New England, they ascribed the secession of the Southern States to pique at a lost election, and to fear for the continuance of an institution peculiarly distasteful to Englishmen. Assurances were rife from those quarters that the movement was the conspiracy of a few daring men, and that a strong Union sentiment existed in the seceding States, which would soon assert its existence under stress of the war.

Gradually the true causes of the disruption have made themselves more and more manifest. The long-widening and now insuperable divergence of character and interests between the two sections of the former Union has been made palpable by the facts of the gigantic struggle. Their wisdom in council, their endurance in the field, and the universal self-sacrifice which has reconstructed their public and their private life, have won general sympathy for the Confederates as a people worthy of, and who have earned, their independence.

On the other hand, the favourable judgment which Englishmen had long cherished as a duty towards that portion of the United States which they imagined most to resemble the mother country, has met with many rude shocks from the spectacles which have been revealed in that land of governmental tyranny, corruption in high places, ruthlessness in war, untruthfulness of speech, and causeless animosity towards Great Britain. At the same time the Southerners, who had been very harshly judged in this country, have manifested the highest national characteristics, to the surprise and admiration of all.

Public men are awakening to the truth that it is both useless and mischievous to ignore the gradual settlement of central North America into groups of States, or consolidated nationalities, each an independent Power. They feel that the present attempt of the North is in manifest opposition to this law of natural progress, and they see that the South can never be reunited with the North except as a conquered and garrisoned dependency, while the Southern States [illegible] to leave their former partners [illegible] all the elements of great and growing [illegible] and wealth.

Our commercial classes are also [illegible] our best interests [illegible] with a people [illegible] a land [illegible] dence and [illegible] connection with the manufactures and the [illegible] of Europe.

In short the struggle is now felt to be [illegible] [illegible]

The Association will also devote itself to the cultivation of kindly feelings between the people of Great Britain and of the Confederate States, and it will, in particular, steadily but kindly represent to the Southern States, that recognition by Europe must necessarily lead to a revision of the system of servile labour, unhappily bequeathed to them by England, in accordance with the spirit of the age, so as to combine the gradual extinction of slavery with the preservation of property, the maintenance of the civil polity, and the true civilisation of the negro race.

THE "ELLA AND ANNIE."

(From the Bermuda Herald.)

WE have been kindly furnished with a full and exciting account of the capture of this vessel by one of the passengers on board. The conduct of Captain Bonneau, it will be seen, merits the highest commendation.

The Ella and Annie left Bermuda on Thursday, the 5th of November, at 12 o'clock, m., in company with the R. E. Lee, weather fine and clear, ship drawing nine feet water. Kept in company with the Lee until Sunday evening at dusk, when she hauled away to the northward. At 7 p.m. it commenced blowing heavy from N.N.W., and increased to a gale by 9, sky perfectly clear. At 10 o'clock we could not force the ship over five knots, as the sea and wind was very high (we had at this time 75 miles to run). At 11 passed two lights, which we supposed to be from the outer vessels of the blockading fleet. At 2 o'clock hauled in to Masonboro' Inlet, and at 20 minutes to 5 made the land [illegible]

A circular letter from one of the Freedmen's Aid Societies, begging cast-off clothing, bed clothing, and the like, for the negroes enticed from their former homes, has been sent to us, and it presents a terrible picture of suffering humanity. The Negro Mutiny at Fort Jackson.

THERE are many versions, ancient and modern, of the familiar story of the man who, having invented a new engine of destruction, was its first victim. But the fable of Phalaris has never been illustrated on so stupendous a scale and with such unexpected suddenness as in the case of that "black Nemesis" which the North has unavailingly invoked upon the heads of an innocent people, and which is already turning to torment its author. The Yankees placed the torch and the halter in the negro's hand and taught him to thirst for white men's blood; his first use of the lesson has been to practise it on his instructors. The Federal Government has armed and drilled the slaves of the South; their first independent act is to hold a fortress against the white troops of the Federal Government. So utterly confounding, so damnatory of their whole past policy, is the event at Fort Jackson, that the Washington authorities have taken extraordinary precautions to prevent the details from becoming known. It is only by fragmentary facts, too eloquent to be misconstrued, that we gain some idea of the gravity of that mutiny which a few steamers back was described as "a trifling affair." Since then, we learn that two regiments sent from New Orleans have failed to dispossess the mutineers; and next, that a naval expedition of two or three gunboats has been equally unsuccessful. Private letters reveal startling particulars. The blacks, it is stated, have hanged their white officers, some thirty in number, and with a truly barbaric defiance and taste for ghastly spectacles, they have swung the carcasses over the ramparts of their stronghold. In the city of New Orleans arrests of negroes of both sexes have been made on the charge of holding seditious meetings, singing "rebel" songs, praying for the success of the Confederates, and like treasonable practices. There is something grimly burlesque in Sambo and Dinah playing at "Secession conspiracy," but it is nevertheless singularly significant and suggestive. Without attaching undue importance to rumours which, from their nature, are liable to unconscious exaggeration, sufficient is known and admitted by those who have the greatest interest to conceal it, that throughout the Mississippi Valley the negro population is restless under Federal rule, that there are symptoms of dangerous fermentation among them which excite the liveliest apprehensions of the invaders, and that the negroes freely express the wish and hope for the return of their former masters.

We shall not fall into the error of generalising too hastily upon these facts, or of treating them as the Northern press does the rare instances of individual cowardice and apostacy, which are paraded as proofs of the latent "Union sentiment" among the Southern people. We are ready to admit that the volatility and childish waywardness of the negro's character, suddenly unsettled from its old basis of obedient contentment, will to some extent account for many of the phenomena to which we have referred. Apart from this we have it from the confessions of the Northern press, that the condition of the enfranchised blacks—especially of the age and sex unfit for arms—is such that they might well pine for a remand into slavery, even were that slavery all that Abolitionist fictions depict it. Left in huge camps, without that provident care and kindly attention to which they were accustomed in their servile state; in too many horrible instances left without shelter, clothes, medicine, and even food—these unfortunates are perishing at a rate which has extorted rebuke even in the callous negro-hating North. A less docile or more self-dependent race would have revolted long since against such intolerable suffering. At this time negro desertions into the Confederate lines are far more frequent than out of them, and there is not a camp of blacks which has not its bloody records of escapes frustrated by the Yankee bullets. A very large proportion, if not a majority, of these poor people were driven off like cattle from the plantations by the invaders, and the accounts of credible witnesses, such as the Rev. Mr. Mallet and Colonel Fremantle, leave us in no doubt as to the unsparing use of violence with which the boon of "freedom" is bestowed. It need not surprise us that such benefits do not elicit a very warm gratitude. But even the comparatively few who were enticed by visions of idleness and license, would soon wake to bitter disappointment and repentance under the pangs of destitution or the sharp discipline of the Northern task-master. All able-bodied negro males are now forthwith drafted into the army; field labour, where not wholly abandoned on the confiscated estates, being performed exclusively by the non-combatants. The negro who is forcibly torn from his wife and children, whom he knows to be dying of hunger and fevers, may well be pardoned for regretting, while being hurried on by the bayonets at his back against some rebel breastworks, the comforts and the indulgences of his lost home.

We do not, therefore, present the growing discontent of the enfranchised blacks with their new masters as a deliberate and rational decision of the negro on his own interest in the issues of the war, though if such a decision could be fairly given we are strongly convinced that it would sadly refute the favourite theories of a certain school of philanthropists. Nor do we believe that the mutiny at Fort Jackson originated with a political purpose. Cut off from every possibility of Confederate assistance, surrounded on the land side by impenetrable morasses, and from the river open to the attack of the Federal ironclads, the wretched mutineers have probably ere this met their doom at the hands of merciless judges. It was doubtless only a mad outbreak of disappointed expectations and of revenge against brutal tyranny. But with all these reserves, there still remains the great and significant fact that the negro, armed and left to himself, has first raised his hand, not against the Southern, but against the Northern white man. In the broad expanse of the Confederacy, where vast districts are denuded of their natural defenders, and helpless women and children, in isolated homes, trust solely to the protection of numerous slaves, not a single outbreak has yet occurred. More than this, all accounts from the South agree that the negroes are rapidly catching the wild enthusiasm of the white population in defence of home and country. Innumerable instances are on record since the beginning of the war where they have deceived and betrayed the invader, so much so that "the intelligent contraband" has almost become synonymous with "rebel spy;" but there is not a case known where a Federal commander has obtained valuable information through the treachery of a slave. An English officer of high rank, who traversed the South from the Texas frontier to the river Potomac, says that in his whole journey of several months through this blockaded and sorely distressed country, he has not seen a single man, woman, or child, white or black, begging for bread or asking alms. From the banks of the Mississippi, wherever are the armies of that people which is now revelling in luxury with no thought of to-morrow, there come the agonising cries of tens of thousands dying for want!

Is there no lesson in these facts to those who base strong opinions, affecting the welfare and happiness of millions of human beings, upon a total ignorance of the social condition of a great country, or what is worse, upon purposely falsified information? Will a suspicion never cross their minds that their honourable impulses in favour of human rights and progress are being vilely abused by designing men who laugh at their credulity? Will nothing open their convictions to the truth that the institutions of the South, whatever be their shortcomings and defects, do at least afford a protection, which no legislation can ensure, to a race indelibly stamped by nature with the mark of inferiority, and that it is better for the slave and son of a slave to trust to the humanity and to the self-interest of a single master, who, almost of necessity, belongs to a high social caste, than to find a master in every white man he meets and a despot in every vulgar brute with a white skin? History will have recorded itself in vain, if before the close of this American war, it does not prove so clearly that none but the wilfully blind can fail to see it, the identity of interest and of sympathies of the white and the black populations of the South. And it speaks volumes in favour of the negro and is a world of promise for his future development, that he—intellectually a child of lesser growth—cherishes, despite great temptation, with a child's affection the only country which does not treat him as an outcast.

The Court of Exchequer on the "Alexandra."

LAST term the appeal of the Crown in the case of the Alexandra came before the Court of Exchequer; and, as our readers will remember, after hearing the arguments on both sides, which were remarkable for their length, eloquence, and elaboration, the court took time to consider its judgment. On Monday, being the first day of the present term, the court delivered judgment; each of its four members in turn delivering his opinion on the case. The Lord Chief Baron adhered to his ruling in the court below. The senior of the Puisne Barons, Mr. Baron Bramwell, agreed with him. Mr. Baron Channell dissented, holding that the direction of the Chief Baron to the jury had not been satisfactory, and that on this account a new trial ought to be granted. The junior of the Court is Mr. Baron Pigott. He was, when this case came on at Liverpool, member for Reading, and has since been appointed to the Bench by a Government which has almost invariably bestowed its judicial appointments, after the American fashion, not on first-rate lawyers but on staunch political partisans. It is not to be supposed that the baron was even unconsciously biassed by political feeling; but it is not impossible that his preconceived opinion—for everybody had an opinion on this case, and it was the topic of general conversation—may have been known to the Ministry when they appointed him; and it is a pity that one of the judges in such a cause should have been nominated, pendente lite, by a party to the suit. His opinion was given in favour of a new trial; but as the court was thus evenly divided, he being the junior, according to custom withdrew his judgment, and the rule for a new trial was refused. The effect of this decision will be to leave the Government at liberty to appeal to what is called the Court of Exchequer Chamber, where, in this case, the judges of the two other superior courts (Queen's Bench and Common Pleas) will review the decision of the Court of Exchequer; and from them there lies a further appeal to the House of Lords. It is tolerably certain that, whatever the decision, the Government will not give up the vessel till it has exhausted all the resources of chicanery, and interposed every vexation, difficulty, and delay that the [illegible] suggest. [illegible] to the usage of [illegible] and that what the Ministry [illegible] or to ascertain the law of England, but to satisfy the demand, or at least to [illegible] the Northern States of America. [illegible] with Mr. Seward [illegible] the supposed [illegible] of the Confederate Government [illegible] release of [illegible] Confederate ships [illegible] in advance of legal [illegible] strain the law [illegible] for doing so. The damages [illegible] the pockets of the [illegible] but out of the public purse [illegible] interference, as long as the law [illegible]. We do not suppose that the Administration [illegible] that [illegible] to postpone the [illegible] as long as possible. In this point of view, the difference of opinion in the Court of Exchequer is exactly what they want. It gives them good cause for a further appeal, and it does not give them a new trial, which would be final, and would in all probability terminate in favour of the defendants. For even if it were held that the Alexandra was fitted out and equipped within the meaning of the statute, it remains to be proved that she was so equipped for the service of the Confederate States, and the evidence by which the Crown sought to establish this point was of a character likely to find [illegible] favour with any impartial jury. The policy of the Government, therefore, is better served by a [illegible] on the course of appeal, until the last of them is reached. And we do not doubt that the Crown lawyers will take care so to manage their case that it cannot come before the House of Lords until the session of 1865, thus postponing for twelve or eighteen months the release of the vessel; whereas, if the Court of Exchequer had granted a new trial, and she had been again acquitted, she must have been released at once. Such a procedure of chicanery, vexation, and injustice, tending expressly to harass the defendants and put them to enormous expense, is sometimes employed by private individuals of malignant temper and ample means, and its employment in such cases is always provocative of bitter denunciations of a system under which such things are possible; but this is the first time that the advisers of the Crown have had recourse to such a method of oppression.

The grounds on which the rule for a new trial was asked were substantially reduced to two: that the Lord Chief Baron misdirected the jury, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Considering the character of the principal witnesses for the Crown, it might have been as well to omit a plea which savours of impudence; and this would have been the more expedient as, in fact, the point really in dispute was simply one of law. Accordingly, no notice was taken of this pretension in the judgments of the two junior judges, who gave their voices for a new trial simply on the ground that the Chief Baron had misstated the law. The points at issue between Barons Channell and Pigott on the one side and their two seniors on the other, were briefly these: Is it or is it not necessary to a forfeiture under the Foreign Enlistment Act, that there should have been the reality or intention of an equipment distinctly warlike in character within Her Majesty's dominions? Is it necessary that the ship should be intended to leave those dominions in a condition of fitness for belligerent operations? Or is it sufficient that there should be an equipment of some sort, with an intent of the character contemplated by the statute?

It is admitted on all hands that a ship may be built for a belligerent Power, and that the equipment forbidden must be something distinct from the mere building. It is admitted also that the belligerent intent is essential; that merely to build and arm a ship of war, and sell her to the highest bidder, is not forbidden by the Act. The question is, given the intent that a ship shall be employed against a Power with which we are not at war, what amount of equipment will render her liable to forfeiture under the statute?

In the opinion of the Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Bramwell, the equipment must be of a warlike character, and it must be intended not merely that the ship shall be sold to a belligerent who shall take her away as a mere article of contraband and fit her out and man her as a ship of war elsewhere, but that she shall be fitted out as a man-of-war within Her Majesty's dominions. In the opinion of Mr. Baron Channell and Mr. Baron Pigott [illegible]

The equipment [illegible] of the Act [illegible]

[illegible] Words [illegible] foreign Powers, the clause would have [illegible] further as to make the constructing of such vessels an offence; as it was, the words were inserted to [illegible] a party [illegible], and in a place where they are little less than [illegible]. For, in fact, a ship chartered as a transport or store-ship need not receive any new equipment; and the only mode of [illegible] her is to hold that chartering her is an equipment within the meaning of the Act—which would be too absurd even for a lawyer. And yet, in order to [illegible] to this [illegible] will not meet. Mr. Baron Channell [illegible] the [illegible] sense of the clause upon which they have been fastened, and is content to enunciate the doctrine that you may not put a sail on a ship which you are going to sell to a belligerent government, although you may sell them the ship herself, or even build her to their orders.

A still stronger argument than this anomaly involves was urged by the judges who differed from Baron Channell. They pointed out that the Foreign Enlistment Act regulates not only the fitting out of new ships, but the repair of old; and that in the latter case it put upon the word "equipment" precisely that definition which the Chief Baron's charge had given it in the former. If a belligerent vessel come into port, she may receive new sails, new engines, new fittings of a peaceful or doubtful [illegible]; but she is not to be strengthened in any way for warlike purposes. She is not to receive new guns, or armour plates, or a supply of ammunition. It is reasonable to suppose that this was the meaning of the prohibition of equipment in the former clause. Otherwise the law would stand thus: the Alabama and the Florida, fully armed men-of-war, may come into our harbours and obtain sails, engines, and fittings of any peaceable kind; but the Alexandra, an unarmed vessel, may not. You may do that for the armed cruisers of a belligerent which you may not do for the ships he has purchased of you before they are armed; you may give an armed ship everything she wants, except armament; to an unarmed vessel, if she be destined hereafter to be armed, you may not supply a sailcloth or a hammock. It can hardly be conceived that it was intended deliberately to create such an anomaly, such a glaring absurdity, as this; by one and the same Act to grant a privilege to armed and refuse it to unarmed vessels. And yet this conclusion is inevitably involved in the interpretation given to the Act by Barons Channell and Pigott.

It will be observed that the judges are almost [illegible] in affirming that the clause applies [illegible] only to acts done, or intended to be done within Her Majesty's dominions. If any man within these equip a ship, or intend within them to equip her, for the service of the Confederate States, he [illegible] comes within the statute. But if a British subject [illegible]

Another Northern Disappointment

The North has [illegible]

[illegible] not be trusted? [illegible] implacable enemies? [illegible] Fort Jackson [illegible] Northern troops [illegible] We are not [illegible] Northern type. The Yankee [illegible] possible that Yankee officers can for any length of time subdue that aversion and that intolerance of the negro which in every Northern city marks the relations of white and black. The Yankee must change his nature before he seriously sets about conquering the South with negro armies.

The negro mutiny, carefully excluded from the columns of the Northern press, is the most important feature of the war news. Beyond this there is little to narrate or comment upon. Recruiting is the order of the day on both sides, and the efforts of the opposed commanders for the next two or three months will probably be confined, on the part of the North, to feeding their troops; on that of the South, to diverting to Southern uses as much as possible of the Federal supplies. The Confederate guerillas are active wherever a Federal army is encamped. General Pillow reports a raid into Western Virginia, in which 400 prisoners and a large amount of property have been carried off. General Rosse, with his column of horse, marched round the entire Federal army in Virginia. In Tennessee, Wheeler and Forrest are active upon the enemy's lines of communication, and against his trains and escorts; and Morgan, having reported himself at headquarters for service, is rallying round him, for a new blow at the Federals, hundreds of his old soldiers. In the meantime Grant, we are informed, has evolved a new and original plan of campaign, which will probably, in consideration of the chance of his running for the Presidency, be quietly burked in Mr. Stanton's department. Be this as it may, General Grant will need all his strategic talent in the next summer campaign. He has now opposed to him in supreme command, General Joseph Johnston, a skilful and daring officer, combining with the highest reputation for ability and energy a great hold upon the confidence of the Southern troops. Hitherto General Johnston has held a position in the South, very considerably inferior to that to which his name and rank entitle him. But a correspondence, as honourable to him as to General Bragg and President Davis, has lately been published, from which it appears that the comparatively minor part he has played during the last eighteen months was his own choice. He might, had he been so inclined, have superseded Bragg. But, to his honour be it said, he recognised the sterling qualities of General Bragg, and declined, having once been authorised to make a personal investigation into the relations between Bragg and his troops, to supersede him. The resignation of the latter has now been accepted, and Johnston anyway must accept the command. We anticipate great results from the change. Bragg, a good drill-master, a thorough soldier, and an able strategist, lacked the conditions of success—good fortune and the enthusiastic confidence of his troops. He expected, perhaps, too much of volunteers. His ideas of discipline were founded on the requirements of a regular standing army. Hence the misunderstanding and the want of sympathy that too frequently at the most critical moment frustrated the skill of the general and the courage of the troops. General Johnston has yet to win his laurels in the field. Wounded severely at the battle of Fair Oaks, and since that engagement occupied more in the reconstruction and organisation of the forces in the South-West than in their command in the field, he has now to grapple with one of the most energetic and successful leaders the North has produced. We have every confidence that Johnston will not belie his reputation; that, under him, the army of the South-West will soon emulate the triumphs which have illustrated the Confederate army of Virginia.

The great question for the next two months is that of recruiting. Both sides are drawing the net tighter. But there is the difference: that the one is fighting for independence, for life, honour—all that is dearest to man; the other for a dream of nationality. The draft in the North was to have been completed by the beginning of the year. It is postponed until the middle of January, probably to a period when offensive operations will not be carried on, and the whole strength of Meade's army may be brought to bear upon the recalcitrant Democrats of Northern cities. Can it be seriously hoped that the draft in 1864 will bring more conscripts than it did in 1863? Is it not far more probable that the extreme tension of the Conscription Act will more than ever defeat its object, and that its numerical results will be even less than those of last year? Altogether, things look badly in the North. These arrests of New York merchants and seizures of steamers laden with contraband goods for the South, show anything but a sound national feeling. It can hardly be doubted that where so many are found to run great risks in their desire to befriend the South, or at any rate to make large profits at the cost of their own government and cause, there must be a considerable undercurrent of hostility to the powers that be, which the conscription will not fail to develope. The South wants men and wants money; the sacrifices it has made in precious lives can never be liquidated by the North. But no city of the South refuses to yield its quota of men and money to a patriot army; no Southerners are found base enough to aid the foe of their country with weapons for the destruction of their own kith and kin. The North has its mighty armies in the field, its great fleets on the rivers and the ocean, but we have shown that there are latent energies at work which mock all this outward parade of strength, and which tend every day to equalise the resources of the contending Powers.

THE CASE OF THE "ALEXANDRA."

THE Barons of the Exchequer gave judgment on the motion of the Attorney-General for a new trial in the Alexandra case on Monday last. The Lord Chief Baron said that at the trial the warlike character of the vessel was proved, and it was shown that she was in all probability intended to be used by the so-called Confederates as a vessel of war. If the making, in pursuance of an agreement or order for that purpose, with intention to sell and deliver to one of the belligerents, the hull of a vessel suitable for war, but unarmed, and not equipped, furnished, or fitted with anything that enabled her to cruise or commit hostilities or to do any warlike act were a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, his direction to the jury was wrong in point of law; the verdict ought to have been for the Crown, and there ought to be a new trial. But if the commerce of this country in ships, whether ultimately for peace or war, was to continue, and, provided a ship left the ports of this country in no condition to cruise or commit hostilities, though she were of a warlike character, there had been no violation of the statute, then the verdict was right. And in substance this was the question between the Crown and the defendants, stripped of all technical difficulties. The Chief Baron then analysed the counts of the information, ninety-six in number. The first eight represented all the rest. As to those relating to the "attempting to equip," etc., there could be no attempting contrary to the Act, unless what was intended to be done would, when done, have amounted to an "equipping, etc." The question, then, turned on the words "equip, furnish or fit out," and the words "with intent to cruise or commit hostilities," in the 7th section of the Act. The statute was highly penal, creating a new crime; if the defendants had not done what was a punishable offence within the statute, no opinion of jurists, no decision of foreign courts ought to induce them to declare that the scope and object, the spirit and intention of the Act included the case before the court, though it were not plainly expressed by the Legislature. In this country there had been no court of criminal equity since the Star Chamber. In the opinion of the Chief Baron, no calamity would be greater than to introduce a lax or elastic interpretation of a criminal statute to serve a special but a temporary purpose. The court had nothing to do with the political consequences of a decision, and such an argument ought not to have been presented at all. Nor was any argument to be based on the supposed advantage or prejudice to this country from any decision. In his judgment, the case before the court was not within the letter of the statute, nor within the spirit, nor at all contemplated by those who framed the law. He thought the Attorney-General right in holding that no State could have required this country to prohibit those things which the Act forbade, and in declaring that the Alabama had committed no breach of international law. Now no one could doubt that the word "build" was purposely omitted in the 7th section. Building ships for war was not prohibited, provided they were not equipped with the intents named in the section. A comparison of the 2nd section, which, prohibiting enlistment, prohibited any participation therein by a British subject all over the world, with the restricted prohibition of the 7th section, lead to the conclusion that not the act, nor the intention, but the place was aimed at. It was the British port that was made sacred. So the 8th section forbad the addition to the warlike equipment of any foreign ship of war. A Federal vessel of war might no doubt come into our ports and repair sea damage; but on the theory of the Crown, the shipbuilder who did the repairs would become liable to prosecution as much as any one of the defendants. The Chief Baron then referred to the insuperable difficulties attending the grammatical construction of the clause. Then as to the "intent" charged, whose "intent" was meant? Who was charged with an intent to cruise or commit hostilities? According to all the rules of pleading it must be the intent of the person committing the act. There was no direct evidence that the persons equipping had any such intention, and so the charge failed. The Attorney-General would read it as though the intent was in somebody or other; that was contrary to the rules of pleading, and the decision in the "United States v. Quincey," and to all authority. The Chief Baron then called attention to Mr. Jefferson's answers; the first answer referred to arms and ammunition, not to ships at all. Mr. Jefferson said: "Our citizens have always been free to make, vend, or export arms. To suppress those callings because a war exists in foreign and distant countries in which we have no concern would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice." Why, the Chief Baron asked, should not this apply to ships and shipbuilders? In America it did: why not in England? Then, as to ships, Mr. Jefferson said: "The practice of commissioning, equipping, and manning vessels in our ports to cruise on any belligerent parties is entirely disapproved of, and the Government will take effective measures to stop it." There was no disapprobation in those words of a supply of ships, even ships of war. So the judgment in "United States v. Quincey," left the citizens at perfect liberty to sell an armed vessel to a belligerent. The Attorney-General seemed to think that if there were an intent and and anything whatever were done in pursuance of it, that was sufficient. With all respect for the opinion of so eminent a lawyer, the Chief Baron thought that not sufficient. The Attorney-General sought to distinguish between a supply of arms and a supply of ships, and for a singular reason. Her Majesty, he said, had power to prohibit the exportation of arms, but not of a ship, and that power was founded on an Act passed in 1833. Consequently the construction of the Foreign Enlistment Act, passed in 1819, was made to turn on an Act passed in 1833. The result of the argument on the part of the Crown was this. "A shipbuilder may build a ship of war, and arm it to the teeth and sell to a belligerent to commit hostilities against another belligerent; but if there be a contract and the ship have the slightest warlike character, no matter how utterly incapable she she may be of attack or defence, then the act is infringed." Thus a whole fleet of ships might sail through an Act of Parliament. Again, a British subject might buy a vessel of war rejected by our navy, fit it up and arm it, and sail away to a port of a belligerent to sell it; but an agent of a belligerent might not, after buying such a ship, put up a mast to reach his own country; yet an armed vessel of either belligerent might come into port fully armed and obtain any naval stores, if unwarlike; but being unarmed she cannot put up a mast to cross the sea. He refused to believe in a construction involving such inconsistencies. He was of opinion that the rule for a new trial ought to be discharged.

Baron Bramwell, after a few preliminary remarks, said that he thought the fair and natural meaning of the words was, that the "equipment" spoken of in the Act must be fit for cruising or committing hostilities. The word "intent" before to "cruise or commit hostilities" seemed put there on purpose to show this. Building was not prohibited. Selling was not prohibited. Could there be an equipment in order that a vessel might be employed to cruise, unless the equipment was calculated to enable her to do so? A man did not build a ship for another man with intent that she should go on a whaling voyage, unless he adapted her to that service. Section 8, by implication, permitted any equipment to a vessel already armed, provided it was not an equipment for war. In section 7, the probable object was to use comprehensive language, and to make it enough if the ship was equipped for warlike purposes. He thought that equipment only was prohibited which was itself such that by means of it the vessel could commit hostilities, and that no equipment which gave no means of attack and defence was within the section. The statute was intended to prevent British subjects being proximately or immediately in hostilities between foreign belligerents. The learned baron then reviewed the American cases, and declared that the "United States v. Quincey" was wrongly decided. A correct direction to the jury would have been: "If you are satisfied that the parties concerned were equipping or arming, or attempting to equip or arm, the ship claimed, with intent that it should be employed in the service of a foreign prince, to cruise or commit hostilities against others as alleged, find for the Crown; but such equipment must be of a warlike character, so that by means of it she is in a condition, more or less effective, to cruise or commit hostilities; otherwise find for the claimant." Then the direction of the Chief Baron was substantially correct, and the verdict was right. The rule, therefore, should be discharged.

Baron Channell regretted that he must differ from the Chief Baron and from his brother Bramwell. More imperfect or faulty wording than that of section 7 could not be conceived. Still, if a fair interpretation could be obtained from the language of the Act it was not necessary to go further. The statute was not a mere penal, it was a remedial statute. From the preamble he was induced to think that the equipment of ships to be employed at a future time for war, though not so complete in this country that the ship should at once be able to commit hostilities, might be within the Act. The main question turned on the words "equip with intent or in order that the vessel should be employed in the service of a foreign Power, with intent to cruise or commit hostilities." The act and the intent must be present to constitute the offence, and the act must be done and the intent must exist within the Queen's dominions. The Attorney-General argued that assuming the intent can be proved, then any kind of equipment would be within the case contemplated. On the other hand, the claimants explained the general word "equip" by the subsequent words "with intent, or in order that the ship should be employed in a given manner," and they said that the words showed that the equipment must be suitable for that employment. He thought the Crown, to justify the seizure, must show an equipment (either completed or attempted) of the Alexandra, in order that she might be employed, &c. And further, that this necessarily meant an equipment enabling or tending to enable her to be so employed. He did not think that the words "equip," &c. could include building. He did not pretend to say whether any particular act, as fixing the ship's bulwarks, was part of the building or part of the equipping and fitting out. That, he thought, might be a question for the jury. He did not even say that acts done to the structure of the vessel might not be equipments. He should say that one would be equipping a ship for an arctic expedition by strengthening her framework in order to enable her to resist the pressure of the ice. But he did say that equipping, furnishing, and fitting out were all acts subsequent in their nature to the building, and in speaking of which one contemplated the ship as already in existence. So far, he thought it clear that there must be an equipment for war; that an equipment which could not be used and was not useful for war, would not do. Suppose, however, that

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, December ...

BOTH Houses of Congress met in the Capitol at 12 m. on Monday, the 7th inst., and on Tuesday the Message of President Davis was laid before them. ... against the superior numbers of Grant at Chattanooga ... the Yankees into their fortifications. Strong reinforcements were sent to Grant to enable him to repair his disaster. At such a moment to send Longstreet away 150 miles upon an expedition of questionable success was not surely a prudent measure, and the giving way of the left centre at Lookout Mountain was its legitimate result.

The exchange of prisoners has not yet been resumed; and the howl of the Yankees over the alleged inhumanity practised upon their prisoners grows louder and deeper. In company with the correspondent of the London Times I visited the Libby Prison and the prison encampment on Belle Isle a few days ago, to ascertain from personal observation what amount of truth there might be in the statements of the Northern press as to the starving condition of the prisoners. We did not see one emaciated man. Without exception, officers and men were in fine bodily health, and showed no symptoms of wasting from want of food. But the kitchens into which we were ushered, emitting a steam of soup, and the bakeries, where the opened ovens displayed hundreds of large loaves of excellent bread browning under the heat, afforded the most satisfactory refutation of the lies of the enemy. The temperature of the Libby Prison was as comfortable as could have been desired, and on Belle Isle every tent was provided with a brick chimney, from which the smoke was curling up into the blue frosty air. The condition of the prisoners was far better, having reference only to the supplies furnished them in food and fuel, than that of our own armies in the field; but when the supplies sent to them from the United States were taken into the account it was positively luxurious. As we entered the Libby we found the passage-way obstructed with great piles of boxes just received from Fortress Monroe, while several wagons laden with other boxes were standing before the door. On entering the lofts occupied by the prisoners a picture of profusion met the eye. The rafters were thickly hung with hams of bacon and venison, beef tongues, Bologna sausages, dried fish, and other substantials; and around the walls, upon convenient shelving, were disposed cans of potted meats, sardines, green peas, jars of jam, currant jelly, and assorted pickles, bottles of Worcester sauce, and such appetising et cetera. The prisoners, to the number of 1,000, all commissioned officers, from the rank of brigadier-general down to that of second lieutenant, were confined upon six different floors or lofts. 75 per cent. of them were beguiling the tedium of their imprisonment with the ingenious stories of Miss Braddon and Anthony Trollope, or the last number of the Atlantic Monthly or Harper's Magazine. Great packages of books from the New York publishers were opening as we passed along. Of the remaining 25 per cent. some were playing whist and euker, and some pondering the gambits on the chess-board. One man, a colonel, was reading the Bible. From the prison we went to the hospitals, which we found in the best possible order, cleanly, well ventilated, lighted, and warmed. Out of the whole number of officers confined in the city but thirty were in hospital—only 3 per cent. of sick men as the result of the starvation and cruelty to which the Yankees say they have been subjected. On the subject of cleanliness I must not omit to mention that a corps of eighteen negroes are kept constantly employed in washing and sweeping up the floors of the Libby; wherein our inhuman practice differs from the régime of the Yankee prisons, it being the boast of the Northern papers that the Southern officers have had their pride humbled in being compelled to do all the menial work in those model establishments. Major Turner, the commandant of the Libby Prison, informed us that some of the officers of the highest rank confined there had voluntarily united in a written statement denying altogether the stories that are in circulation at the North with regard to their cruel treatment, which statement had been forwarded to the Herald and Tribune for publication. If these papers decline to publish it, Judge Ould will make it the subject of an official letter to the Yankee commissioner of exchange.

The escape of John Morgan from the Ohio penitentiary caused a thrill of joy throughout the Confederate States. His arrival is anxiously looked for in this city, and it is believed that his old followers, who have been widely scattered since his capture by the Yankees, will rally again to his standard on his approach.

The Virginian Legislature is now in session, having assembled on the same day with the Confederate Congress. The Message of Governor Letcher—his farewell Message, since his term of office expires on the 31st of this month—was full of excellent counsel and patriotic feeling. I am happy to inform you that he does not retire to private life without having perfected arrangements for the speedy payment in London of the arrears of interest on the State debt. The English holders of Virginia bonds may expect an early notification in the columns of the Times that they can call and receive their dues at some office not far from the Bank of England. This I state from positive knowledge.

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, December 30.

THE Federal Congress has been taking its holiday recess, and will not reassemble till January 5.

The result of the three weeks session in December may be recapitulated thus:—

The House voted, by a large majority, to prosecute the war until the last rebel lays down his arms, without armistice, mediation, intervention, or proposition or negotiation for peace from any quarter.

They voted with great unanimity in favour of supplying the Administration, without condition, with the means for executing its own programme in carrying on the war.

They refused to consider the motion to re-affirm the declaration with which the war was commenced, made in the last Congress: that it was for the restoration of the old Union, with all the rights of the States unimpaired.

Both Houses passed an Appropriation Bill for $20,000,000, to promote recruiting by bounties; and the House refused to entertain a proposition for restraining the employment of the money for the enlistment of Southern blacks, thus sanctioning, by permission, the Executive plan for raising black armies in the South, composed of slaves forcibly emancipated: in other words, organising armed insurrection of slaves against their masters.

These are the starting points of legislation in this Congress, which was at one time anticipated to be conservative; they show, by what has been done, what is to be the fortune of the measures which have been already agreed upon to be brought forward after the recess, as soon as the managers shall find it expedient.

The chief of these measures is a bill, already prepared by the Chairman of House Committee on Territories, to give legislative sanction and organisation to Mr. Lincoln's plan for the reconstruction of the Government, as expounded in his Message, and defined in the accompanying proclamation.

The plan is simple. The President is thereby authorised and required to take possession of and occupy all the insurrectionary districts enumerated in his proclamation of 1861 as in insurrection, and establish therein and maintain temporary military governments, until the "loyal" people therein shall, under the military supervision, organise new State Governments, "republican in form," and elect senators and representatives, who shall be "duly" admitted into Congress.

But a preliminary condition is affixed to the admission of even a "loyal" State thus created. The Constitution must contain a positive and peremptory prohibition of slavery forever within the new State, or the inhabitants will be remanded to the territorial condition until they impose the prohibition as directed.

The preamble to this Bill recites, as the controlling motive for this requisition, that "slavery is incompatible with a republican form of government."

If this be true the Government of the United States was never republican in form, and never meant to be. When it was created by the consent of the original States, slavery existed in nearly all of them. For seventy years it was conceded by all branches of the Government, and nearly all the people of all the States, that the existence of slavery in States was not only not incompatible with the republican character of the General Government, but that it so existed, and was absolutely beyond the reach of the Federal powers. This was the clearest possible demonstration of the restricted nature of the Federal Government, and of the inherent independence of the States in the control of their internal organisation and domestic affairs. The recital in an Act of Congress that all this time the social condition of the slave-holding States was incompatible with the existence of republican government is but an assertion in another form that the Constitution of 1789 was a failure from the beginning, and a new one is necessary, and that the military power of the Union is now to be employed in creating another form of Government, to be called more "republican," but which will lack the distinctive qualities which made the other, before it was perverted, the standard for Republican progress. It has neither the consent of the States to a new Union, nor of the people of the States to a new form of Government.

The whole Bill, and all the legislation of which it is a part, are based upon the same idea—at first denied, then disguised, but now openly proclaimed as the rule of action for the Government. It is, that the country is going through a process of radical change, really revolutionary, without the inconvenient resort, which the theory of Government here implies as indispensable to rightful authority, to the original sources of the powers of the existing Government, or the intentions of those who framed or those who accepted it. Constitutional forms are only valuable and to be respected in so far as they supply the dominant party with the central point for the aggregation and cohesion of all the powers and functions of Government, the control of the army and navy and treasury, the physical force, and all the resources of the whole nation and country, and enable them to work with the machinery of authority their own plans of what Government ought, in their interest, to be; and to succeed, at last, in fixing in themselves the permanent control of whatever government may be evolved out of these convulsions and these struggles.

The minority at Washington see these struggles and their objects, but have not the courage to confront them with any energy, beyond an occasional protest in words and a sudden collapse into submissiveness. It is as plain as the primitive sum in addition that two and two make four, that the party of the Administration mean to use the military power they now possess, and the pledged support of their enemies to the unconditional prosecution of the war, to create during this Congress new States within the territory of the Southern States, the condition of whose existence shall be sworn subserviency to the party in power, and furnish, by the additional weight they bring into Congress, such a preponderance, that no revolution of opinion in the North will be able to dislodge them for an indefinite period of time. A mere fraction of the population, in a corner of some State where the Federals have a lodgement are, if their loyalty to the powers at Washington be made sure, to be received as constituting a new member of the Union, and to balance by their vote in the Senate such old, populous, and powerful commonwealths as Pennsylvania and New York.

The scheme is an audacious one; but its audacity is the strongest proof of the confidence of its authors in the helplessness of their adversaries and the debased state of the public mind. Nothing but a revolution by force is likely to defeat it, and a revolution by force is not within the range of probability. There is no sensibility left among the mass of the Northern people on the subject of political or personal rights or theories of government. Some of them talk sometimes loudly and lament pitifully, and protest indignantly, against actions of the Government, which they pronounce to be lawless, tyrannical, and ruinous; but they invariably end in lending the practical support of all classes, to that which they have most condemned. There is no reason to think that it will ever be otherwise; certainly not in time to save any fragment of the principles, or anything more than a skeleton of the form of the old Government. There is no prospect of change in this respect until a reaction is forced, by defeats in the South and by the obstinate protracting of the resistance of the South, which shall disappoint the sordid objects which go so far to support the war purely as a means for gain, and some internal shock, brought on by financial collapse or otherwise, shall startle the voting classes into the necessity of a counter-revolution, peaceful or otherwise, to save themselves.

There are eminent and thoughtful men, and not in insignificant numbers, if they dared appear, who, powerless to arrest the onward march of the blundering multitude to ruin, have prayed for salvation to come to the North by Southern victories or foreign intervention, or anything which will bring the war to a close in any way.

The Presidential struggle is showing itself, irrepressibly. While Lincoln and Chase are apparently contesting the lead of the Republicans, the opposition have begun their demonstrations. The party calling itself the "National (Union) Conservative Party" has, through some of its most active managers, brought General M'Clellan forward, in a convention at Philadelphia, with General W. B. Campbell, of Tennessee, for Vice-President. The party is a voluntary association of some leading men, chiefly of the old Whig organisation, as it existed in opposition to the Democratic party before the present Republican organisation was formed. Some Democrats were with them; but the effort was plainly one outside of the Democratic party, and intended to influence the Democratic nomination, which it was to make hereafter, by presenting as a point of concentration a conspicuous Democrat, as General M'Clellan has been made by his war reputation to be. The principal members of the new organisation are border-State men, and this movement is an overture for a junction of the men of the border slave States with the free State Democrats in the next election, on a basis which shall reconcile the continued and unconditional support of the war with opposition, on high grounds of principle, to the Administration, in regard to the objects for which the war is waged, the means by which success is to be attained, and the uses to be made of the victory when it comes. I do not think the movement will amount to much, in the ultimate selection of candidates for the Presidency, or that it is likely either to effect much for success, or make success valuable. There is an innate profligacy in this attempt to win victory by false assumptions, designed to cheat one side or the other, which does not deserve to succeed, and will only lead to the firmer establishment of the ruling party in power, as the faithlessness and cowardice of the Seymour party in this State last year secured to their adversaries the easy victory of November.

I have no important army news to convey. The Federals report themselves in winter-quarters at Chattanooga, but not at Knoxville. The Confederates, under General Longstreet, are very active in that region—have had several successes of magnitude, sufficient to keep their adversaries very uneasy about their own safety in Knoxville. The Army of the Potomac is in winter-quarters, so said and believed, for the commanding general has been giving numerous furloughs to officers for a lengthened visit to distant homes. It is not certain, however, that the troops will not be further withdrawn towards Washington. The activity of General Lee makes the furnishing of supplies, where they are, so difficult that a retrograde motion is expected, especially as the organs are explaining in advance that it must not be interpreted into a retreat.

The bombardment of Charleston goes on slowly, but without sensible effect on the reduction of the city, or in destroying it. The monitors have ceased to figure as elements of the calculation. The naval authorities on the spot have almost unanimously pronounced them of little use, unwieldy, unmanageable, liable to be constantly out of order, and in action to be fatally damaged from land batteries, without having the capacity to reply effectually. It turns out that there is scarcely one of them which has not, in the attempt to take Charleston, been so injured as to need extensive repairs.

The Texan Expedition is getting slowly along the coasts, but has not yet penetrated into the interior, or encountered the "hog-wallow" prairies there, which, at this season, would swamp an army. It is not believed that any present use is expected to be made of the Federal troops in Texas, except to manufacture a Republican State out of the materials the army can make up, to be used as counters in the presidential game of next year.

The Union forces in Louisiana have not with so much difficulty in holding the western districts they had reached, that they have contracted their lines, and the Confederates, following close, re-occupy the country they leave. The farce of making a new State there on Lincoln's pattern will be limited for a stage to about one-tenth of the territorial area of the State. The rest is in possession of the Confederates.

The journals of the Confederate States are treating the President's proclamation of amnesty with little ceremony. Contempt is in them the prevailing feeling, varied by scornful defiance. There are Federal stories in circulation that somewhere in North Carolina Confederate soldiers have come in and asked to have the benefit of the amnesty; but there is no proof that this is true in fact, or if true, that it is anything more in amount than the common flow of desertions, which the papers have previously chronicled with so much exaggeration as proofs of the Unionism prevailing in North Carolina.

The subject has been noticed in the Confederate Congress, under circumstances upon which it may be proper to make some comment, in their connection with subjects and persons, not well understood, except by those who are well acquainted with the political history of the South in past years.

In the Confederate House of Representatives on the 18th of December, Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, introduced a preamble and resolutions expressive of the views of that body on the amnesty proposition of Mr. Lincoln. It was not discussed, but laid upon the table by common consent, as the most significant way of testifying the contempt of that body for the proclamation and its author.

The principal value of the record as a fact is, that it was presented by the same member who has been distinguishing himself at Richmond by the violence of his opposition to the administration of President Davis. Passages of his speeches have been republished in the Northern papers, and made texts for the renewed assertion that there is a submission party in the Confederate Congress willing to accept terms for a return to the Union. It is a fact of some significance that a leader of such a supposed party should tender for the mere formal declaration of Congress a series of resolutions, affirming it to be the "almost undivided sentiment of the people of the Confederate States" that there has never been a day or an hour when they were more inflexibly resolved than they are now, never to relinquish the struggle for independence in which they are engaged; and that "in spite of the reverses which have lately befallen our armies in several quarters, and cold and selfish indifference to our sufferings thus far, for the most part, evinced in the action of foreign Powers, the eleven millions of enlightened freemen now battling heroically for all that can make existence desirable, are fully prepared, alike in spirit and in resource, to encounter dangers far greater than those which they have heretofore bravely met, and to submit to far greater sacrifices than those which they have heretofore so cheerfully encountered, in preference to holding any further political connections with a Government and people who have notoriously proven themselves to be contemptuously regardless of all the rights and privileges which belong to a state of civil freedom, as well as of all the most sacred usages of civilised war."

The majority, Mr. Foote concurring, thought it unworthy of the dignity of their cause to make a solemn reaffirmation of this sort in respect to so preposterous an assumption as that of Mr. Lincoln—that the people of the South are at his mercy, and willing to buy safety by cowardice and dishonour. The Lincoln Message is met everywhere in the South in the same spirit. If a vote could be taken safely by the Southern people, within as well as without the Federal lines, the result would be the same. There is no pretence of Unionism anywhere, except where extorted at the point of the bayonet or manufactured by the army and its retainers.

You will have seen a good deal made of an opposition to President Davis, of which Mr. Foote is the reputed mouthpiece. He is quoted in the Northern journals for much more than he says, as in the case of the treatment of Federal prisoners by the Confederates at Richmond. They made much

The Government, however, is infected with the same prac-

The clamour about the starvation of the Union soldiers in Richmond was got up for a purpose, and is continued in some quarters, although there is abundant evidence, that, with the possible exception of an individual case, for a very brief time, under exceptional circumstances, the treatment of prisoners has been as good as the means of the Confederacy would allow. There is abundant testimony of late from Federal sources direct, that the fare of the prisoners is the same as the fare of the Confederate soldiers on duty. In one place, a Confederate officer is said to have behaved oppressively in this respect, but the case was examined into and the offender dismissed. The Government at Washington encouraged these reports of bad treatment, and circulated reports against the conduct of the Confederates, after it was proved that they were false. In the case of the supplies which were permitted to be sent down into the lines a slight delay occurred in permitting the transportation, but the obstruction was immediately removed. But the Government officials continued to send out day after day charges of inhumanity against the Confederates in refusing to receive their supplies, after they were received, and the good faith with which they were distributed had been freely acknowledged by the soldiers who received them. The South was abused by official insinuations, and more than insinuations, against the conduct of the Confederates. They are at length out of patience with the persistent malignity of misrepresentations, and have refused to be employed to dispense luxuries among their captives which the most opulent among themselves cannot get, and to be daily insulted for their prodigality of indulgence by being calumniated as barbarians and thieves. The prisoners will hereafter be treated simply as prisoners, on the fare with which the soldiers of the country, who captured them, are compelled to be content.

It is proper, in illustration of the character and dealings of the Union Government, to say that, when these refuted reports of the bad treatment of Union prisoners at Richmond came to the War Department, it immediately issued orders to the several prisons at the North, forbidding the receipt and delivery of any food or clothing or money for the relief of the Confederate prisoners, and that its orders were continued and enforced during all the time when the Confederates were receiving and distributing the relief sent to Union soldiers from the North; and, as I am informed, were enforced at the time the Confederates withdrew their consent to receive these contributions on their side.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Jan. 13.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THE money and discount markets are again becoming unsettled. It is very clear that the Bank of France is in an awkward predicament, and even a suspension of specie payments is mooted. If a fresh contract for the purchase of £2,000,000 has been entered into, and it is either taken for the Bank or the open market, we shall have again another financial pressure, which may be more serious than the last. Besides, the Indian exchanges are once more against us, and through an efflux on this account being inevitable already, the price of silver is rapidly advancing. The effect in a variety of ways must be discouraging, because with the rate at 7 per cent. here, if the Bank of France goes to 8, we shall have to follow, and up to March next, may, under such circumstances we suffer stringency. The payment of the railway deposits has abstracted a considerable amount from general channels, and notwithstanding it is only temporarily locked up, it will produce partial inconvenience. The next few days will give a clearer insight into future prospects. The Bank minimum of 7 per per cent. is the lowest price among the bankers and bill-brokers.

NEW DANISH LOAN.

A new Danish loan for £1,200,000, stock bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. at the price of 93, has just been announced by Messrs. C. J. Hambro and Son. The proposal is in conformity with the authority given by the Danish Diet and sanctioned by the king. The subscription is to be paid as follows :—10 per cent. on allotment ; 10 per cent. on the 18th February ; 10 per cent. on the 18th March ; 20 per cent. on the 18th April; 20 per cent. on the 18th May; and 23 per cent. on the 20th June. A discount at the rate of 5 per cent. will be allowed on the payment in full of the above instalments. The interest will commence on the 1st January, and will be payable half-yearly. The sinking fund will be 1 per cent. per annum of the nominal amount of the loan, together with the interest saved, and will be applied to the redemption of the bonds by means of purchases, as long as the price of the stock is under par, and by drawings by lot when at or above par.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security continues steady at the previous price, 38 to 40. To-day there is more animation than has been witnessed of late, and the quotations must be advanced to 39, 41.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion and specie movements at the Bank of England have again assumed an adverse aspect. During the past week there has been nothing sent in, whilst the withdrawals for transmission abroad have amounted to £469,000. The arrivals of specie have been rather large, amounting to £616,100, of which £256,000 is from New York, and the remainder from the West Indies and the West Coast of Africa. It is expected, however, that nearly the whole of the gold will be purchased for the Bank of France. The Syria, which has just sailed for the East, has taken £610,911 for Alexandria and Bombay. To Alexandria the amount of gold is £133,600, and to Bombay £65,900 gold, and £411,371 silver. The Oneida has taken out to the Brazils £112,500 in gold. The silver market has been very animated, and owing to the short supply prices have advanced. The Mexican dollars brought by the last West India steamer have been disposed of for China at 62d. per oz., being an advance of 1d. upon the rates previously realised. Bar silver has also been much in demand, and has been purchased to-day at 61¼d. to 61½d., showing a rise of from ¼d. to ½d. upon former quotations. The advices from Melbourne announce the departure of three vessels, having on freight altogether gold valued at £242,588. The Suffolk has on board 28,860 oz.; the Water Nymph 13,958 oz.; and the Omar Pacha 17,820 oz.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has not shown much animation during the week, and quotations are again lower. The very unsettled state of political affairs abroad, the farther large decline in the stock of bullion in the Bank of France, with a renewal of the withdrawals of gold from the Bank of England, have restrained the dealers from operating, and at the same time caused a gradual but steady decline in values, and the market closed this evening with a further downward tendency; but after the usual hours of business there was a slight tendency towards improvement. The closing price of Consols was 90⅞ to ⅞ for money, and 91 to ⅛ for the account, which is a fall during the week of ¼ per cent. Exchequer Bills continue to improve and are now quoted par to 4s. prem. The foreign stock market has been fairly active as regards business, but nearly all descriptions have suffered a considerable relapse. Greek Stock closed this evening at 23¼ to 23½, being a fall as compared with this day week, of ¾ per cent. Mexicans have declined 1 per cent., and are now at 35¼ to 35½. Spanish Passives have declined to 33½ to 33¾, or ⅞ per cent. lower, and the Certificates to 13¼ to 13½, a fall of ⅜ per cent. Turkish Six per Cents. (1854) are 89 to 90, and those of 1862, 67 to 67¼ ex. div., being, respectively, a decline of a ½ and ¾ per cent.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Only a limited business has again been transacted in American government, and railway securities, and with the exception of Virginia State Bonds, which have shown an improving tendency, under the expectation the dividends are about to be paid, prices generally have shown an unfavourable tendency. There appears at present very little disposition amongst the dealers to operate in this class of securities. The following comprise the transactions of the week:—Virginia State Five per Cents., 48 and 47 ; Do. do., Six per Cents., 31, 32½, and 32¾. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 77½ and 77; Erie $100 shares, all paid, 65. Do. Seven per Cent., Fifth Mortgage, 63; Illinois Central Six per Cents. 85, 84, 85, 83½, and 84½ ; New York Central $100 shares, 78 ; Pennsylvania Central Bonds, Second Mortgage, 87¾ and 87.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Although there has been a rather extensive business transacted in British railway shares, the market, in sympathy with the other departments, has not been well supported as regards prices, and with the exception of Bristol and Exeter, which have improved about ¾ per cent. as compared with this day week, quotations for most of the leading descriptions are lower. In Lancashire and Yorkshire, Metropolitan, and North-Eastern (Berwick) the fall has been fully 1¼ per cent. ; Great Eastern, London and North-Western, and Midland have each declined 1 per cent. ; and Caledonian, Great Western, London and Blackwall, Brighton, Manchester and Sheffield, North-Eastern (Leeds), Ditto (York), North Staffordshire, and South-Eastern from ½ to ¾ per cent. There has been rather a better business doing in foreign railway shares, but without any material alteration in prices. For shares in British possessions there has been a better demand than for some time past, and values have been steadily maintained.

BANK MEETINGS.

The first ordinary general meeting of the British and American Exchange Corporation, has been held at the offices, Bank-buildings, but the only resolution proposed was the re-election of the old directors; but this was opposed by several shareholders who wished to elect four additional directors; but this was strenuously opposed, and eventually the meeting was adjourned till the following day, without any further decision being arrived at. At the adjourned meeting the directors were re-elected, they having consented to elect an additional London and Liverpool director, leaving the question as to the two other directors open for the present.—At the adjourned meeting of the shareholders in the Union Bank of England and France, the report of the directors was unanimously adopted. The Bank is now amalgamated with two foreign banking establishments under the title of the European Bank, Limited. The net profits of the Union Bank of England and France were, during the seven months it was in operation, £1,050, which was ordered to be carried forward to meet preliminary expenses. At the first general meeting of the English and Irish Bank, Sir R. W. Cardin in the chair, a report was read showing that the gross profits of the bank had been £9,289, out of which all the current expenses had been paid, and doubtful debts fully allowed for, leaving a profit of £1,907, which it was agreed should be carried to the profit and loss new account. The report was unanimously adopted.—A special general meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of Australia has been held, Mr. J. J. Cummins in the chair, for the purpose of receiving a supplementary report from the directors, and declaring a dividend for the past half year. It appeared that the net profits for the half-year amounted to £86,178, which with £8,871 brought forward, made the balance of undivided profits £95,049. Out of this the directors declared a dividend of 8 per cent., which would consume £80,000, leaving a balance of £15,000 to be carried forward. Some of the shareholders objected to such a large sum being held over, and it was moved that so much of the report as related to the dividend should be rejected; but after a short discussion the proposition of the directors was carried by a large majority.—At the ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the London and Brazilian Bank, Mr. J. W. Cater presiding, the accounts presented showed that after providing for all preliminary expenses, &c., the net profits amounted to £13,566, which it was agreed should be applied as follows :—To the payment of a dividend, free of income-tax, of 17s. 6d. per share, which is equal to about 7½ per cent., and to adding to the reserve fund £810, thus raising it to £20,000, and leaving a balance of £137 to be carried to the next account. It was stated by the chairman that the business of the bank was increasing rapidly. The report was adopted by acclamation.—At a special meeting of the Land Mortgage Bank of India, Mr. S. Laing in the chair, it was agreed that the directors should be empowered to extend the articles of association, in order to be enabled to undertake the agency for the Credit Fonciers Company of the Mauritius and similar agencies throughout the British possessions in the East.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Union Bank of London held this afternoon, the report of the directors was adopted by acclamation. It stated that the net profits for the six months ending the 31st December, after payment of all charges, including the sum of £112,487 for interest paid and due to customers on their current accounts, and making ample provision for all bad and doubtful debts, amount to £114,323, which, with £668 brought forward from the June account, made together £114 992, out of which was declared a dividend of 18s. per share, free of income-tax, amounting to £54,000, and leaving a balance of £60,992. After deducting the sums applied in payment of the dividend and in addition to the reserve fund, amounting together to £114,000, there will remain a balance of £992 for appropriation in July next.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of New South Wales, held at Sydney, a dividend and bonus equal to 20 per cent. per annum, were declared. The net profits amounted to £73,263, and £3,110 had been recovered from bad debts, which, with a previous balance of £3,128, made a total of £79,201 for distribution. After payment of the dividend and bonus £4,801 would be carried forward.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of New Zealand, at Auckland, the net profits of the six months ending the 30th September was stated to be £39,524, which, with a previous balance of £1,668, made an available total of £41,192. Of this sum £27,000 was carried to reserve, thus raised to £60,000 ; while a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. absorbed £12,468, leaving £1,724 to be carried forward.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Commercial Dock Company, a dividend was declared for the past six months at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, upon the capital stock of the company, and interest at the same rate upon the first, second, and third instalments of the new issue of ordinary stock, both free of income tax.—The report of the Directors of the Peel River Land and Mineral Company, to be submitted at the half-yearly meeting on the 22nd inst., has been issued this afternoon. The report, which is of a very satisfactory character. To obviate certain defects, it is proposed to alter the date of holding the annual meetings; but as such a course may in the first instance cause a postponement of the dividend, it is intended, at the meeting to be held in June or July next, to propose a dividend on account, out of the proceeds of such portions of the wool clip of 1863 as shall then have been realised.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In produce, trade progresses steadily. Any important revival of speculation is checked by the uncertainty felt in reference to the future course of the money market. There is, however, sufficient demand for most of the leading descriptions of produce to lend fair support to prices, which are generally firm and in some instances advancing. A large business has been done in fine American butter at 2s. to 4s. per cwt. advance, 104s. to 108s. being currently paid. The arrivals of American bacon are moderate. Prime Eastern-cured sides meet a fair inquiry at 30s. to 40s. per cwt. New-scalded middles are held at 36s. to 38s. for short rib in, but sell slowly. Beef continues to arrive freely from New York, and quotations are still uncertain, as buyers hold off. Lard is well held, but is without activity. The grain trade has become less firm, and occasionally rather easier rates are taken for medium qualities of wheat ; but for fine, quotations are upheld. Petroleum sells steadily at 1s. 11½d. to 2s. per gallon for American refined, and £17 per ton for crude American. Turpentine is quite nominal in value ; French refined has receded to 73s. per cwt. on the spot. There is still an absence of demand for sperm oil, which remains at £75 to £77 per ton. Linseed oil, after drooping to 35s., has recovered to 35s. 6d. buyers. Rape oil is firm at 43s. for foreign pale and 41s. for brown. The tallow market continues to derive some support from political complications on the Continent, and is firm although inactive. The cotton market has become dull and prices are barely maintained. Some considerable transactions have taken place in Manilla hemp at 30s. to 40s. per ton advance, £34 to £35 per ton being the last prices paid for fair to fine roping. Russian hemp has not varied to any appreciable extent, but tends upwards in price. The first jute sales of the year have gone at 30s. to 40s. per ton decline from the rates of the last auctions. The sugar speculation is rather flagging, and the small amount of business done to-day was at a decline of 6d. per cwt. Saltpetre is at length attracting attention, several sales having been made at late rates to 6d. per cwt. advance. The heavy stock, however, checks any great amount of buoyancy in this market. The metal trade keeps very active, spelter brings £22 per ton on the spot; Straits tin £122 for arrival, and Scotch pig iron £3 7s. 3d. cash

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 13.

THE animation exhibited at our cotton market during the first two or three days of the year has not been maintained. The dealings have become far more circumscribed, and prices have again receded. This has in a great measure been caused by the threatening state of political affairs on the Continent, and the failure of the Manchester market in responding to the buoyant state of affairs here. The total sales this week have been only 17,000 bales, of which 4,900 were taken on speculation and for export. The sales this year to the date of making up the official returns were 43,180 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 51,290 bales. There have been imported this year 10,752 bales, against 37,005 bales last year. The exports this year have been 2 924 bales, and in 1863, 5,170 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 26,300 bales; same period last year 21,500 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 10,910 bales; same in 1863, 22,270 bales. Computed stock, 262,888 bales ; same period last year, 402,800 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were: American d s[illegible] t ons, 26d. to 28¾d.; Egyptians, 28d. to 33d.; Maranham, 28¾d. to 33d.; Bahia, 26d. to 26¾d., and Surats, 16d. to 25d.

MANCHESTER, January 12.

Our market keeps exceedingly flat and very little business is going forward. The demand for yarn and cloth during the past week has been of the slowest description, and great is the astonishment of many who anticipated a brisk trade on the opening of the new year, from the fact of the small excess in the stock of cotton in Liverpool at the end of last month, when the annual stock-taking took place.

To-day, the market has been stagnant. Continental politics, which are at present of such gloomy aspect, tend to keep the German buyers entirely out of the way of placing orders. The telegraphic advices to hand to-day from Bombay and Calcutta, advising exports of cotton from the former port during the month of December to be 160,000 bales, with dull demand for imports, and at the latter place an exceedingly stringent money market, with exchange at 2s. 3d. per rupee; all this combined with a prospect of dearer money in our own country, has put a damper on any disposition to enter into transactions of any moment, which might have been previously manifested.

A greater disposition is evinced to-day by spinners and manufacturers to close their mills after working up the materials now in process of work than has been the case before.

DIED.—On the 11th October, 1863, Honourable Samuel Chapman, of Cahawkon County, Alabama.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

With Depositories in other Cities, and a numerous Corps of Colporteurs, occupied in Distributing Tracts to our Soldiers in the Army and in the Hospitals.

Organised July 18, 1861, the Society has, from that time to the present, been supplying each Army of the Confederacy with religious reading. About Thirty Millions of pages of Tracts have been distributed amongst our brave soldiers. The seed has not been sown in vain. Numerous letters from Chaplains, Officers, and Privates testify to the great good which has been accomplished, and show that the Society has been instrumental, to a considerable extent in producing and sustaining the wonderful Revival with which God is now blessing our armies'

"THE ARMY AND NAVY MESSENGER,"

The Society's organ, is the most popular Paper in the Army. It has been recommended by General Lee, and by many other eminent Officers, who have contributed to its support. It is, pre-eminently, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Paper, specially designed to interest and profit them, amongst whom it is gratuitously distributed.

When it is considered that the choicest portion of the country is found in the Army, which will, of necessity, give character to the Confederacy, and control its destiny for years to come, the importance of sustaining this Institution, which seeks to consecrate to CHRIST this mighty influence, cannot be over-estimated.

The expenditure of means it involves is very great, and we respectfully solicit donations for the Society and for "The Messenger," from all, everywhere, who have at heart the religious welfare of our Soldiers, and the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please send your contributions to Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., Liverpool, who will forward them to

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

[illegible] from the [illegible] Federal accounts it seems that the Confederates are making some important movements in Virginia. A cavalry force [illegible], the [illegible] of the Federals in Western Virginia [illegible]. On the [illegible] January General Early, with three [illegible] of [illegible] corps, supported by [illegible] under Generals [illegible], M'Neil, and Fitzhugh Lee, having [illegible] down the Shenandoah Valley, drove the Federal pickets at Winchester as far as [illegible] Hill. From that date the reports are conflicting. According to one version, the Confederates are moving on the town of Winchester; and according to another, the Confederates are retreating from that place. Some anxiety was felt in Washington in consequence of a rumour that the Confederates were about to attack Cumberland, Maryland. The only certain fact is, that the Federals are not allowed to enjoy their winter quarters without molestation.

The Confederate salt works at St. Andrew's Bay have been destroyed, and the town of St. Andrews burnt to the ground. Having destroyed the salt works, the burning of the town was one of those acts of wanton barbarity which can only be checked by retaliation. If the Confederates crossed into Northern territory and burned a few Northern towns, it would produce a good effect.

From Charleston we learn that the gun-boat [illegible] has been severely damaged by a Confederate battery on the Stono River, three of her crew being killed and [illegible] wounded.

An expedition has left New Orleans, the destination of which is reported to be Mobile, but it is equally possible that it is intended for Fort Jackson, as we have no account of that place being taken from the [illegible]. At all events, Mobile is [illegible] prepared for an attack. According to late Federal advices from New Orleans, the whole of the Teche country, with the exception of a line guarded by [illegible], is in the hands of the Confederates.

In Western Texas the Federals have occupied Indianola. General [illegible] is rapidly organising his army to meet the [illegible]. The report of the [illegible] of the Confederates in the Cherokee country by a brigade of Indians is, we may be sure, a Halleck [illegible]. The Cherokee Indians are not very friendly to the Yankees, and then there is no reason why a Confederate force should be in that country.

In our note on the report of the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury which we [illegible], we omitted to notice an important paragraph in reference to cotton bonds sold in the Confederacy. Mr. Memminger explains that a very small amount of such bonds have been disposed of, and in view of his proposed financial scheme he recommends "that the law authorising their issue be repealed."

The following is the bill passed by the Confederate Congress against the substitute system:—

Whereas, in the present circumstances of the country, it requires the aid of all who are able to bear arms. The Congress of the Confederate States do enact, that no person shall be exempted from military service by reason of having furnished a substitute. Provided, that nothing in the foregoing clause shall be so construed as to relieve substitutes from any obligation or liability [illegible] or [illegible] by them as such substitute. But this Act shall not be construed so as to affect persons who, though not liable to military service, have nevertheless put in substitutes.

This was carried in the House of Representatives by a vote of [illegible] to 13. One objection to the measure was that [illegible] [illegible] in providing the [illegible] [illegible] it would [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible]. Another [illegible] was, that [illegible] [illegible] purposes. But [illegible] serve, it does not follow that all can be called out and at the same time, and such would not, under any circumstances, be the case.

In reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives, Colonel J. S. Preston, Superintendent of the Conscript Bureau, has furnished the number of persons exempt from military service in the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia—the four States in charge of that Bureau. The number in Virginia is 20,572; in North Carolina [illegible]; in South Carolina [illegible]; in Georgia [illegible]. The [illegible] of Colonel Preston to that [illegible] have been put in the [illegible] persons [illegible] illegal substitute papers are held by persons not in the service.

Last spring the Federal Government commissioned Adjutant-General Thomas to dispose of the plantations on the Mississippi that had fallen into their hands, that is to say, to lease them to loyal citizens [illegible] on easy terms. The lessees were presented with the implements and the standing crops, and in return were required to give to the Government half the cotton they found upon the estates and to pay the taxes levied by Congress on what they produced, amounting as imposed at one cent. per pound on cotton. General Thomas issued the following circular, in which he explains the classes who are to receive the free lands:—

NATCHEZ, MISSISSIPPI, October 27.

The following regulations for the government of the commissioners for leasing plantations are published for the information of all concerned:—

1st. The primary objects are to line the banks of the Mississippi river with a loyal population and to give aid in securing the uninterrupted navigation of the river, at the same time to give employment to the freed negroes, whereby they may earn wages and become self-supporting.

2nd. The property of disloyal persons of right belongs to the United States, and when required may be taken, and in the case with plantations, crops, &c., owned by these, where the commissioners may take possession of, and lease the plantations to loyal citizens.

3rd. The plantations of men of undoubted loyalty, especially those who have been so from the beginning of the rebellion, will be occupied and managed by themselves. In case they do neither, the commissioners may take possession and lease as in the above case.

4th. Men of doubtful loyalty, permitted to cultivate their plantations, will be required to take as a partner a loyal citizen.

By order of the Secretary of War.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

Seeing that the Federal Congress has confiscated the property of all persons who have been in the Confederate service or contributed to its support, and that all persons in the South have contributed to the support of the Confederate Government, it will be perceived that these [illegible] do not [illegible] the Yankees taking possession of [illegible] they may fancy. The fourth regulation is worthy of [illegible] further. It may happen that a Yankee [illegible] to attend to the affairs of a plantation. [illegible] [illegible] loyalty, and makes the [illegible] New Englander a partner. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] free labour will [illegible] [illegible] the Yankees [illegible] under the [illegible] [illegible] to give [illegible] each member of their families. [illegible] $7 per month to [illegible] and $[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] is death, and allowing for the [illegible] and deducting the cost of the necessary clothing and the [illegible]

[illegible] we continue to say the [illegible] has all [illegible] [illegible] his own master. The [illegible] is instructed to [illegible] [illegible] the amount of wages [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] General Thomas [illegible] that a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] very few [illegible] way into the pockets of the [illegible].

The correspondent of the New York World complains that the negroes have [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Federal Government [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Mr. William [illegible], a [illegible] of Norfolk, who [illegible] [illegible] "The [illegible]" [illegible] A General Wild [illegible] Mr. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. [illegible] [illegible] New Orleans [illegible] [illegible].

Our New York correspondent gives an interesting [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. [illegible].

The Federal Government [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] We know enough of Northern resources to affirm that the Federal Government cannot by any means procure another 1,000,000 soldiers. Just now nothing is said about falling back upon the negroes for soldiers.

Mr. Seward has long since discovered that there is no Union feeling in the South, and by this time he must be convinced that there is a considerable amount of non-Union feeling in the North. Every week we have to record fresh instances of disloyalty. The cargo of the blockade-runner, Annie and Jessie, was sent from New York, and the shippers have been consigned to Fort Lafayette. Mr Hilton, of New York, is in Fort Lafayette for contracting to supply machines for printing bonds and notes for the Confederate Government. The secretary of the Collector of New York, of course a staunch Republican, has been sent to the same prison for complicity in shipping goods to the South.

Major D'Armasy and Lieutenant Davis, Confederate officers, have been sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment in Fort Warren for recruiting within the Federal lines. The possibility of recruiting within Federal lines shows that the Northern commanders claim to hold more territory than they can gaurd, and we submit that, according to the law of nations, the lines of an invader do not extend beyond his pickets; and further, that for a Confederate to recruit in any part of the Confederacy is not a civil offence. We are curious to see a report of the trial of these gentlemen.

Governor Seymour, in his message to the New York Legislature, argues that the present military success of the Federals renders it the duty of the North to act with conciliation towards the South, and that the war, carried beyond a certain point, will exhaust the North, and roll up a debt that will ruin the country. This has given great offence to the Republican party; but Mr. Lincoln and his friends may be comfortably assured that a policy of conciliation will not stop the war. The only way in which peace can be brought about is by the acknowledgment of Southern independence; and beyond that the Confederates ask for nothing.

The weather has been exceedingly cold in the West, and some Confederate prisoners have been frozen to death. We elsewhere publish an account of this tragedy as given in a New York paper.

Mr. Lincoln has been nominated for the next Presidency by the New Hamphire Republican State Convention; and in the House of Representatives Mr. Arnold, of Illinois, has urged his re-election. The whole Federal Government is now engaged in electioneering.

In New Orleans some coloured "delegates" appeared in the "State Convention," and several white delegates withdrew. The convention is a mere sham, only consisting of the nominees of the Lincolnites; but the incident shows that even Mr. Lincoln's employees are not agreed upon the negro question.

The New York Herald of the 1st of January concludes an article on the commercial prosperity of the past year, by observing: "Considering the certainty of a collapse in Mr. Chase's system of paper issues, it is well to find our commercial community taking the necessary steps to prepare for it. When the crash does come it will be a severe one, and the suffering caused by it can only be alleviated by every man having his house in order."

The price of gold in New York on the 5th instant was 51¾, and on the 9th 52 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

M. JOSEPH MAZZINI has addressed a letter to the daily journals of this country declaring, "that he never did instigate anybody kill Louis Napoleon, that he never did give to any man bombs, air-guns, revolvers, or daggers for that purpose; that Trabuco, Imperatori, and Saglio were entirely unknown to him, and that no letter, with or without money, has ever been addressed by him to Greco in Paris. Mazzini admits that he knows Greco; and says that Greco is an enthusiastic patriot, and took an active part in the enterprises of 1860 and 1861 in the South of Italy, and that if Greco had any letter of Mazzini's with him, it must have borne a date of at least ten months ago." This letter must give universal satisfaction. It is a matter of pride to England that this country is a refuge to all political exiles, and that refuge will ever be zealously preserved; on the other hand, it is matter of deep sorrow that what ought to be but a place of safety should be perverted into a base of operations for the perpetrators of the most dastardly and pernicious of crimes. That feeling is intensified when the object of injury is an ally of England, and a man in whose safety the cause of order and prosperity for forty millions of people is bound up. We rejoice then that this plot against the Emperor has not been contrived on English soil.

There was a further increase of the pauperism in the twenty-one unions of the cotton districts last week. The additional number placed on the lists was 5,620, and inasmuch as the increase in the preceding week was 3,100, it appears that the distress is making head at a fearful rate. According to the reports of Mr. Farnall and Mr. Maclure to the Central Executive Relief Commitee, the number of applicants for relief in the week ending the 9th inst. had increased by upwards of 10,000 persons, owing to the closing of the mills. Well-informed people say that the number thrown out of work for some weeks to come will exceed anything that has yet taken place. At Stockport one of the largest mills in the district has cut down work from six days to two days in the week. At Blackburn about 5,000 mills are to be stopped. At Accrington, Darwen, Stalybridge, Ashton, Glossop, Hadfield, and Mottram, and many other places, spindles and looms are likely to be stopped altogether, while working on short time will increase. On all hands it is said that trade does not pay, and that spinners and manufacturers are becoming too impoverished to continue their present risks.

The results at the inquiry into the circumstances of the sale, equipment, and departure from Sheerness of the Confederate ship Rappahannock, late Her Majesty's screw gun-vessel, Victor, 6,350 horse-power, was announced on Thursday last at Chatham. It has been ascertained that certain officials at Sheerness dockyard have been guilty of a neglect of duty and a breach of the Enlistment Act. The Government accordingly determined to prosecute Mr. William Rumble, principal engineer and inspector of machinery afloat, and Messrs. Knight and Arnold, as agents of the Solicitor to the Treasury, were instructed to obtain from the magistrates a warrant for the apprehension of that gentleman. The accused was thereupon arrested, and held to bail. No proceedings have yet been taken against any other officials. The charge against Mr. Rumble is for hiring seamen and also for aiding in equipping the vessel. It is to be observed that the validity of the second charge will probably turn on the view which will be taken of the Enlistment Act in the Alexandra case. In that event we apprehend that some time will elapse before the Admiralty can obtain a conviction against Mr. Rumble.

On Friday last Mr. John Jones, Mr. Robert Highet, and John Wilding, were charged at the Liverpool Police Court, before Mr. Raffles, with a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The two first-named defendants are of the firm of Messrs. Jones and Co., of Liverpool, of which firm Mr. Bold is the principal partner, and John Wilding is a clerk in their employment. Mr. Highet appeared, but the other defendants did not. Mr. Lushington, instructed by Messrs. Bateson and Robinson, appeared for the Crown; and Mr. Deighton, instructed by Messrs. Littledale, Ridley, and Bardswell, defended Mr Highet. From the statement of the counsel for the Crown, it appeared that the case was in relation to the vessel named Japan, which had been built at Dumbarton in the early part of last year to the order of Mr. Bold. The three seamen named in the summons, with whose enlistment the defendants were charged, were John Stanley, Francis Glassbrook, and Benjamin Conolly, and they had been engaged at the Sailors' Home to proceed in the Japan on a voyage to Singapore on the 27th of March last, to be out for two years trading in the China seas. After signing articles they went to the office of the defendants, where they received advance notes, and were furnished with a passage to Greenock. Soon afterwards the ship started on her trial trip and did not return. She made for the coast of France, under the command of Captain Hitchcock, and on arriving off Brest she fell in with a small steamer, out of which she got guns and ammunition. From that steamer came also Lieutenant Maury and Mr. Jones. Lieutenant Maury went below, and returned on deck in the uniform of the Confederate Navy. He then took the command, declared the ship to be the Georgia, hoisted the Confederate flag, and invited the crew to join the service of the Confederate States. The bounty given was £10, and the wages £5 a month. Mr. Jones was present, and seconded the persuasions of Lieutenant Maury. Mr. Jones then went away in the steamer and the Georgia started on her cruise. These facts were deposed to by the witnesses Conolly, Stanley, and Glassbrook. In cross-examination Conolly said that on his return from Cherbourg to Liverpool he was taken by Mr. Macguire to an office in Water-street. Over the door of the office were the words "American Consulate." Macguire gave the witness £1 19s. 4d. a week as wages. That was for talking to several gentlemen and making a statement. The talking and statement took place to Mr. Taylor, in the office of Messrs. Duncan and Squarrey. He had also made the statement at Messrs. Bateson. The American Consul had been very kind to him. The £1 19s. 4d. was still paid regularly, but he did not know for how long a time the payment was to continue. He did not consider that he was acting as a spy. He got £3 from the office of the defendants to take him back to join the Georgia at Cherbourg. He served Macguire as a master; Glassbrook, who was also serving Macguire, introduced him to that person. John Stanley confirmed this evidence, and admitted that he had been in frequent communication with the American Consul, but he had the utmost difficulty in remembering what took place at those interviews, and fenced with the questions put to him in a most amusing manner. He also received from Macguire £1 19s. 4d. per week. Mr. Raffles bound Mr. Highet in bail to the amount of £300 and two sureties of £150 to appear at the Assizes to answer any indictment that might be preferred against him.

The case of the Pampero, the vessel recently seized in the Clyde by the English Government on the suspicion that she was intended for the service of the Confederate States, has come into the Court of Session in Scotland as an Exchequer case, and will be heard before Lord Ormidale.

The number of steamers which have left the Clyde since the commencement of the blockade of the Confederate ports is upwards of sixty, and their purchase price amounts in the aggregate to about £700,000. The selling and building of these vessels has been one of the most remunerative speculations of the year. Vessels are now leaving the Clyde for the trade at the rate of three or four a month.

Mr. Zachariah Charles Pearson, a bankrupt, was examined last week before the Commissioners. He seemed to have dealt largely in ships destined to run the blockade and to carry munitions of war, and his success was not commensurate with his enterprise. The Peterhoff was once his property, but had ceased to be so before she fell a prey to the cruisers of Admiral Wilkes and the decision of Judge Betts. Then Mr. Pearson joined Mr. Dobson in an adventure with the Modern Greece, but that vessel was wrecked and only a portion of the cargo saved. The Ann also belonged to the bankrupt, and was sold with the Peterhoff and Modern Greece to Mr. Dobson. The bankrupt also bought twelve vessels from Overend and Co., for eight of which he gave £88,000. He loss £14,000 by the wrecking of the Lord Byron, his clerk having neglected to insure the vessel. He sold one ship called the Merimac to the Confederate Government for £131,000. She was laden with clothing, gunpowder, and Armstrong guns, but the sale seems to have been annulled. Then he had a vessel, the Empress, which sailed from Hull to Rio Janeiro, and thence was chartered to New York, with directions to wait at New Orleans for the "warning," which according to the proclamation of President Lincoln was to be given. The Empress arrived off New Orleans at night, grounded, and was captured, taken to New York, and condemned. Then another ship, the Circassian, was seized on her arrival at the Havannah, and according to the opinion of the Solicitor-General and the Queen's advocate, that seizure was illegal. Then the Latona also was seized illegally, according to the belief of the bankrupt. It is to be hoped that some who engage in these ventures meet with more good fortune than Mr. Pearson, and when he starts afresh he may justly look for a happier fate.

The Great Eastern steam-ship was offered for sale by auction on Thursday last, in the cotton sales-room of the Liverpool Exchange, by order of the mortgagees. Only one offer was made, and that for £50,000, and thereupon the auctioneer declared the reserve bid to be £130,000. No advance being made, the ship was withdrawn from sale. It is expected, however, that she will shortly be put up again. The screw steamer Gibraltar (late the Sumter) was then offered, and speedily ran up from £2000 to £4,500, at which price she was sold.

The bark Lottie Sleigh, laden with eleven tons of gunpowder, and lying in the Mersey, blew up on Friday evening last at 7 P.M. On the Cheshire side of the river the shock was scarcely felt; but in Liverpool and Birkenhead the damage done and the terror created were beyond imagination. Bolts and fragments of the ship were hurled into Tranmere. The destruction of glass in Liverpool and Birkenhead was immense. The streets were filled with a panic-stricken crowd, and the utmost confusion prevailed. Fortunately but very few cases of personal injury occurred.

His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief has issued a memorandum of remarks on the Crawley court-martial. The verdict of acquittal has been ratified, and Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley is reinstated in command of the 6th Dragoons. The conduct of Major Swindley and Surgeon Turnbull is the object of severe animadversion. Notice is taken of the similarity of the animus displayed in their evidence at the Mhow court-martial, and therefore Major Swindley is removed from the regiment, while the conduct of Surgeon Turnbull is to become the subject of further inquiry. Adjutant Fitzsimon is also severely censured and removed from the regiment. The general tone of a portion of the officers of the regiment is declared to be deplorable, and it is hoped that the measures taken will be a warning to those who have escaped censure.

The English manufacturers are rapidly driving from the field the French firms which a short time since threatened to supersede them in the forging of armour plates for vessels of war. It will be remembered that several months ago, at Portsmouth, Messrs. Gaudet and Co., of Lyons, signally defeated the English plates, but from that time to the present the reverse of that result has invariably been realised. At Vincennes the defeat of the French plates was most signal, and they have now been condemned officially by Russia, Holland, and Sweden. The latest trial has been one held on the 27th December, at Copenhagen. On that occasion the plates tried were 15 ft. by 3½ ft.; each was 4½ in. thick and backed, to resemble the Warrior target, upon 18 in. of teak beams. The 68-pounder gun was used, loaded with the charge of 16 lbs. Messrs. Gaudet and Co.'s plate yielded at the third shot, that of Messrs. Cammell's, of Sheffield, went at the eighth shot, Messrs. Rigby's plate was destroyed at the twelfth, while Messrs. Brown and Co's yielded at the fourteenth shot. The last-named plate received the last nine shots in a space of sixty inches by thirty inches. The Danish Commission declared the order of merit to be, Messrs. Brown first, Messrs. Rigby second, and Messrs. Cammell third.

The Poet Laureate, in his remarkable poem on "love, madness, and murder," having caused his hero to slay a man in his passion, was compelled to extricate him from the proper consequences of the act by shipping him to Brittany, and there plunging him into a paroxysm of insanity. In our days a more facile mode has been discovered of evading the extreme penalty of the law. It might reasonably have been supposed that during the 1200 years, more or less, which have marked the epoch of trial by jury and of judges of assize, the ingenuity of lawyers and criminals would have discovered a method for defeating justice, even in its moment of triumph, if such a stupendous undertaking had been in anywise feasible. The consummation of that feat has been reserved for the latter end of the 19th century. Hanging is no longer a natural sequence of condemnation to death. It is not necessary even to adopt so complicated a method of escape as that devised in "Maude." For the rocks and waves of a rugged coast it is now only necessary to substitute the four walls of a criminal lunatic ward, and the office of the hangman is at once superseded. It is all very well for grave judges to sit in the scarlet and has resigned. The King has applied, not to the clerical Opposition, but to some members of the Liberal party. Nothing has yet been arranged. The clericals profess that they do not care for office. It is not improbable that the present Ministers may retain their position. Although they have not a working majority in the House of Representatives, they still have the majority.

A slight modification of the Portuguese Ministry is announced, interesting only to Portuguese politicians.

The Spanish Ministry having been defeated in the Senate upon the Bill it had introduced for the reform of the Constitution, or, more correctly, for abolishing a reform made in 1857, tendered its resignation, which was accepted, and a new Ministry has been formed under the presidency of Senor Lorenzo Arrazola, and composed of men whose names are not known out of Spain. It is only a transition Ministry. The return to power of Narvaez is by no means improbable. It will be remembered that at the general election, which took place only two or three months ago, the Ministry which has just fallen, returned almost all its candidates to the Congress, the Democratic party abstaining from voting.

The news from St. Domingo is very unfavourable to the Spaniards.

A storm is brewing on the Danube. The Hospodar and the Chamber of Moldo-Wallachia have resolved to pay no heed to the protests of the Porte and the great Powers against the confiscation of the monastic property. Up to this time the Chamber and the Prince have been bitterly hostile, now they are cordially agreed. Addresses of congratulation flowed into the Prince on New-Year's-day, and his Highness, in response, proposed the adoption of the Gregorian calendar and the suppression of religious communities.

According to the Memorial Diplomatique, Sir Henry Bulwer, the English Ambassador at Constantinople, who is at present staying in Paris, has drawn up, at the request of M. Drouyn de Lhuys a plan for checking these usurpations of Prince Couza.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, January 19.

THE discussion of the Address continues with even greater expenditure of words than during the first days, and with little less violence. Three long sittings have been devoted to the Treaty of Commerce, and the debate would probably have been continued as much longer on the side of the Protection members but that the Chamber got tired of it, and brought it, if not abruptly, at least somewhat arbitrarily, to a close. The paragraph was adopted on M. de Morny—speaking not as President of the Chamber, but of the commission on the Address—informing the House that in the discussions of the committee the authors of the amendment had refused any addition to, or qualification of, the paragraph, and had insisted on expunging the words "Your Majesty was right." Their omission would have been equivalent to saying "Your Majesty was wrong," and to a general condemnation of the whole system of commercial liberty so sparingly adopted in France. This attempt to call again in question a matter already judged is characteristic of the French temper, which refuses to consider the passing of a law as a final decision in principle. Having mentioned M. de Morny's name, it is only due to him to remark on the strictures which his way of presiding in the Chamber has elicited from some of the English press. His manner — compared with that of M. Dupin, who so long presided over the Chamber under Louis Philippe —is so much more débonnaire, and his conduct so impartial, that the complaint against him here is that he favours the Opposition. There is an absolutism in the French character which is inclined to allow small liberty to the minority, but readily puts up with a more dictatorial tone than an English assembly would permit. And if there is assumption on the part of the President, on the side of the Opposition there is a violence of attack and thinly disguised invective which goes far to justify the Emperor's unwillingness to expose his Government to the possibly damaging effect of such discussions. As no government can be practically perfect, and his does not even pretend to be so theoretically, there is always room for the objections of an Opposition, and when these objections are so absolute and unreasonable, and urged with so much acrimony as we have seen during the last week, it would be dangerous to encourage them in a country like France. Fair warning has been given that the Emperor rules and is determined to rule; he has shown that he has the wish to do so with the assistance of all parties; but if instead of assisting they obstruct him, he has also shown that it will cost him little again to silence them.

Attempts have been made in some of the English papers to cast a doubt on the truth of the Italian plot lately frustrated, or to lead their readers to believe that if in any degree true, it is only one of many always kept in preparation by the police to be used when occasion serves. No one here has the smallest doubt of the truth of the whole story. The conspirators are to be tried in the course of February, and the only effect of such opinions will be to deprive the culprits of the chance of mercy which they would otherwise have, for unless one or two heads fall in case of conviction, the allegation that the conspiracy is a police one may seem to be confirmed.

Letters from Brest of the 15th announce that the Florida has terminated her trials, which have been most satisfactory. Her new captain has made visits to the port-admiral and other authorities to announce his appointment. It is said that the Florida has given notice to the Kearsage, which continues to hover about the mouth of the harbour, that she will fight her early in February beyond the French waters.

M. Aucaigne has interrupted the series of articles which he had begun in the Moniteur Financier, to make a digression on the Confederate Cotton Loan, which is comparatively little known in France. He attaches especial importance to showing the large value of the cotton held by the Government of the Confederate States, and on which the loan is secured. He shows that, as a commercial transaction, the investment if a safe and must be a profitable one. He differs from Mr. McRae in regarding it simply as a loan "based on national good faith and liable to rise or fall with the vicissitudes of war," or that "the cotton basis would only come into play in case the struggle seemed likely to be prolonged." Nor does he agree with THE INDEX in the feelings of pride which lead it to consider the loan as a proof of sympathy and good-will as much as a financial operation. Alas! says M. Aucaigne, in these days of self-seeking, it is not for a moment to be supposed that so many people gave so much money on any sort of disinterested grounds. "Even in France, where the Imperial Government has done so much for the masses, that they persist in giving it overwhelming majorities on all occasions, we must not suppose that the incredible success of our loans is due to the people's love for the dynasty of Napoleon III. Doubtless these loans are in some degree based on affection and personal confidence in the sovereign, but their popularity is due above all to the order which presides over our finances, and the conviction that the State, though an excellent paterfamilias, is a still better debtor." M. Aucaigne shows that there is an ample supply of cotton in the hands of Government to meet all the demands of the holders of the Confederate loan, and he indicates incidentally that if President Davis's finance minister based his claims to credit, like Mr. Lincoln's, on the whole property of the country, there is enough cotton in the country to pay off the entire debt at the present prices.

M. de Girardin in last night's Presse quotes a recent letter in the Moniteur on the means of recruitment pursued in the North. As it requires no explanation, and every child can draw his deductions from the text, he contents himself with a series of exclamations, thus:

"To this the war they boast of has reduced a great country. It has led it to guilty enrolling, to criminal desertion; that is, to demoralisation and debasement! It has led it to the loss of liberty, whose negation is forcible enrolling. It has placed it on the road to a military dictature, to legal servitude and periodical revolution. Boast of your war, gentlemen, boast of it!"

We have a London newspaper, the International, now sold in the kiosks of the Boulevards. A number to which my attention has been called, contains a very able appreciation of President Davis's Message, from the French translation, which has been largely circulated here among the men of mark in politics and business. I understand that the indefatigable Mr. Slingsby, who, when he has slain a Walker or two, reposes himself with such light work, is preparing a German translation, which will be out in a few days. As I mentioned in my last, the extracts which had appeared in the continental papers gave a very imperfect idea of the President's meaning, and the reproduction in extenso has been eagerly sought after.

The Archduke Maximilian is expected here in the first or second week of February, and the Mémorial Diplomatique, which may be considered his organ, announces that his stay will extend over several weeks, as the new sovereign is desirous of coming to an understanding with the Emperor on all questions of home as well as foreign policy. He is determined on his new throne to show that he has left behind him in Austria the traditional ingratitude of Hapsburg. There is a rumour that he will be received here with the title of Emperor, but it is hardly probable, as such a display would be very unlike the unpretending ways of the Archduke.

I avoid the Danish question. It is not yet so clear that he who runs may read, but now that it is in motion it threatens to run far too quickly to make it a safe subject to write upon. It is a very pleasant one for the Constitutionnel, which has found in it a congenial theme on which to play the variations which its leaders were so much in want of. After for weeks harping with that wonderful variety of praise whose ingenious wording, ever new, seemed each day to have exhausted the vocabulary, only to produce on the next a still more neatly turned panegyric, it now reverses the medal, and is bent on proving the reverse can be made as delicate a marvel of pencraft as the obverse. Having praised the Emperor's proposal for a Congress, it now has the opportunity, and good use it has made of it, to triumph over the blindness of England, which refused what was offered, and asks for what M. Drouyn de Lhuys, echoing Lord Russell's own words, shows to be so impracticable. Unlike, however, the generality of writers, M. Limayrac's honey has more pleasant surprises for his readers than his gall. There is a flatness in the letter which I only account for by remembering what a pleasant sparkling beverage honey will produce, and comparing it with the dull bitter of the other, which acquires its flavour only from the pen it passes through. The writer in the Constitutionnel evidently trusts to his pen for his bitterness, while he has an inexhaustible supply of sweets in his own disposition.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, January 20th, 1864.

By the death of his Grace the Duke of Cleveland, the Confederate cause has lost one of its staunchest friends in the north of England, while the Southern Independence Association in Manchester is deprived of the aid and counsel of one of its most valued supporters, whether as a munificent patron or as a vice-president, who took the deepest interest in the successful working of the institution, and who was among the first to stamp with his unqualified approval the principles it enunciated and the objects it sought to attain. It was but a few days ago when the noble duke addressed a letter to the secretary, congratulating the association upon its labours during the past six months, and renewing in the warmest terms the expression of his unabated sympathy with the Southern cause. In short, the interest which his grace continued to manifest in the progress of the Confederate movement in Lancashire, is only equalled by the cordiality that distinguishes the following letter, in which, in August last, the noble duke accepted the invitation to become a member of the committee:—

"RABY CASTLE, August, 22.

"SIR,—In acknowledging the receipt of the circular emanating from the Central Association at Manchester for the Recognition of the Confederate States of America, I have no hesitation in stating that in every paragraph, in every syllable of that address, I most cordially agree. Of all wars that have ever been heard of in Christendom, there never has been anything equal to the slaughter and barbarity of the civil war raging in America, of which it does not appear that, raging as it has done for so great a length of time without any object that ever can be realised, it is drawing any nearer to a conclusion than at its commencement. Every man in the Southern States is ready to die sooner than consent to the Union; and Mr. President Lincoln, with his blood-thirsty Cabinet of Washington, sooner than give way in his nefarious object, threatens to slaughter by the sword every individual in the Confederacy. Can anything be more horrible—can anything be more revolting to every Christian? It is quite evident that nothing can now alter this state of things, without the interference of the European Powers. The Emperor Napoleon is quite ready to recognise the Southern Confederacy, if joined by the English Cabinet. Those two Powers will, in my opinion, have no difficulty in putting an end to this horrible war, but which cannot be done without their joint interference.

"I can have no objection to your adding my name as a member of your committee.

"I am, sir, &c.,

"To the Secretary, &c. &c. CLEVELAND."

Mr. Frederick Peel's speech, addressed the other evening to the free and independent electors of Bury, has been so fully reported and commented upon by the London and provincial press, that a passing reference to it would appear sufficient in this place, were it not for an extremely curious article upon it in yesterday's Star. The text upon which the Anglo-federal organ discourses after its own singular fashion, is as follows:—"To a bystander," (said the right hon. gentleman), "it would appear that that dreadful war must have created a gulf between the Northern and the Southern people, more impassable than the widest seas or the loftiest mountain barriers by which nature ever separated one people from another;" and Mr. Peel very sensibly suggested, and the electors of Bury as sensibly approved of the suggestion, that the only termination to this fearful struggle could be no other than either separation or military subjugation. Now, to the Star this opinion seems very "plausible," but—very erroneous; in fact, if Mr. Peel had only looked deeper into the subject and taken a broader view of history he would have avoided the fault of drawing so mistaken a conclusion. According to the Federal print in London, the reasoning of the right hon. member for Bury may be all very well in its application "to European or Asiatic society," but he ought to know history better than to extend it to America. Is not Mr. Peel aware that the difference between a "homogeneous whole," such as Austria, Russia, or England, and "a Confederacy," is so great, that no experience derived from the one is any guide to a statesman or a politician when his attention is directed to the other? Poland, Hungary, Venice, and "the many provinces and tribes of India, the Caffres of South Africa, and the Maories of New Zealand, can only be retained by the tenure of military subjugation because the several holders are "homogeneous wholes;" but the Southern States of America after conquest will, it seems, reunite with the North, and the bonds of Union will be mutual respect and good-will; slavery being abolished, there will be nothing to quarrel about, and all will go on as usual before these differences began. "Constitutional liberty will be re-established with the re-establishment of constitutional authority. The suffrage and the ballot-box, the caucus and the election, will be untouched. Southern Senators and representatives will re-enter the halls of Congress. Southern citizens will obtain their just share of public employments. There will be no proscription, no persecution, no disabilities. Was ever rebellion repressed at so great a cost and punished with so light a penalty?" The South will forgive, if not forget the past: the memories of deeds associated with the names of Turchin, M'Neil, and Butler will be cherished with no feelings of indignation; there will be no bitterness in the remembrance of Mr. Lincoln's last Message, which, like old Tarquin's cane, lopped off only the tallest of the poppies; the vacant places of President Davis, General Lee, and (in Homeric phrase) other "shepherds of the people," might suggest feelings of tender regret—but nothing beyond. If the right hon. member for Bury had known more of American character, and if he had properly discriminated between American feelings contrasted with "European and Asiatic," he would have seen this pleasant vista of the future as clearly as does the Star. The reasoning of Mr. Peel is condemned by the Star as "plausible;" this may be an objection to it, but the reasoning of the Star will certainly escape such an imputation.

A political speech from the hon. member for Bolton (Mr. T. Barnes), whether delivered in or out of Parliament, is scarcely a public event of universal concern. But at the same time it is worth while to listen when a representative of the material interests of Lancashire—himself a cotton-spinner of considerable estimation, and a "Northerner" into the bargain, gives utterance to his opinions as to the crisis in the manufacturing districts, and incidentally, though ever so confusedly, as to the civil war in America. Upon the cotton question, he said:—

"There were some who wished to relieve the distress in Lancashire by transplanting the people, at the public expense, to some other part of the world; but he believed that had the matter been distinctly brought before the House it would have been condemned for many reasons. Emigration was an excellent thing for many persons who had as much money in their purse as would keep them for twelve months after they landed in the foreign country; but it was a very different thing to send thousands of people to a strange land, without funds to sustain themselves after they got there, and without friends to assist them in finding work. Emigration, under these circumstances, would be considered anything but a good remedy for the ills of Lancashire. It would be little better than consigning two-thirds of the operatives to death within twelve months. The true remedy for Lancashire was more cotton, and he who could show where more cotton could be got would be rendering vast service to the county of Lancashire."

The honourable gentleman then proceeded to specify certain sources of supply, but he cautiously refrained from advising his hearers to put too much trust in them. In his zeal, however, to multiply the fields of free-grown cotton—"for he felt anxious to keep his own conscience clear in the matter"—he had recently purchased land in Jamaica, and was employing a person resident there as his agent to work out his scheme for him. There were already forty acres sown with cotton, and a sample of the crop was lying on the table before him. "But," concluded the honourable gentleman, "the question comes—will it pay? for it will not do to grow cotton upon benevolent principles, or upon generosity principles, but upon commercial principles." From his little angulus terrarum in Jamaica to the broad plantations in the Southern States, and thence to the war, was a natural transition in the speech of the honourable member for Bolton; and upon the last named subject Mr. Barnes spoke as follows:—

"He was not going into the history of that struggle; the whole question, so far as they were concerned as a nation, simply had been and was—what shall we do? The answer he should give was—'Let them alone; do nothing.' He was sure every person in this country was anxious to see the war brought to a close. When would it close? The answer to that question was known only to Him who rules in Heaven above. Looking to both sides, there was no indication of a cessation of the strife; stern determination on the part of the North that they will make the South submit; stern determination on the part of the South that they never will submit. He saw no end to it, except it be the utter annihilation of one or the destruction of the other. The power of the North was so great that it might be able to carry on this contest until the South was destroyed; but if the sole object of the North was to bring the whole States once more under one Government, and the North not purchase their object too dearly

... or tested something that has taken formed such a mere fractional ... the case. At the conclusion of the paper, the tenor of the discussion which ensued confirmed very generally the view of the writer.

The ... tale we have heard of late from certain ... quarters ... that we had seen the worst of the cotton famine, and that by March next the Relief Committees might bring their charitable labours to an end ... a fair way of being verified by the event. At the last meeting, for instance, of the Central Executive Committee at the Manchester Town Hall, Mr. Commissioner Farnall reported an increase of pauperism during the previous week of [illegible], and in addition to this, a further increase of about [illegible] was reported on the books of the local committees. The ... of a large number of mills and the general ... of employment were assigned as the causes of this well ... appalling complexion of affairs. Nor were the deliberations of the Salford Relief Committee scarcely of a less gloomy character. One of the members (Alderman Davies) said he had expected that by this time the working people would be in a fair way of being fully employed, but he was sorry to find such was not the case. It was distressing to see, as he had seen, young women receiving only from 7d to 2s per week for from three to five days' work. He, like others, had been ... that next March the labours of their committee would be at an end, but he was feared that bad times were coming. Other members joined in the general cry of complaint, stating that "the present ... had been held out was ... and that ... would emigrate, so as to escape from their deplorable privations, ... the manufacturers would not be able to obtain half the number of hands they required." The Manchester Guardian in its commercial article this morning is also of opinion that, bad as things are, "worse remains behind." After reviewing the state of the cotton market, it says —

"Taking this general view, ... too, that they must abate more in the price of their products than is conceded to them in the price of their raw material, and that, ... they will have to accumulate stocks ... the present quantities, greatly reduced as they have lately been, spinners and manufacturers are not ... of carrying the reduction further ... for a settled purpose to do so. Even the spinners of ... to ... twist and weft, at Bolton and other places, are now suffering so severely from the disproportionate degree in which the price of their raw material has risen, as compared with that of their products, that they are now commencing a curtailment of work. The returns from the Relief Committee and the Board of Guardians show a great ... in ... distress, but it is to be feared that we have not seen the worst."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE ON THE "SITUATION." Last night (Wednesday) Mr. T. M. Gibson addressed a meeting of his constituents at ... Town-hall. The hon. gentleman devoted considerable time to discussing American affairs. At present we have only space to observe that his remarks were a ... New York Herald ... One sentence will prove the justice of this remark. Mr. Gibson said: "In the first place, the present rebellion is being understood abroad ... as a revolt against democracy, the rights of labour, and human nature, and that the triumph of the Government guarantees to immigration its great reward of peace, prosperity, and freedom."

Total	$7[illegible],447,[illegible]
	$7[illegible],447,[illegible]

In order to estimate the amount of Treasury notes in circulation at the date of this report, there must be added the further sum of $[illegible] for the two months which have elapsed since the date of the above schedules.

The balance of appropriations already made by Congress, and not drawn on 30th September, stood as follows: —

War Department	$[illegible]
Navy Department	24,41[illegible]
Civil, miscellaneous, &c.	56,2[illegible]
Customs	[illegible]
Total	$476,[illegible]

The estimates submitted by the various Departments for the support of the Government, are made to 1st July, 1864, the end of the fiscal year, and are as follows: —

Legislative Department	$[illegible]
Executive Department	[illegible]
Treasury Department	22,[illegible]
War Department	4[illegible]
Navy Department	13,[illegible]
State Department	[illegible]
Justice Department	[illegible]
Post-office Department	[illegible]
Total	$4[illegible]

If these estimates be extended to embrace the remaining six months of the calendar year, they must be doubled, and that sum added to the undrawn appropriations would make an aggregate of $1,1[illegible], which Congress is formally called upon to provide. It is obvious, however, that the amounts to the credit of undrawn appropriations cannot be called for, inasmuch as there remain but three months of the present calendar year to be provided for, and the expenditures are limited to $[illegible] per month. So too as to the estimates. Any measures which will promptly reduce the currency will act upon prices, and thereby materially reduce the estimates. But the large figures exhibit to us in a distinct and tangible form the problem which we are now required to solve. The currency has by this time attained dimensions of five times its proper size. The estimates are based upon prices fixed by this condition of the currency. If these estimates are to be supplied by new issues of currency, prices must again increase, and large additions must be made to the figures which represent both currency and estimates. It is obvious, therefore, that some other mode of supply must be devised, and the necessity is equally ... of reducing the currency. We are thus ... presented with ... two conditions, as necessary elements of the problem to be solved, namely, reduction of the existing currency, and a supply of means from some source other than Treasury notes.

In a former report it was shown that $1[illegible] was probably the amount of currency which could be put in circulaitself by taxes alone. Loans, also, are necessary; but in order to negotiate them an assurance must be given that the interest will be paid in a medium of certain value. The departure from this principle has undermined our credit, and our first effort should be to recover our first position. We must make the interest of any loan, which is to be offered, payable in specie or its equivalent.

The $15,000,000 loan has taught us a mode of effecting, at least in part, this desirable result. A duty, payable in coin, is allowed to be discharged by the coupons of this loan, and the result is that the bonds have maintained a steady value—their market price being nearly twice that of other public securities. If, then, a loan were established, the interest coupons of which would be available to pay specie dues, a foundation in the nature of a specie value would be secured, and upon it might be reconstructed the sound financial policy with which we started.

To effect this, it is only necessary to levy a tax payable in coin, and as such a tax would not be required to pay more than the interest, its amount would obviously be within the power of the Government to collect. A loan of $500,000,000 would be sufficient to reduce the currency to $200,000,000, and would require a tax of not more than $30,000,000 annually. Such a tax could be readily borne by the country, and if this were all that is required, the remedy would be easy. But a simple reduction of the currency, while it would abate the existing evils, would not preserve the country from their recurrence. In twelve months the currency would again become redundant. It is necessary, therefore, that an absolute limitation shall be fixed upon issues. A guarantee must be given that the $200,000,000 left in circulation shall in no event be increased; or, in other words, that whatever supplies may be necessary, shall be raised by other means than by issues of Treasury notes.

2. And this bring us to the consideration of the second point of our inquiry, to wit: the raising of the necessary supplies.

It has already been stated that if the currency could be reduced to $200,000,000 the annual money expenditure of the Government could probably also be reduced to $400,000,000. This amount is proposed to be raised partly by taxes, and the remainder by an extension of the loan already proposed—say $100,000,000 by taxes, and $300,000,000 by the loan. The returns to the tax act of August, 1861, have been completed for nine States; two more have been partly completed and can be estimated. The total values of property in these eleven States amount to $4,220,000,000. If we deduct from these values the conjectured value of property lost and in possession of the enemy, and add the increased rate of present prices, the valuation upon which a tax would be rated may be fairly set down at $3,000,000,000. A tax, ad valorem, of 5 per cent. on this value would nominally produce $150,000,000. Allowing an abatement of 20 per cent. for evasions, failures to make returns, expenses, and contingencies, there would remain $120,000,000.

A loan of $1,000,000,000 would be sufficient to absorb the currency and to furnish $300,000,000 for supplies, and the interest of this loan would require one-half of the amount raised by the tax. This would leave the other half, or $60,000,000, for the supplies; and to this would be added the proceeds of the income and profit tax, payable after 1st January. A tax of this kind is so uncertain and so easily evaded that it cannot be estimated beforehand. It will, in no event, however, be sufficient to induce any change of other measures; and, therefore, we must rely for any deficiency upon that portion of the Treasury notes which will be substituted for the old issues. The $60,000,000, or one-half, which is to support the loan, if made payable in coin or in the interest coupons of the loan, will furnish the means as well for the interest of the $700,000,000 required for the currency as of the $300,000,000 to be applied for expenditure. In the same manner, by making further additions to the tax, the loan can be increased from time to time so far as to consolidate the whole public debt; or, as the war continues, to obtain further supplies for carrying it on. By these means the credit of the Government will be firmly established, confidence will be restored, and the embarrassments which now oppress us will be removed.

But, thirdly, the measures to be adopted must be prompt and certain.

Delay in retiring the currency would aggravate all the evils which are in existence, by adding new issues to the mass already in circulation. Uncertainty as to the effect of the measures in withdrawing the excess, would be equally injurious. No one would be willing to accept a loan which might again be depreciated by a redundant currency. Even with all the inducements which may be offered, and the caution which may be observed, the loan itself may not be taken in sufficient portions to secure the result. Voluntary loans have already been offered and have not been taken. It is therefore necessary to provide some mode which will absolutely secure the final result in any event, and this can only be done by providing compulsory measures for use as a last resort. The measures may be adjusted so as not to press upon the willing, while they merely compel the unwilling to take their just portion of the burden. With these explanations, I respectfully submit the following measures as those which I would recommend for adoption:

SCHEME PROPOSED.

1. That Congress forthwith authorise a loan of $1,000,000,000 in 6 per cent. bonds, the principal payable in 20 years, the interest semi-annually; to be extended hereafter, from time to time, so as to consolidate the whole public debt.

2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorised to sell at par as many of the said bonds as will be sufficient to take up the outstanding currency, and to pay the appropriations made by Congress.

3. That deposits of Treasury notes on account of the said loan may be received at the Treasury or any of its depositories, or by commissioners to be appointed; said deposits to be in sums of $100, or of which 100 is a perfect divisor.

4. Certificates shall be issued for such deposits, which shall entitle the holder to bonds for the amount, with interest from the date of deposit. If the deposit be made in the month of January, the bonds issued for the same shall be exempt from the tax of five per cent. for the present year, hereinafter mentioned; if made in the month of February, they shall be exempt from one-half of the tax; and if made in the month of March, they shall be exempt from one-fourth of the tax. Officers, soldiers, and seamen, in service shall be entitled to exemption from the whole tax for sums paid at any time before 1st April, 1864.

5. A tax of five per cent. shall be imposed on all property and credits (other than the new issue of notes hereinafter mentioned), which may be held on the 1st of April next, to be paid on the 1st July, one-half in Treasury notes, and one-half in coin or coupons of the bonds issued for this loan.

6. In case the coupons should advance in the market to a premium exceeding 25 per cent., any tax-payer shall be permitted to pay his tax in Treasury notes of the new issue, with 25 per cent. added.

7. Within six months a new and improved issue shall be made of $200,000,000 of Treasury notes in substitution of that amount of old issues, and all the old issue shall be cancelled and the faith of the Government pledged not to increase said issues.

8. Notice shall be given to the holders of Treasury notes (other than the said $200,000,000), requiring them to present their notes at the Treasury, or at some of its depositories, on or before the 1st day of April next, and receive payment thereof in bonds of the said consolidated loan, or in default thereof, the notes not so brought in shall cease to be current or receivable at the Treasury for dues; but shall remain evidences of debt, payable by the Confederate States according to their tenour.

9. In the States beyond the Mississippi, the time mentioned in the last clause shall be extended until the 1st day of July.

10. Six months more shall be allowed all holders of Treasury notes to come in and register and verify their notes as demands against the Treasury, and exchange the same for a certificate of debt; or, if they prefer to keep the notes, the name of the holder shall be endorsed thereon, after which the said notes shall be negotiable only by special assignment; and all notes not so registered within the said time shall be barred from any further claim on the Government.

11. Any holder of a bond of the Confederate States may convert the same into one of the bonds under this loan, the 8 per cent. bonds at par, and the others at a proportionate rate; and the loan shall be extended so as to absorb all bonds which may be offered in exchange.

12. The interest coupons of this loan shall be held equivalent to specie in all future dealings of the Government, and shall be accepted in payment of any tax hereafter made payable in coin.

13. The faith of the Government is pledged to make adequate provision for the payment of the principal and interest of the said loan by the continuance of the tax mentioned in Article five, until a census shall be taken, after which, like provision shall be made by direct taxes, or by duties on imports and exports.

14. The notes of denominations under $5 shall not be affected by the provisions of this scheme.

It will be perceived that the measures proposed naturally divide themselves into two distinct characters, the one voluntary, the others involuntary. The former are deemed adequate to induce the voluntary aid of every good citizen. It cannot be considered a just objection that the others are added when such addition merely gives unity to the plan, and, like a tax execution, affects only those who are negligent or delinquent in performing a public duty.

The first class of measures, or those which induce voluntary action, are the following:—

1. The offer of a loan on bonds, with interest coupons, receivable as coin or its equivalent.

2. The means by which this is effected, namely: a tax upon all values to be paid in coin or in the interest coupons of the said bonds.

3. The exemption of the bonds from the tax for one year in consideration of a prompt advance of the purchase money in anticipation of their delivery.

4. The reduction of the prices of all articles of subsistence, and the permanent restriction of the volume of the currency.

The measures which are involuntary are chiefly two, which will be considered under the following heads:—

5. A limitation of time beyond which Treasury notes now in circulation shall cease to be receivable as currency and for public dues.

6. The registration of the notes as evidences of public debt.

1. And first, as to the character of the proposed loan. It is intended to consolidate all the various forms of public debt. Every holder of a bond, call certificate, or Treasury note, may exchange his security for bonds under this loan. The Treasury note holder, for reasons applicable only to that kind of security, is required to make the exchange within three months from the 1st of January. The bond-holders are allowed their own time, or, if preferred, they may retain their old securities. It is hoped that the inducements offered will bring them all in.

The necessity, which will be on each tax-payer, to find specie or the coupons of these bonds, will induce him to invest part of his means in them. And the fact that the whole of the coupons will be required to pay the tax, will create a demand which will impart to them a fixed value approximating to specie.

2. The means adopted to effect this result are the laying a tax upon all values to be paid in coin or in the interest coupons of the said bonds.

A loan of $1,000,000,000 would require a tax of $60,000,000 to pay the interest, and, if such a loan could be relied on to supply all demands from money for the current year, no larger tax need be imposed. But it will be found that at least $60,000,000 more in addition to the existing taxes will be required. It is therefore proposed to levy a tax of $120,000,000, and to allow one-half to be paid in Treasury notes, while the other half is made payable in coin or in the coupons of the said bonds. To raise this amount, it has already been shown that a tax of 5 per cent. on all values will be required. This tax is laid at a date just twelve months subsequent to the tax of the present year. It is proposed to lay the tax equally upon every object of value, so that each person will contribute in exact proportion to his means.

The existing taxes, it is assumed, have been enacted with just relation to the income arising from real and personal property. The new tax, therefore, imposes a uniform duty ad valorem, on all property. In doing so, it encounters the objections which have been raised under the provisions of the permanent constitution against such a tax upon lands and negroes. It is contended that the provision which declares that no direct or capitation tax shall be laid unless in conformity with an enumeration which, by a previous clause, is directed to be actually made within three years, prevents the imposition of any tax upon land and negroes until that enumeration shall be made. The land and negroes in the Confederate States constitute two-thirds of the taxable values; and, if this objection prevail, it would establish the surprising conclusion that all the States which ratified the Constitution, while engaged in a war which put at hazard the lives and fortunes of all their citizens and their own independence, are excepted from the contribution to maintain that war.

Such a construction is manifestly erroneous, and could never have been intended. The more consistent interpretation is, that a principle was established which should operate as soon as the basis for its action was obtained. As soon as the enumeration could be taken, there was to be an apportionment. But if an enumeration became impossible, then the tax must be laid according to the other rule of uniformity declared by the constitution. There is a general power to lay taxes which becomes subject to a special limitation as soon as an enumeration can be had. That enumeration is ordered to be taken within three years, but it is prevented from being taken by the presence of a public enemy. Under such a state of things, the limitation must be considered as in suspense, and the general power may be exercised. It seems to me, therefore, that the ad valorem tax is no infringement of the constitution.

In the present condition of the country such a tax is more equable and beneficial than any apportioned tax would be. The occupation of large portions of States by the enemy would cast the whole quota of any State upon the unoccupied portions. The States which are in this condition would have the largest quotas to pay on account of their larger representation, and thus the burden of the tax at present would be inverted. The greatest sufferers would be required to bear the heaviest burden. In either view then the ad valorem tax is greatly to be preferred.

The requirement to pay one-half the tax in coin or in the coupons of the consolidated loan will create in every tax-payer a desire to possess these bonds. Just in proportion to the extent of his property will he have occasion for the bonds, and a universal demand for them will be created by making the tax universal. Those who have small amounts to pay will purchase the coupons as is now done with the fifteen million loan. And an exemption being given to small property holders, there is but little danger from speculation or inability to procure a supply.

All uncertainty on this point, however, is removed by the provision which authorises payment in Treasury notes, if the market price of the coupons should advance to 25 per cent. premium. It is necessary to allow some advance in order to furnish inducements to purchasers of the bonds. It is believed that the range proposed will secure this object, while it affords sufficient protection to the tax-payer from any combination of capital. The tax, therefore, while it induces large purchases of bonds by large property holders, is adjusted to the wants of those who are unable to purchase the bonds. It also offers the strongest inducements to holders of commodities to offer them for sale instead of hoarding for higher prices. They will perceive that, if they retain their commodities until the currency becomes contracted, it will require a much larger quantity of them to be afterwards sold in order to pay their quota of the tax.

3. The next subject for consideration is the exemption offered for an advance of the purchase-money of the bonds.

The 5 per cent. tax is proposed to be laid upon all values held on the 1st July 1864, excepting the $200,000,000 of new currency. The bonds to be issued for the consolidated loan, are, therefore, included in all other bonds and securities. But the advantage to the public is so great from retiring the circulation promptly, that an offer of exemption for one year from the whole tax on these bonds, is made to any person who will pay in Treasury notes on account of the loan in the month of January; an exemption of one-half is offered those who will make such payment in the month of February, and of one-fourth to those who will pay in the month of March. It will not be practicable to deliver so large an issue of bonds within this period of time, and the exemption, therefore, not only compensates for the advance, but for the delay in furnishing the bonds. The officers and soldiers in the army being prevented by their duties from attending promptly to their private business, are allowed the privilege of the entire three months for profiting by the exemption. Any payment made by them before the 1st of April will entitle them to exemption from the tax on the bonds thereby purchased. On the 1st of April the privilege of conversion is taken away on this side of the Mississippi River, but it continues for three months more on the other side.

These measures, it is believed, will be sufficient to procure a prompt and needful reduction of the currency. Each person in the possession of currency will thus be enabled to convert into bonds, based on specie values, notes which, at the time, cannot command more than one-fourth of those values. Those who hold commodities are in a still better condition to profit by the loan. A farmer may sell his grain for five times the ordinary price, and invest the whole amount in a bond, payable in twenty years, in specie, the interest coupons of which are available to discharge a liability to pay in coin.

4. There remains one other inducement to voluntary subscription yet to be considered, namely: the reduction of the price of subscription, and the permanent restriction of issues of Treasury notes.

The parties who are most likely to be the largest contributors to the loan are banks, manufacturers, railroad companies, and persons of capital. To all these, in an especial degree, the establishment of the currency, upon a permanent footing, is of the utmost value. No such permanence can be had if the new issues are continued. A restriction which keeps the currency within just bounds increases the value of every railroad fare; adds to the rate of interest; reduces the price of all labour and subsistence, and restores confidence and stability to all transactions. The amount at which the currency is to stand is set down at $200,000,000. This is about twice the amount required before the war. It is supposed that the large amounts which are suspended in the hands of public officers and in transit will call for a much larger amount of circulation than in time of peace.

Moreover, after so large an expansion it would be unwise to contract the currency in a compass as small as its natural bounds. In order, also, to prevent the evils incident to too rapid a contraction, it is proposed that the $200,000,000 of of new currency shall be issued from time to time during the period of contraction, and only in substitution of that called in, so that when the 1st of April shall arrive, at which time the old circulation shall become uncurrent, there may be a new currency to take its place. It may be added that, if the contraction should become too stringent, the banks will be able, and will probably find it expedient to relieve the pressure by the reissue of their own notes.

Such are the inducements which are offered to recommend the consolidated loan to public favour. They are so large and beneficial that they will, in all probability, secure its success. Unfortunately the consequences of failure are so perilous to the public welfare that nothing can be left at risk. Even the time which will be consumed in the effort to procure voluntary subscription cannot be recovered in case of failure. The measures of prevention must therefore accompany the invitation to voluntary action. They will be harmless and inoperative, if not required; absence of them would be ruinous, if the occasion for them should arise.

5. We come, therefore, next to consider the measure which limits the time within which the notes must be brought in for redemption or be deemed the [illegible]

It cannot be [illegible] of the [illegible] itself is a [illegible] after the [illegible] to the [illegible] by mere [illegible] part of [illegible] and Congress [illegible] the [illegible] a legal [illegible] the creditors [illegible] other [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] property and [illegible] [illegible] would be [illegible] finds itself [illegible] [illegible] great [illegible]

It gives less time to accept the payment, and if he should prefer to [illegible] the [illegible] the simple [illegible] [illegible] It does [illegible] an honest debtor in [illegible] is bound to do, it recognizes its debt, offers the best security for payment in its power, and asks for time. This, in plain terms, is the proposal of the Government; and, if it were the case of an individual, his creditors would meet, and, as a body, would accept his offer. In the case of the public the creditors cannot meet. But they have representatives who can. The Congress represents the people as well as the Government, and although it may be difficult to act for both parties, yet it is not difficult to ascertain the claims of justice, and Congress is the proper tribunal to adjust them. Their judgment in the matter should stand as a composition between the parties.

2. The next reason which will be considered is that the continuance of the notes as a circulating medium to their present extent involves the ruin of public and private credit, and will deprive the Government of the means of defending the lives and property of its citizens. If the currency remains in its present expanded state, no measure of relief can be made effectual. Prices must advance, and the means of the Government to pay these prices must daily lose efficiency. Taxes become fruitless by reason of the depreciation of the money. The army can neither be paid, clothed, nor fed; arms and munitions of war can no longer be supplied; the officers of the Government cannot be supported, and the country must [illegible]. Calamities so disastrous must certainly be averted by every means within the power of the Government. No contract, however solemn, can require national ruin; and in such case the maxim must prevail that the public safety is the supreme law.

The objection to these measures of compulsion is greatly mitigated by the certainty that but a small portion of the notes will be brought under their influence. The inducements to the loan are so many that the greater part of the currency will be voluntarily converted, and the true question is, whether the [illegible] which remains shall be permitted to gain an undue advantage over the rest, and to defeat the great public interests which are involved in the withdrawal of the entire amount.

These measures, it will be perceived, contemplate a permanent financial policy, capable of expanding to suit the future wants of the Government. It is obviously, therefore, of the utmost importance that the ultimate payment of the bonds now issued, and of those which may be added, should be completely secured. Confidence is one of the largest elements which enter into public credit, and in this case the means are at hand to secure it. The South is in the possession of products which are desired by the whole world.

For at least five years after a peace, the demands for these products will probably so far exceed the supply, that a duty on exports would fall upon the consumer. For the five years following, the usual contest between producer and consumer will possibly divide the burden, but the necessities of the country offer a controlling reason for the continuance of the duty. To this may be added a certain portion of the duties on imports; and the two together, if now pledged to a sufficient extent, would provide an adequate security for the payment of the debt. Assuming that, when trade is re-established, we shall have the same products to export, and, in a few years thereafter, the same quantity to sell, our exports and imports may each be set down at $300,000,000. Any export duty of 10 per cent. on all products of the field and forests, would, upon this assumption, produce $30,000,000 annually, and, if an equal portion of the duties on imports be added, the aggregate would be sufficient to pay the whole interest of the debt. If Congress would now pass a law to this effect, as it is perfectly competent to do, the public credit would instantly [illegible] [illegible] would be exposed, [illegible] which could be adjusted by regulations of this department.

The report of the Commissioner of Taxes herewith submitted will exhibit the details of the war tax of August 1861, and of the taxes of the present year, so far as [illegible] made. The tax of 1861 had been actually collected from the people in only three States—South Carolina, Mississippi, and Texas. In the other States the tax was paid by the State Governments. Assessments were [illegible] in only ten of the States, and the results are exhibited in the schedules annexed to the report. The total value of the property assessed is $[illegible], of which real estate is set down at one thousand three hundred and ninety-three millions, and slaves at one thousand four hundred and eighty millions. The total amount of the tax assessed is $21,[illegible], of which $19,[illegible] has been collected, leaving a balance uncollected of $2,[illegible]; of this balance $[illegible] is covered by an unadjusted difference in assessment claimed by the State of Tennessee, and a large portion of the remainder is due in countries overrun by the public enemy. The amounts actually collected have been paid over by the collectors with commendable exactness and punctuality.

The tax imposed at the last session of Congress is now being rapidly collected. From present appearances, the Commissioner estimates its probable collections at $[illegible] in money, and he reports that it is paid with general [illegible] and alacrity. The novelty of many of the [illegible] of the law has given rise to questions which are presented in detail in the report of the Commissioner, to which I respectfully invite your attention.

The report of the chief clerk for the produce loan and agency for purchase of cotton and tobacco, herewith submitted, will exhibit the details of that branch of the Department.

The general results are, that the whole amount of subscriptions realized from the produce loan is [illegible], and that there yet remains uncollected about $[illegible]. This is a large proportion of the whole amount, and the greater part is probably due from persons whom the calamities of war and the destruction of property have deprived of the means of meeting their engagements. There are many others, however, who may have been tempted by the high prices to neglect their engagements, and to reach these it is proposed by the chief clerk to publish the lists in the neighborhoods where they were subscribed. The measure is submitted for the consideration of Congress.

The purchases of cotton made under the Act of April 30, 1863, amount to [illegible] bales at the date of the report, and received, at a cost of $[illegible]. The average price paid was [illegible] cents per pound, [illegible] the lowest price being [illegible], and the highest [illegible] [illegible] the entire purchase money have been paid in bonds. [illegible] difficulty of procuring reports in detail from the agents in Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Texas has prevented a precise return of the cotton which has been destroyed, but from the estimates made by each of them it may be assumed that the entire loss is not more than 30,000 bales. To this

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. G. MEMMINGER,
Secretary of Treasury.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1864.

The War.

IT is not very surprising that the failure of Bragg before Chattanooga, and of Longstreet at Knoxville, should have occasioned some misgivings amongst the sympathisers with the Southern Confederacy in this country. Federal organs have so loudly and persistently proclaimed the exhaustion of the South, and the utter impossibility of her maintaining the struggle for any length of time, that many of her admirers, unacquainted with her resources and the indomitable spirit of her sons, have of late regarded the most trifling success of Northern armies as a serious danger to the cause. They have, in spite of the repeated warnings that have appeared in these columns, and forgetful of the experience of all revolutionary wars, adopted Mr Seward's theory of a sharp but short struggle; and constantly hoping that the next battle would be such a decisive victory to the Confederates as would either put the North hors de combat, or bring its people to their senses, they have given way to a somewhat unreasonable despondency, when the issue has been unfavourable to the South. The Southerners themselves, who have a definite object in view, of which in the hour of their severest trials they have never lost sight, and on which they have staked interest, honour and everything that makes life valuable, do not betray this feeling. Neither in the speeches of their representative men, nor the votes of their legislature is there to be found the faintest sign of flinching from the task they have set themselves. Nothing, indeed, in the course of the last year's campaign would justify it; yet it would be idle to deny that an impression of that kind has been created in this country during the last month or two, and that too by writers who might naturally have been expected to have a fair acquaintance with Southern feeling. The excellent letters of the Times Southern Correspondent have been read eagerly in this country by every friend of the South, and have doubtless contributed much to the favourable estimate formed by the English people of the chances of the Confederacy. But there can be very little doubt that the tone of two or three of his letters, preceding and following the incidents of the struggle for East Tennessee, was calculated to unduly depress the hopes of the friends of the Confederacy, and to awaken some mistrust of the perseverance of the South in its struggle for independence. The correspondent evidently wrote from the fulness of his heart. In every line of his correspondence there breathes the feeling of a devoted friend of the South; and it is quite probable that his object was hardly less to awaken the South to a consciousness of danger than to afford information to the English public. Still, the eager haste with which the Federal organs laid hold of his evidence as confirming all their prophecies and crowning all their hopes, shows very clearly how much mischief may be done by the hasty generalisations of an impressionable mind; and we are not sorry to have an opportunity, through an equally reliable source, of disabusing Englishmen of the notion that the Southern Confederacy is more disposed to yield now than it was when its first army hurled back the shattered battalions of the invader at Bull Run.

The Southern correspondent of the Morning Herald, in a letter from Richmond of the date of the 6th December, has taken some pains to record the feelings of the Confederate States which have suffered more or less severely from the war, as expressed by their representatives. In no single instance is there a word of despair, or a doubt of the ultimate attainment of independence. The State of Mississippi has paid bitterly for her devotion to the Confederate cause; her plantations have been plundered, her plains wantonly inundated, her crops destroyed, her towns burnt, her capital sacked, her citizens exposed to the uncontrolled fury of a conquering Northern army. General Clarke has been recently inaugurated as governor. His address breathes of war to the bitterest end—of indomitable resolve never to submit to the "hated Yankee." He urges provision for the families of those serving in the field, and calls for funds for the re-erection of the prisons and asylums brutally destroyed by the Northern hordes. The soil of Alabama has hitherto comparatively escaped the horrors of war, but her sons have paid dearly for her exemption from these evils on the fields of Virginia and on the heights of Chickamauga. The language of her governor breathes the same confidence, makes the same appeals for the families of the soldiers in the field. With that spirit of reverence for recognised authority which has characterised the Confederacy, he points out the harmony that has existed in the relations of the State with the Confederate Government, and congratulates his fellow-citizens that when difficulties have arisen they have been settled in accordance with the rights of the State. The Federal papers have made a great deal of the alleged disaffection to the Confederacy in North Carolina. The latest public acts of the Governor are a proclamation of a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, and an answer, sternly defiant, to Mr. Lincoln's cold-blooded Message to the South.

> We know at last precisely what we would get by submission, and therein has our enemy done us good service. Abolition of slavery, confiscation of property, and territorial vassalage. These are the terms to win us back. With such a prospect before them our people will, as heretofore, come firmly up to the full measure of their duty if their trusted servants do not fail them. They will not crucify afresh their own sons, slain in their behalf, or put their gallant shades to open shame by stopping short of full and complete national independence.

In South Carolina, although the enemy is thundering at the gates of the capital, and Gillmore is literally hurling his "Greek fire for the masses," the resolve is the same. "Our people," says Governor Buchanan, "have counted the cost, and have determined upon independence or annihilation. . . . . In all measures which you in your wisdom may adopt, looking to the successful issue of this great struggle, you may, gentlemen, rely upon my hearty co-operation." In Georgia, now threatened by Grant's forces at Chattanooga, it is proposed to extend the age of service, to raise sums for the equipment of the troops and for their families; and, with a view of maintaining the credit of the State, to obtain the requisite funds, not by a further issue of paper money, but by taxation. Georgia responds to a demand for 8,000 troops by enrolling 18,000, and the Governor's message contains these heart-stirring words:—

> Remembering the sacrifices we as a people have made; the suffering which we have endured; the noble Southern blood which our enemies have spilt; the deadly hate which they feel towards us; the cruel wrongs our females have encountered; and the degradation, bondage, and chains which await us and our posterity if we are subjugated, let us humbly and fervently invoke the aid of the Almighty Power; and, laying aside all past differences and personal considerations, let us gather around our country's altar. While we ardently desire peace on honourable terms, let us here again renew the solemn pledge to each other that, come life or death, come weal or woe, we will never sheathe the sword till constitutional liberty is established, Georgia is free, and these Confederate States are recognised by all the world as an independent Power.

Another of her representative men, Mr. Johnston, but recently elected, speaks in the same language of firm and undaunted resolve:—

> There is no step backward. All is now involved in the struggle that is dear to man—home, society, liberty, honour, everything—with the certainty of the most degrading fate that ever oppressed a people if we fall. It is not recorded in history that 8,000,000 of united people resolved to be free have failed. We cannot yield if we would. Yield to the Federal authorities—to vassalage and subjugation! The bleaching bones of 100,000 gallant soldiers slain in battle would be clothed in tongues of fire, to curse to everlasting infamy the man that whispered—Yield.

And this is at the close of the third year of the war, when the Angel of Death has swept remorselessly over every Southern home; when sacrifices, such as no nation has ever offered, have been freely made by the best and noblest as well as by the poorest in the land; when still, as at the commencement, the world stands by coldly and callously calculating the chances of the conflict; and England, who in past times has made the independence of nations a tradition of her foreign policy, throws the whole weight of her spurious neutrality into the Northern scale. President Lincoln's proclamation and General Butler's atrocities have quickened every Southern pulse and nerved every Southern arm. The people are terribly in earnest. The next twelve months may have their trials in store for the South; another Vicksburg may fall, another field of Gettysburg may disappoint the hopes of Southern patriots and animate the North to renewed exertions, another victory like that of Chickamauga may prove resultless; but whatever be the fortunes of the Confederacy in the field, we will venture to predict that a year hence, as it is now, its determination will be to submit to every possible and conceivable affliction rather than endure "the most degrading fate that could oppress a nation"—vassalage to the Yankee.

The "Edinburgh Review" on the Negro.

THE South cannot be charged with having obtruded her peculiar ideas—or even her legitimate defence against injurious imputations—on the ears of Europe. On the contrary, she has too often, and in most cases unnecessarily, allowed judgment to go by default, and her silence has been construed into a tacit confession of crimes and misdemeanours of which she never was guilty. So long as her calumniators appeal only to a public which gratifies the taste for highly-seasoned sensational literature under a flimsy cloak of philanthropy, this course is evidently the most dignified. The Horrors of Southern Slavery, and the Thrilling Narratives of Victims, may be safely left in that unclean sphere of fiction in which obscene imaginations delight. Even when men of higher pretensions, professors of political economy of history, or preachers of the Gospel, write books, in every sentence of which they betray their stupendous ignorance of facts and utter disregard of truth, it may be excusable to decline descending to their arena of controversy. But when a publication of the well-earned reputation of the Edinburgh Review so far forgets self-respect as to distil these fragrant flowers of rhetoric into grammatical English, and with an affected air of calm and moderation gravely perpetrates a gross outrage against a whole Christian community, then it is time that the defenders of the South should speak. And it is not by mincing words that the British instincts of fairness and justice can be reached. Who fails to resent an insult, has already half proved himself to merit it. One does not address a liar and slanderer in the mild tone of deprecation.

We cannot complain that the author of the article "The Negro Race in America," has not sufficiently labelled it with its contents, as witness the titles of the following select list of documents:—

> Instructions to the Commissioners for Emancipation in the District of Columbia. 1862.
> The President's Message to Congress on his plan of Gradual Emancipation. July, 1862.
> Official Report on the Freedmen of South Carolina to the Secretary of the Treasury. Washington: 1862.

First Annual Report of the Education Commissioner for Freedmen. Boston. May, 1863.

Circulars of the Freedmen's Bureau Commissioners, appointed by the Government of the United States. August, 1863.

It is not too much to say, even were the character of Federal politicians less notorious, that no one of these various authorities could possibly have applied the undressed truth. Yet dated since the outbreak of this treasonous war of the South on the North, all written in the midst of a bitter reaction and in the interest of one party with an obscure political meaning, it would argue almost supercilious candour if such documents were good historical or philosophical evidence. The quotations in the body of the article have the same fatalistic explanation. The notorious Mr Olmsted, the diplomatic circulars and despatches of Mr Seward, Northern newspapers and the reports of Federal commanders, the Reverend Mr Baptist Noel's "Results in America," which contains a more astounding number of gross blunders than any book of the same size ever written are mostly the sources from which the writer has drawn his materials, and he has contrived a leading article, and has succeeded in the manner of Mrs Beecher Stowe and the Common of our amiable and truthful contemporary, the Daily News.

After the acumen of such a writer there could be no doubt, the only wonder is that the editor of an English journal should have admitted with merely the less softening touches and introductory remarks, of which the article bears the traces—an argument so ardent, and unblushingly ex parte. Even so, the writer calls the Southern people with an odious distinctiveness "the slaveholders." All the good which "the slaveholders" have done, if he refers to it at all, is twisted into an additional proof of their monstrous wickedness. The American Colonisation Society, originated and mainly supported by the South, was an ingenious device to get rid of troublesome slaves; the exemplary punishment meted out at New Orleans to the cruel slave-mistress whose dwelling was unroofed and forbidden to be rebuilt, was a cowardly concession to the fear of a negro-rising; the religious instruction given to the black population, to the abundant fruits of which an hundred Southern clergymen of various denominations lately bore world-wide testimony, is a deliberate and ficelish encouragement to "shocking fanaticism" intended as a "safety-valve;" even the increasing comforts of the slaves within the last twenty years are a systematic imposture practised by a whole nation on the rest of the world. Different portions of the cotton region are referred to as "more" or "most" barbarous; crimes against life and limbs among the whites, duels, murders, lynching, have during the present generation been fearfully on the increase in the South, the official statistics of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. The picture drawn of the negro, to whom the author means to be flattering, is scarcely less hideous. According to him, the only reason why the slaves have not risen against their trembling masters is their well-grounded hope of aid from the North. Meanwhile, for twenty years they "have worn a mask;" their professions of love and acts of devotion only meant to cover plots of domestic treachery, brooded over in the kitchen, discussed in the recesses of dark forests, mysteriously conveyed from plantation to plantation. The negro man, while accompanying his master to the chase, or tending him in sickness, longed for the hour of sweet revenge; the negro nurse while suckling her mistress's child, was thirsting for its blood. For some time the negro's hopes were damped by the "goblin stories" which the masters told of the cruel and savage aspect and manners of the Yankees, and it was not until "the Lord appeared" to one of them, "in the night, in the form of a Yankee," that "they identified Yankees with the deliverers who were to come." We remember a few months since to have read some such melo-dramatic rhapsody in its appropriate place, the leader columns of an Anglo-Yankee journal; we did not expect to see it transferred verbatim, or nearly so, into the pages of the Edinburgh Review.

After recovering breath from the sickening spectacle to which the perusal invites us, we naturally ask, can men who write such things have a conscience? Are they really honest in their delusions, and is this marvellous credulity, this utter recklessness, not merely of facts, but of probabilities, the result of some mental colour-blindness? If so, then Heaven help the cause of human progress when the education of the negro race shall be entrusted to such hands! And if they are not honest in their delusions, if they are conscious of their ignorance, or if their falsehoods are deliberate—and to suppose otherwise were to doubt the sanity of at least some of these self-constituted apostles of freedom if they hold to the Jesuitic creed that the end justifies all means, and aim only at sensational effects, over-colouring the canvas to allow for the chances of damage—[illegible] to [illegible] a [illegible] property [illegible] to [illegible] with the [illegible] of a black skin who [illegible] South America [illegible] at the bidding of [illegible]

It is [illegible] to [illegible] ing to a man who [illegible] bestial [illegible] brutal, cowardly [illegible] as the Abolitionists fought in defence of the [illegible] Jackson, or that of the [illegible] treasons such as they [illegible] Fortunately for the honour of human nature the one picture is as utterly false as the other, and even the anecdotes from which they profess to be drawn are outrageously [illegible] Some people can, when all the [illegible] of the South comes through the distorting medium of a corrupt partisan press, and when no one stops to reason upon what was there found, it was possible, though not credible, [illegible] to accept as [illegible] that [illegible] the part of [illegible] [illegible] But [illegible] a people of our own race could be such a race of beasts [illegible] in the filthiest vices and abominations that they lived no better than [illegible] these and other infamous tales of the South, are not indeed little records, but [illegible] and a wretchedly low estimate of Anglo-Saxon character, but it argued nothing worse. In the light of the facts of the last three years no man of sound mind has even this pitiable excuse. The war has proved the people of the South neither [illegible] nor barbarous; so far from [illegible] a hostility of colours in her population it has saved the closest identity of interests between the two races. There is not even the excuse of well-intentioned error, for the Divine Word has left our fallible reason without a clear and plain guidance. We are commanded not to do evil that good may come from it, and these, though we may err in our estimate of what is desirable and good, we can never unconsciously err to our choice of means to obtain it. We may desire the free loan of the [illegible] but we have no right to bear false witness against his master.

For the genuine philanthropist, who believes in the perfectibility of his species, who acknowledges kindred and brotherhood with all races and conditions of men, and preaches peace and good-will to all—whites as well as blacks—we entertain a profound respect and reverence, even when his enthusiasm carries him beyond the sober bounds of practical experience. To such a one the South might confidently leave the decision of her case. "You condemn," she would say to him, "my hash-named institution as repugnant to the ideas of the age, and unsuited to the wants of an advanced civilisation. Be it so; but remember that this institution applies to a people only three generations removed from savage Africa. The habits which befit an adult are not proper to a child, and the negro, by the testimony of those who know him best, is but as a child compared to races older in civilisation. Crime and misery there exist under any system, but to judge me fairly, you must examine whether this is a result or an accident, whether the aggregate sum would be greater or less under another system, and for this you must take as a standard the prostitution, the insanity, the mendicity, the overflowing prisons, of more complicated social fabrics. If the negro is inherently, or through the effect of four thousand years of brutish barbarism, inferior to the white man, a mere act of legislation will not raise him to the level of his present master, no more than by emancipating a child from paternal control you can give him the attributes of an adult. I did not bring the negro from his native Africa. The duty of training him for civilised and Christian life was not of my seeking, but I have endeavoured to do the best according to my lights. Whether I have done well or ill, must depend on whether I have raised or debased him in the past, and whether in the present I promote or retard his development. To the former question I answer that I found him, physically and mentally, scarcely above the level of the brute, and to-day the race in no country and under no social condition can furnish the like in intellect or bodily vigour of the negro grown up under my care. To the latter question experience answers that, where left to himself, though under the most favourable circumstances, he has, as yet, not improved, but degenerated."

It has much retarded the just appreciation of the South's relation toward the negro race, that some of her most active and sincere friends in Europe have not ventured to speak this language in its full force. The whole truth, even when they knew it, ran so counter to preconceived opinions, that they have thought it necessary to dilute it. In order to gain a little, they have conceded too much. The policy

France and Mexico.

A very remarkable pamphlet of eighty-three [illegible] has just been published in Paris, [illegible] to the [illegible] of France. The subject is treated, La Question Mexicaine et les Conséquences Prochaines, as one concerning to all well-wishers of the Confederate States, and the little work before us is besides an [illegible] with vigorous thought and [illegible] that it deserves more than a passing [illegible] at our hands. The author at once treats the question from a purely [illegible] at most, from the philosophical point of view, and the Confederate States, about which we are deeply concerned in every [illegible] Government and a powerful ally, are not mentioned or even alluded to. Yet Mr [illegible] presents to those who do not see in the Emperor's Mexican [illegible] a very clear [illegible] incidents, the most complete and [illegible] exposition of its origin and [illegible] consequences, and though we are far from [illegible] the vulgar cause of [illegible] [illegible] of a certain class of men to [illegible] [illegible] the present [illegible] years naturally [illegible] to the [illegible] as we probably safely [illegible] that the [illegible] of restoring which [illegible] the attention of the [illegible] Europe some years ago to Central America, and which caused him to [illegible] opportunities in Mexico as well as Cochin-China is not greatly dissimilar to that sketched by our author.

The [illegible] of the pamphlet we cannot give better than in its own words. "Modern civilisation generates a larger quantity of intellectual power than it can consume. In this fact we may recognise the wise plan of Providence which has appointed Europe to be the receiving point for the circulation of the earth. Confined without outlet or expansion, this surplus power, like steam, becomes in danger of explosion." Further on, the author enlarges upon this striking metaphor. This intellectual vapour is generated in proportion to the stimulating forces at work, to the mental activity which pervades a country, to that necessity of our age which causes whole classes to be educated rather beyond than below the requirements of their station. He does not quarrel with or regret this fact, he only casts about for the means to turn it to good account. Political changes do not afford the means, for as he very forcibly remarks, "Governmental forms are but the physiognomy of the nation, revealing indeed its lived passions, sometimes controlled by them, but not producing the passions." More legislation is powerless, for the Mass can only recognise facts, not anticipate them. Compression by force is possible for a brief period, but it is only retarding the explosion to make it more dangerous. The want of safety-valves or space for expansion produces in the body politic a disease which he compares to a congestion of blood upon the brain. This disease has reached its gravest form when all activities are directed to the State, and seek to be gratified through the State alone. France has reached this stage of the disease. To hope for relief from foreign wars, were to aggravate an inflammation.

There are, to the author's mind, but two roads safe and practicable. The one is to let the surplus intellectual power escape in pure waste, so far as the State is concerned. This is, to a great extent, the case in Germany, where the instinct of national identity is less strong than in France, and whose children, when far and long away, take a pride in disowning their mother. In France this is scarcely possible. The Frenchman can only be induced to seek other and distant fields of activity by the certainty that in expatriating himself he is not "orientalised"—that he need not come in contact with ideas, manners, and social institutions antipathetic to his own; in other words, that to succeed it is not required of him "to become a poor caricature of the Englishman or Anglo-American." "For," observes the author, "would Englishmen have reared their magnificent Indian empire, if in doing so they had contributed to the glory and grandeur of a civilisation foreign from their own?" "They, quite as much as the Frenchman, cherish the hope of return to the home country. It is because, under vast dissimilarity of climate, soil, and productions, they can still recognise their own country, and can, without renouncing it, earn honours, wealth, and social advancement, that Englishmen find transplantation so easy."

The only remaining alternative, then, is to provide for this surplus energy such machinery as will employ it outside of and yet to the profit of the State. This, it is contended, Great Britain has done by her splendid galaxy of prosperous colonies. To the innumerable and unlimited channels which these, directly and indirectly, at home and abroad, open to the ambition of all classes, from the very highest to the lowest, she owes the practical contentment of her population, her internal tranquillity, and wonderful exemption from violent and sudden changes. The restless minds which, in other countries, are driven into wild schemes of universal equality, into the removal of all artificial barriers, "by which a certain number of privileged individuals are dispossessed but their places not multiplied,"—all these dangerous elements of society are here absorbed in the endless variety of pursuits which, by holding out greater promises, divert ambition from the profession of politics. The author thinks that a historical accident alone prevents France from enjoying to the full the same advantages. He even argues that as coloniser the Frenchman possesses a superiority over the Englishman in certain very essential attributes of character, and in proof he refers to the success which attended French colonisation in Canada and on the banks of the Mississippi, and to many well-known, though little understood, peculiarities, both mental and physical, of the French nation. But, about a century ago, at the very time when the importance of colonies was beginning to be felt, France lost by war and the carelessness of her statesmen, nearly the whole colonial empire she then possessed. Since then, the wars of the Revolution and the Empire have completed the work of "exclusion from the New World," and there is scarcely a place tempting to an adventurous disposition, where a Frenchman may go and yet remain a Frenchman.

Mexico appears to the author the country destined to repair this historical accident. Of all the lands opened by the discoveries of Vasco de Gama and Columbus, it is the one which from its favoured geographical situation, its Elysian climate and fabulous wealth, he would have elected had the world been free to his choice. That Mexico has already a numerous, though still sparse, population, is no disadvantage in his eye. France has no labouring population to spare; nor does he advocate emigration in its statistical sense, which "is a bloodletting that weakens the limbs without relieving the brain." He contends that Mexico needs precisely that which France is best able to give with reciprocal benefit, that "intellectual fecundation," that quickening and awakening of the torpid and almost extinct national life, for the want of which that country has sunk to its present abject condition. The whole thought is summarised in the expression that "Mexico can be to France what India is to England." We sincerely hope, in the interest of America and of the world, that it may be so; and if so intelligent and far-sighted an idea as that sketched in this little work has inspired and continues to guide the Mexican expedition, it will be so.

We have said enough of this remarkable production to show that it deserves not only perusal but study. All of the ideas are not absolutely new; some have frequently cropped out within late years in our periodical literature, but many of them have never to our knowledge been presented in such sharp and bold outlines. Apart from the interest of the Mexican question, it contains also much food for reflection on subjects of more general interest; but our object was not to write a review, though we are almost betrayed into one, and we content ourselves with culling two quotations, which can be applied as forcibly to the case of the Confederate States as to that for which they were intended. The first of these we commend to the attention of those who persuade themselves that they have no concern in the devastation of one of the most productive portions of the globe; the other to the English statesman who publicly declared that Great Britain would be for ever infamous if she obeyed, though in a strictly legitimate manner, the dictates of her own interests.

"To open new mines of wealth, new avenues of commerce, is to enrich, not one nation alone, but all. Were the productive energies of any one country permanently destroyed, the whole world would be the poorer for it. So if any important region of the globe is restored to the uses for which Providence designed it, all mankind shares in the gain."

. . . . . .

"Self-interest is the conscience of nations. The maxim may appear paradoxical to those who catch only at the superficial and loosely conventional meanings of words. Self-interest rightly understood—not the shortsighted egotism of narrow minds, but the comprehensive sagacity of a patriotic statesman—is never tempted by the delusion of a temporary advantage into wilful wrong to others. If each nation did truly and constantly appreciate its own best interests, there could never exist war nor the causes of war. But even in a restricted sense our maxim is true. So long as a nation pursues its own interests by legitimate means only, it adds as well to the happiness of all mankind, and its conscience is guided by a safer principal of action than the fitful impulses and abstract sentimentality—as often wrong as right—in the name of which such cruel injustice is often perpetrated."

The French Empire.

THERE is no counterpart in English history to the event that is just now engaging the attention of Europe—the return to the French Parliament of the leaders of parties under a bygone régime, the advent in the political arena of men who have been the avowed and generally recognised enemies of the reigning sovereign. William III. and his successors ruled in a certain sense as conquerors—that is, they treated a part of their subjects as no better than alien enemies, regarding them as the early Norman kings did the Saxon thanes. For the adherents, or reputed adherents, of the exiled house there was no forgiveness, and the political sins of the fathers were visited upon the children by a rigid exclusion from Court and public life. Country gentlemen sometimes drank to the health of "the king over the water," but when such a toast was proposed they took good heed that none but the faithful were within earshot, well knowing that, if they openly expressed any sentiment of disloyalty, the Bill of Rights would not save them from exile or their lands from forfeiture. Possibly Walpole coquetted with James, and undoubtedly Bolingbroke carried on a traitorous correspondence with the mimic Court at St. Germain; but it must be remembered that these were secret machinations, that in Parliament neither Walpole nor Bolingbroke ever dared to throw off the mask of devoted loyalty to the de facto monarch, that Anne herself was known to be somewhat partial to the claims of her brother, and that at any moment the Pretender could by renouncing the Roman Catholic faith, have made his return to St. James's tolerably certain. This exceeding jealousy may or may not have been wise and necessary, but it unquestionably presents a marked contrast to the policy of the present Emperor of the French. If Napoleon III. had said to the former opponents of his dynasty, "Between us there is a great and impassable gulf, and therefore, I cannot consent to your reappearance in public life, but between my child and your children there is no enmity and there will be no exclusion," he would have displayed more magnanimity than did even the House of Brunswick. But he has done far more than that. After the lapse of only fifteen years he permits these very opponents to sit in the legislature and to criticise the acts of his government. No wonder Europe, and especially England, should watch the debates in the French Chambers with eager curiosity. It is not that imperialism, or even representative government is on its trial, but the issue involved is, whether the spirit of patriotism is strong enough to subdue the spirit of faction, or whether generations must pass away before the political union of the whole nation can be consummated.

The conduct of M. Thiers and his friends is not reassuring. It would be unjust to charge those gentlemen with being false, even in thought, to the oath of allegiance they have so lately, so deliberately, and so solemnly taken; but, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that their demeanour in the Chambers has delighted the enemies of the Empire, and stimulated the flagging hopes of the professional revolutionists of all nationalities, whose occupation has been almost gone during the last fifteen years. Is there any real danger of the Empire suffering from the generous policy of the Emperor? Ought anyone out of France wish to see the Imperial Government seriously embarrassed by the Opposition? The best way to answer such questions is to glance at what the Empire has done for France, and what has been its influence on Europe.

In 1848 the condition of France was deplorable. In every department of the Government and in the highest ranks of society there was rottenness and corruption. The king cared for nothing but the aggrandisement of his family and investing in foreign funds; the Chambers were filled with placemen and pensioners, murder and defalcation disgraced noble families and public functionaries. Of course the whole country suffered. Commerce was crippled, industry languished, and there were no signs of internal improvement. Paris was surrounded by fortifications, and the army was kept in tolerable strength for the protection of the king, and to give employment to the king's sons in Algeria, but the marine was grossly neglected. Never had France sunk so low in the scale of nations. Europe ceased to care for her policy, and men pointed to her condition as the inevitable, though tardy, result of former revolutions, and as the sure indication of accelerating degeneracy.

What a change has been brought about since 1848! The French have become a commercial people, and were never richer or more prosperous than they are at present. Paris has become a veritable City of Palaces, Cherbourg has been completed, the country has been covered with a network of railways, and all classes of the community are better off than formerly. The military glory of France has been not only sustained but magnified. In the Crimea, and at Solferino and Magenta, the French troops gained laurels that may vie with any that were won by their forefathers. The navy has been reorganised and put on a footing that entitles France to respect as a great maritime Power. Side by side with England France has made her influence felt in China. In Mexico, under very unfavourable circumstances, the French have won an empire for the Archduke Maximilian and opened a rich country to the commerce of the world. The result is natural and palpable. France again takes the lead in Europe, in all difficulties our eyes are turned to Paris, and Napoleon is saluted as the arbiter of peace or war. The Emperor has evinced more friendliness though he has not done more for the Confederates than England; yet, in spite of that and his Mexican expedition, he has maintained good relations with Washington without any cringing or subserviency. In a word the empire has made France prosperous at home and powerful abroad. Let us now see what it has done for Europe; looking at this part of the subject through our English spectacles.

Turkey is no longer in danger of becoming a province of Russia, and Russia is no longer a terror to Europe. To what is this due, if not to the armed alliance between England and France—an alliance which could alone defeat the designs of the Czar, and which it is reasonable the Czar should have refused to believe in. Then turn to the South. Year after year the wrongs of Italy had been the theme of conversation, but no one imagined that a Kingdom of Italy was more than an enthusiast's dream. Thanks to the aid of France the Kingdom of Italy is in existence. And when had England a more faithful ally than Napoleon III.? When we have been willing to fight he has fought with us; when we have refused to take action, as in the cases of America and Poland, the Emperor has submitted to our decision. For years it was the fashion to abuse him in this country, but his only retaliation has been to grant the English ingress and egress to his dominions without passports, and at our instigation to inaugurate a policy of free trade, notwithstanding the prejudices of a powerful minority of his people, and for this he is now being condemned by the liberal Opposition. We are aware that the downfall of the Empire would make England supreme in Europe, and that France would have to play second fiddle; but though we are anxious that our Government should enact a part worthy of our greatness, we do not think it desirable that we should recover the influence lost through an imbecile policy by the misfortune of our most potent and trustworthy ally. L'Empire c'est la paix is a truism, notwithstanding the wars of the Empire; for without the Empire wars would be more frequent, more dangerous, and more lasting. We should then, for these and many other reasons, regret unfeignedly the prospect of the Opposition in the French Chambers being able to seriously embarrass the Imperial Government.

We submit there is no such prospect, and that the hopes of Mazzini, Garibaldi, Kossuth, and other firebrands are doomed to disappointment. The Revolutions of '78, of July, and of 1848 were the consequence of the misery of the country and the corruption of the governments. People who are prosperous, and who see their national prowess respected and triumphant, are not ripe for change, and are not likely to become the tools of demagogues; nor are people disposed to be discontented with a government which, so far from encroaching on the popular rights, is continually making concessions to popular liberty. Moreover the Emperor is vigilant. Like Cæsar, he holds out the right hand to his one-time enemies, but, unlike Cæsar, he does not despise omens. When the days of the Monarchy of July were numbered, on the very eve of the abdication of the regency of an hour, of the ignominious flight of Louis Philippe, a member of the then Opposition spoke of barricades, and M. Guizot laughed immoderately. Now, when, if there is danger it is exceedingly remote, the Emperor tells us that he is prepared for it by observing that he is astonished "to see at so short an interval men hardly escaped from shipwreck before the question of the succession arose. That question is [illegible] and disposed of by the reviewer. It appears—

1st. That the title of Christian IX. to Denmark and Lauenburg is beyond dispute.

2nd. That if the Danish law of succession obtains in Holstein and Sleswig, he is also lawful duke of those provinces.

3rd. That if not, the rights of Russia to a great part of these duchies, renounced only in favour of the present Danish line of succession, and after the Augustenburg family had branched off the stem, are revived; so that in no case can the pretender of Augustenburg be heir to the whole of the duchies.

4th. That the pretender's father renounced all claims he might have, for himself and for his family; that he was paid £400,000 for that renunciation; and that his son, for six years, acquiesced therein.

The [illegible] is at once exhaustive and conclusive; and is, in fact, by far the best and completest history of this mysterious quarrel that has yet been written. It will be observed that the Danish case is always clear and simple, all perplexity and mystery hangs about, and is introduced by, the claims of Germany.

The review contains a somewhat too long, but very instructive article on China; an excellent review of Forsyth's "Life of Cicero," worthy the attention of all scholars—indeed, of all men who have enjoyed a classical education; a just though severe critique of Hawthorne's [illegible] and unmanly volumes, which are well contrasted with Emerson's "English Traits;" an account of Captain Speke's discoveries, an article on Eels; another on Guns and Armour Plates, and one on "Rome in the Middle Ages"—all marked by the usual excellence of the Quarterly.

The National Review has also a very sensible political article on the state of Europe; which, in its sobriety of tone and thoughtfulness of mind contrasts wonderfully with some other papers in this same number. No one who knows the writer's hand can mistake it; and those who belong to the same school of political thought will be grateful for the ablest and completest delineation of the character of Napoleon III. which is here afforded them. We do not wholly agree with the writer; we think him biassed by Orleanist prejudices, and disposed to censure the Emperor unfairly for not giving to France institutions which she neither desires nor deserves; but we recognise in his description of the greatest and most misconceived man of this generation an intention to do justice, an intelligent perception of the position and difficulties of a French ruler, an appreciation of exceptional natures, and a painstaking scrutiny, which have not generally distinguished the utterances of English Liberals, whether adulators or enemies of the Emperor. In his estimate of the good qualities of Napoleon III., we think him just, though cold. He admits

The Edinburgh has an [illegible] article on the Negro Race in America, which [illegible] the reader that the statements offered are in some degree questionable; but the [illegible] author was dealing with admitted facts and [illegible] whereas in truth few of his statements are [illegible] and completely [illegible] of the [illegible] F. Douglass, and their [illegible]. To show how far the writer's dishonesty extends, we need merely observe the following points:—

That he speaks invariably of the admission of negroes to colleges and to civil privileges in the "Free States" generally, when the truth is such privileges were accorded [illegible] only in Massachusetts, or in one or two other Northern States.

That he repeats all the exploded falsehoods about the ill treatment of negroes in the South, without ever hinting at contradiction or refutation.

That he tells stories out of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," as if they were grave historical facts.

That he never refers to the fact that heavy penalties are imposed, in many or most of the Free States, on the introduction of negroes.

That he speaks of "considerable importations of Africans," the fact being that not 100 have been landed in the South since 1808.

That he speaks in general terms of the heroic exploits of the negro "soldiery"; without mentioning even such remarkable achievements as the burning of Darien or the massacre at Beckham's Landing.

That he omits to note, and by implication denies, that the Confederates thoroughly rely on the fidelity of their coloured camp followers; and that many of these have rendered eminent service as spies; insomuch that the best Northern generals were at last compelled to exclude "contrabands" from the camp.

Of course the opinions and predictions of such a writer are below notice or contradiction. An article like this, which might have been written by H. W. Beecher or the Rev. Baptist Noel, will not tend to retrieve the reputation of the Edinburgh. Some of its other articles are [illegible]—particularly one on the last volume of Mr. Merivale's "History of the Roman Empire." But generally it is the dullest of all the reviews.

The Westminster has an article on "Parliamentary Parties," which is distinguished by its remarkable want of taste, judgment, and truth. It recognises no man of real merit on either side except Messrs. Bright and Cobden. It praises Mr. Forster—who is as much superior in practical [illegible] to Mr. Bright, as Mr. Bright to Mr. Peter Taylor—in one contemptuous sentence. It sneers at Lord Palmerston, and depreciates Mr. Gladstone. It speaks with an affectation of angry contempt of Lord Robert Cecil, the ablest and most thoughtful of our young statesmen; it will allow no sort of merit or capacity to any of the Conservative leaders; in fact, it is the work of a violent partisan, ignorant of men, careless of decency, and regardless of truth. The review contains an intelligent article on Russia, and an intelligible one on the Tunnel under Mount Cenis; the rest are hardly worth the trouble of perusal.

The Home and Foreign Review has three articles of a political bearing. It reviews Mr. Gladstone's financial [illegible] in a decidedly favourable sense, but to our infinite surprise, it reverses the verdict of public opinion by [illegible] the French Treaty, and [illegible] the speech against [illegible] institutions which provoked so much censure, and has done so much to injure Mr. Gladstone's political credit. The article on Courts Martial gives a good and clear account of the constitution and character of these courts, and sums up against them. The article on Sleswig-Holstein is written by a violent partisan of Germany. We need not trouble our readers with any detailed examination of its statements. The mercy o' the Whigs." The tenth would probably be as malignant as conscientious. Be it remembered that if husband and wife be allowed to testify at all, they must be compellable to testify alike for or against each other; and the experience of police courts, where women are allowed to prove ill-usage against their husbands, and that of the divorce court, where they give evidence as to cruelty, conclusively prove that this would open the door to infinite abuses. We see no reason, even after reading Mr. Wells' three volumes, to desire an alteration of the law which excludes such evidence. It is a balance of evils; and the evil of the existing law appears to us far less than that which its repeal would inflict upon us.

Lady Hornby's "Constantinople"† is very pleasant reading. It relates the experiences of an English lady whose husband's official duties took him to Stamboul in 1855, when the city and its suburbs were crowded with French and English soldiers; the comical miseries of a domestic establishment set up, under such circumstances, in a foreign land; the plague of neighbours and of servants, and so forth. It tells, too, very graphically, of several visits to Turkish harems, which afforded the writer much amusement. She seems to have formed a favourable impression of the Turkish women, whom she describes as exceedingly kind and gentle, but who do not seem, according to the evidence which she gathered from others, to be remarkable either for modesty or for fidelity. Of the state of society and politics in Turkey she expresses the most unfavourable judgment we remember to have read. The poor Turk, she says, is a fine, honest, manly creature; the rich Turk is almost invariably a degraded, swindling, sensual scoundrel. Everybody lies, cheats, and pilfers; punishment is rare, and justice all but unknown; and the Sultan, with absolute power and the best intentions, is unable to do anything for the reform of his administration or the relief of his people. Such is the universality of villany that to dismiss one tyrant or robber from office is only to introduce in his stead a hungrier ruffian of the same sort. The scenery is lovely, and the climate pleasant, though variable; but everything that bears human shape in Turkey seems to be either pitiable or loathsome. We cannot but think that the picture is somewhat over-coloured, but the book is well worth reading.

"The Man of the Hour"‡ is a novel whose hero is found in gaol as a fraudulent bankrupt at the beginning of the first volume, and leaves the country at the close of the second, after having made and lost an enormous fortune in the interim. Half a swindler and altogether a humbug—such is the typical man of the present day, according to this author's estimate. "Uncle Crotty's Relations"* is promising, but disappointing. "Hard Cash"† is a very good and readable novel of its kind; sensational and improbable in the extreme, but not dependent for its interest on its improbabilities. Its chief feature is the imprisonment of a sane man in a lunatic asylum: a thing which some silly keeper of one of those establishments furiously affirmed to be impossible; thereby eliciting proofs that the impossibility had happened in half a dozen cases personally known to the author. Our law on this subject is in a disgraceful state, it being in the power of any two medical men—who may be scoundrels and are often grossly careless—to lock up for life any husband of whom a wife wishes to be rid, any landowner whose heir-at-law is impatient for his estate, or generally any one whom his or her near relatives wish out of the way. Once in a lunatic asylum, there is practically no chance of escape, if the proprietor—as of course will always be the case—is an accomplice of the fraud. Charles Reade has done good service by pointing out this state of things in a manner calculated to draw public attention forcibly to its iniquities; but we entertain no sanguine hopes of any amendment of the law.

"The Wars of Wapsburg"‡ is a pretty but flimsy little Christmas tale, of which the secret is a wasp's nest and the heroine the builder and queen thereof. We fancy that most children will vote it very dull; the art which it displays requiring a matured taste for its appreciation, the deception being transparent, and the incidents uninteresting.

Messrs. Saunders and Otley have published, in pamphlet form, a very clever reply§ to Professor Goldwin Smith on the sanction of slavery by the laws of the Old Testament. We took occasion, in dealing with the Professor's argument, to show that he had in reality directed his efforts to prove not that the Bible forbade, but that it did not enjoin slavery; not that it did not permit men to "hire their servants for life," but that it did not command them to do so. The author of the very thoughtful and ingenious brochure before us shows something more. He turns the tables on Mr. Goldwin Smith by a reference to the New Testament, showing in what esteem slavery was held by the Founder of Christianity and by his Apostles, as compared with that of the hireling. It is only just to give this very striking argument in his own words:—

"It is a fact, surely not altogether without significance, that not only is the relation of master and slave—or 'servant' as we translate it—so continually referred to in our Lord's parables, without any word of reprobation, but that it is under the figure of a slaveholder that our Lord Himself is frequently depicted. Nay, more. This very relation is used by St. Paul to illustrate the relation in which He stands toward ourselves. "We are 'not our own, but bought with a price.' Not ransomed and set free, but bought. The property in us, which, by right of our sin, had belonged to Satan, transferred by right of purchase to God. And, therefore, we are bidden to glorify God in our bodies, and in our spirits, 'which are God's.' Surely it is somewhat hazardous to assume that a relation thus plainly, and without qualification, set forth as illustrating the position of the Almighty, can be of itself essentially evil! "We turn from the Bible estimate of the relation of master and slave, to examine the Bible estimate of the relation of the master and his free or hired servant. And here, too, even more, perhaps, than in the former case, do His ways seem strangely at variance with our ways, and His thoughts with our thoughts. Shut out by the Mosaic law from that participation in the great rite of family worship to which the slave was expressly, and by reason of his slavehood, admitted, the 'hireling' occupies in the New Testament a position of equally little honour. If a faithful and good servant is to be depicted, he is selected, as a matter of course, from among his master's slaves. If we are to have placed before us, for contrast's sake, the lowest class of all in mortals and in social position, this helot's place is filled by the 'hireling,' not the slave. 'How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger.' 'The hireling fleeth because he is an hireling and careth not for the sheep."

With great force and justice, the writer calls attention to the Professor's disingenuousness in alleging that the Southern system of slavery sanctions and involves certain iniquities which it in most cases forbids, and which it in no case encourages; and remarks, that the description given by Mr. Smith of patriarchal slavery is, in substance and principle, applicable to slavery as it exists in the Southern States of America. The following passage contains a sarcasm which Mr. Goldwin Smith ought to feel, if he be not insensible alike to shame and to ridicule:—

"'In America,' say you (p. 40) 'the slave is made a Christian in a sense of which we may have more to say hereafter; but practically he can scarcely be said to belong to the same Church any more than to the same State with his master. He sometimes sits in a separate part of the same place of worship, and receives the Communion separately from the same hands;' and again (Ibid.) 'Mr. Olmsted says, that 'though family prayers were held in several of the fifty planters' houses in Mississippi and Alabama, in which he passed a night, he never in a single instance saw a field-hand attend, or join in the devotion of the family.' What an outrage on our Christian feelings would it not be were the poor farm labourer to sit 'in a separate part' of his parish church, or kneel anywhere but between his master and his mistress at the altar rails! How shocked would you yourself be, on a visit to some large country house, to find that the ploughman and the cartboy did not come in to family prayers!"

THE LIVERPOOL ENLISTMENT CASE.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—If we may believe the hired witnesses of the Federal Consul at Liverpool, it appears that the Confederates have engaged some British subjects for their cruisers. I confess I am not greatly surprised to hear this because the Confederates were once in union with the Federals and learnt some of their habits and customs, and perhaps amongst others that of engaging British seamen for their navy. At this present moment there is a considerable number of our seamen doing duty in Federal war vessels. However, it is not my present purpose to defend the breach of law of the Confederates—that is, by supposing the hired witnesses are truthful and that the acts they allege against the Confederates are a breach of law—but I wish to call your attention to a few details of the affair that jar awfully against what Englishmen consider fair play.

It is an old maxim in our law courts that he who seeks equity must do equity, or, in other words, before a man can testify to the mote in the eye of an opponent he must first get rid of the beam in his own eye. Now the prosecution before the Liverpool magistrates in reference to the engagement of some men for the Japan or Georgia, though nominally conducted in the name of the Crown, was in reality the work of the Federal Government. It is the misfortune of the nobleman who directs our Foreign Office to play the part of Federal spy in America, and of tool to Federal spies in England. The Federal agents procured the witnesses, and paid them £1 19s. 4d. per week each man for "talking and making statements"—why do not the Federal agents go into the open market, seeing that they would get any amount of talking and any statements they think proper for half the money they now pay?—and it was the American Consul who was "very kind" to these witnesses.

Do you think, sir, that Earl Russell ever reads newspapers, or parliamentary papers, or official reports, or documents of any kind? And supposing his lordship does read, do you think his memory has not clean gone? You will see, sir, that this is a matter that rather concerns Earl Russell's reputation. Suppose he does read anything beside his own voluminous, numerous, and extraordinary despatches, and that memory has not quite forsaken his lordship's "distracted orb," I respectfully submit that he has a little soiled his ermine and somewhat violated the honour of England in being so ready to allow our Government to become the dirty-work attorney of the jocular Lincoln, the veracious Seward, and the honest Chase.

When the Emancipation Society, or Mr. Randolph C. Young, or the ex-agent of the Rajah of Sattara, or the Hon. Robert, wrote to Earl Russell that the wicked rebels had most atrociously violated the provisions of the British Foreign Enlistment Act, and that three highly credible witnesses—that is, men who, according to their own story, are deserters from the Confederate service, and who are receiving from the Federals £1 19s. 4d. per week each for "talking and making statements," and to whom the Federal Consul is "very kind"—were willing to do all the swearing that was necessary for a conviction, it occurs to me that Earl Russell ought to have reflected that the men who clamoured for justice were themselves guilty of the very offence they protest against. Should not the noble lord have simultaneously ordered the law officers of Ireland to put an end to Federal recruiting in that country? Certainly his lordship may reply that the Confederates do not make out a case. I grant it. I grant that the Confederates are not good at getting up a case. They can fight and tell the truth, but they cannot spy and lie. But does not my Lord Russell know that there is Federal recruiting in Ireland? Of course he knows it. He is necessarily aware how largely the armies of the North have been recruited by Irish immigrants who have been engaged to make imaginary railways, and who have crossed the Atlantic at the cost of the Federal Government. Perhaps his lordship may reply, he cannot move until he is furnished with all legal documents and the informer's report; but it is the business of the English Government, not of the Confederates, to see that our municipal laws are not violated.

And to come from the Federal recruiting in Ireland to a more analogous case, I wonder if his lordship ever heard of the Federal war-sloop Kearsage? This vessel shipped some British tars and afterwards landed them on the British coast dressed in Federal uniform. The English public do not forget this circumstance, and I hear very strong expressions of disgust at the impudence of the Yankees in respect to the Liverpool prosecution. Nor, is the mode of getting up the case creditable. What may be the opinion in New England, where no man does anything except for money, I know not; but in this country we hold that a hired witness is rather worse than a hired voter. The Federal agent induced one of the witnesses to take £3 for the purpose of rejoining the Confederate vessel. According to English law it is an offence to trap a man into the commission of a breach of the law. But I suppose we must be kind to the Federals and get rid of all foolish notions of honest dealing.

I do not think this prosecution will do the Confederate cause any harm, and so far I do not regret it; but I wish we could put an end to the Federal spy system in England, and that the English Government would cease to act as dirty-work attorney to Federal agents. You see, sir, I am not such an ardent Liberal as the readers of a certain "Bright and peculiar Star," and I am old-fashioned enough not to like to see the honour of England prostituted by subserviency to the Yankees.

I am, &c.,

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, January 5.

CONGRESS assembles to-day, after the Christmas recess. The members have been mixing a good deal of miscellaneous politics with their holiday amusements, consulting their constituents, as the phrase is; but, in fact, fixing up the little springs which work the local machinery for manufacturing public opinion on the presidential question, and go back to Washington to set the greater wheels in motion there. Everything, in politics and legislation, war and finance, turns now by some crank, turned by a hand engaged in the making of a president.

The first legislative business taken up will be proposed amendments to the Confiscation Act. In expectation of that, it is understood that the draft, ordered to commence to-day will be deferred to the 15th at least. It is nearly certain that the two amendments will be adopted. The two classes will be consolidated, so that the draft made from all able-bodied men, between twenty and forty-five, and the commutation clause will be struck out. Every drafted man must then serve in person or furnish a substitute at his own cost.

The failure of all means of raising recruits, except by absolute compulsion, has demonstrated that if the war be popular, fighting is not. There is a loud call every day from some quarter for a vigorous prosecution of the war, and the crushing out of the rebellion, but nobody seems willing to do the work in his own person, without something more solid than the sense of duty or the zeal of a patriot. Volunteering died out long ago. Bounties were tried with some success for awhile; they were constantly raised, as the supply of mercenaries grew short, and they failed. The importation of foreigners did not keep up the stock, and the home material had to be taken by force—"impressed," as they would say here if it were a question of taking seamen by the same means to the navy of England—one of the obsolete practices, which have long furnished the staple for American depreciation of Old England, as a place in which poor men cannot live and be free. The first conscription had loop-holes, through which escape was so easy that that mode of raising troops was a failure. Then resort was had to the bounty system, and enormous premiums offered, with the warning that if these did not bring the patriots in to fight for the bleeding country, bounties should cease after a given day, and Government would take by force at its own price what numbers it might want. A little stimulus was thus given to recruiting That which the poor man could not be enticed or bribed to do, while he had the option of refusal or the chance of escape, he sometimes consented to do, and took the blood-money, because he could not help himself. But this has failed again. Not more than a fourth of the 300,000 men required by the President's last call has been obtained. Another fourth is estimated to be furnished from re-enlistments of men in service whose term is expiring. 150,000 men must therefore be taken by draft from the unwilling mass who have been stubbornly deaf to the animated calls upon them to "go" to the battle-field made by mouthing patriots, who vociferously pledge the last dollar which any body has and the last drop of every body's blood but their own to the prosecution of the war, while they stay at home at ease and expect to have the work done with the profit they are making out of the public calamity. The law will doubtless be amended to suit their purposes, and to make escape from military service impossible to any man who cannot buy a substitute at a price which would buy his family a homestead.

It is a sad proof of the degeneracy of the republic that after three years of mighty effort to force back into subjugation 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of free-born Americans, who had withdrawn from a Government in which they had ceased to have confidence, it begins the fourth year with the need for 1,000,000 of soldiers, not fighting willingly for a cause because they love it, but because power they cannot resist and necessities that master them will constrain them to fight for the destruction of the right of another people to make free governments for themselves. It is a land-mark in the rapid progress of this people into the worst habits of the despotisms of the Old World, with which they have so long been in the vainglorious habit of contrasting themselves as the only people on the face of the earth ruled happily and peacefully with "the consent of the governed."

The conscription law being disposed of and the military power secured, the policy of the dominant party for the perpetuating of its power will be speedily developed. The plans for that purpose, which are simultaneously advanced, as if by Bishop Hughes came to this country in 1826 and in his boyhood was a gardener's boy. In this capacity he served in the Catholic seminary at Emmitsburg, Md. There, where he commenced his studies for the priesthood, where he was ordained priest, and where he became a professor, he was a resident of Pennsylvania, and it was while in that State that he established a great reputation among the Germans for learning, eloquence, and the talents of rare discretion as a controversialist. He had public discussions with Dr. Breckenridge, a very distinguished Presbyterian preacher, on the questions of controversy between the Catholics and the Protestants. He was also engaged in a controversy with Governor Ritner, of Pennsylvania, in relation to the common school system of that State, and has always remained prominent in the public eye. He used to say that the debates between himself and Dr. Breckenridge did more to spread the doctrines of the Catholic religion, of its beliefs and practices, than all that had preceded them. He used to say that the debates between himself and Governor Ritner did more to spread a knowledge of the Catholic religion, of its beliefs and practices, than all that had preceded them. He used to say that the debates between himself and Governor Ritner did more to spread a knowledge of the Catholic religion, of its beliefs and practices, than all that had preceded them.

The weather is extremely cold, and the snow storms at the West have been very severe and are still raging. The railroad blockade of the Southern States is also reported as almost complete. What there is to be gained for the cause of the rebellion by preventing provisions from reaching Northern cities, it is difficult to see. It is a war upon the people, and will be so regarded by them. It will only serve to make them more determined to crush the rebellion. The Northern people will not starve, and they will not be driven from the contest by any such means. Their patriotism will rise above all such considerations. Still, in the interests of humanity, it is to be hoped that the railroads will soon be opened, and that the Southern people will not be compelled to suffer from the want of the necessaries of life. The Richmond papers are very much exercised about the matter, and are trying to make political capital out of it. They say that the Northern people are starving the Southern people to death, and that they are doing it for the purpose of subjugating them. They say that the Northern people are starving the Southern people to death, and that they are doing it for the purpose of subjugating them. They say that the Northern people are starving the Southern people to death, and that they are doing it for the purpose of subjugating them.

THE CIVIL STRUGGLE AND THE SOUTHERN PEOPLE.

The contrast of sentiments that now exists between the leaders of the rebellion and the people of the South is very striking, and their position is one of great embarrassment. The ruling class of aristocrats in the South have been carrying on the war for the purpose of establishing a government of their own, in which they could have full control of the affairs of the country, and of the people. They have been carrying on the war for the purpose of establishing a government of their own, in which they could have full control of the affairs of the country, and of the people. They have been carrying on the war for the purpose of establishing a government of their own, in which they could have full control of the affairs of the country, and of the people.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

the bar silver brought by the last Indian packet, which is suitable for India, has been sold at $62\frac{3}{8}$d. per oz., being an advance of $\frac{3}{8}$d. on the price obtained for the previous arrival. And some large amounts have been purchased at $62\frac{1}{2}$d. per oz. Mexican dollars continue very firm. The ships on their way from Australia, are the Suffolk, with £115,500; the Water Nymph with £56,000; and the Omar Pacha with £71,000. In addition to these the City of Manchester and the Harmonia from New York will bring £228,000.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta, 21,10,000 rupees; to Bombay, 17,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum price declared was as before—1s. $11\frac{1}{2}$d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. $11\frac{5}{8}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 247 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 2s. $\frac{1}{8}$d., and upwards will receive in full, and nothing will be allotted at lower rates; those on Bombay at 2s. $\frac{1}{4}$d. will receive about 9 per cent., on Madras at 2s. $\frac{1}{8}$d., about 42 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has undergone a considerable change since our last. A sudden movement brought the price up to 48, then again large sales caused a reaction to 44, 46, and the market has again receded to 42 to 44, with a healthy market. The advance was caused principally by the purchases of "bears," who were anxious to close their operations, partly also by the purchase of the public in anticipation of the approaching dividend—and drawing of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—of the amount of the loan. The formation of several blockade-running companies to bring out cotton under the loan has given an additional impulse to dealings.

THE NEW FRENCH LOAN.

The particulars of the new French Loan for £12,000,000 sterling have been published in the Moniteur. The public subscriptions are to remain open from the 18th to the 25th of January. The issue price is 66f. 30c., and interest will be reckoned from the 1st January. Subscriptions of 6f. rente will not be subject to reduction. One-tenth of the amount taken is to be paid at the time of subscription, and the remainder in ten equal instalments on the 21st of each month. A bonus of 4 per cent. will be allowed on all instalments paid in advance.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Business in the English Stock Market has been exceedingly depressed throughout the week. The very unsatisfactory state of affairs with regard to the Danish question, the large withdrawals of gold, to the extent of nearly three-quarters of a million sterling, from the Bank of England, and the continued drain of specie from the Bank of France, have naturally caused considerable uneasiness amongst the dealers, and with the certainty of money becoming dearer under the circumstances, has not only caused a considerable diminution in the amount of dealings, but also a corresponding decline in prices. Soon after the opening this morning Consols declined $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. and when it was announced that the bank directors had put up the rate a further fall of $\frac{1}{8}$ took place, the final quotation being $90\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{8}$ for money, and $90\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{5}{8}$ for the account, which is a decline of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. since this day week. Exchequer Bills are also heavy, being again down to 6s. to 1s. dis. The Foreign Stock Market has also been much depressed, in a few of the fancy stocks there has been a little speculation, but in other descriptions there has been very little doing, and prices generally have declined. Greek stock is down to 21 to $21\frac{1}{2}$, being a fall of 2 per cent.; Mexican has receded to $34\frac{3}{8}$ to $34\frac{5}{8}$, or a decline of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Spanish are comparatively steady, the Passives closing at 33 to $33\frac{1}{4}$; and the Certificates at $13\frac{1}{4}$ to $13\frac{1}{2}$; Turkish Six per Cents (1854) are down to $88\frac{1}{2}$ to $89\frac{1}{2}$, and those of 1862 to $66\frac{1}{4}$ to $66\frac{3}{4}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The transactions in American Government and railway Securities have been on a very limited scale indeed, and the general tendency of prices is heavy. The only dealings recorded being Virginian State Six per Cents. at $32\frac{1}{4}$ and $32\frac{1}{2}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway New York Section, 76, 75, and 76.; Ditto ditto, Pennsylvanian, ditto, 78. Illinois Central Six per Cents. $84\frac{1}{2}$.; Ditto ditto, Seven per Cents., 72.; Ditto ditto, $100 Shares, $90 paid, 25 and $24\frac{1}{4}$ discount, and ditto ditto, all paid, $70\frac{1}{2}$.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The railway share market has exhibited rather more animation; the dealings have been extensive, and the decline in prices has been comparatively less than in any of the other departments. There has, however, to-day been a little more heaviness with a further downward tendency in quotations. As compared with last week there has been a decline in Brightons of 3 per cent. caused by the announcement of a reduction in the forthcoming dividend. Midland and North Eastern (York) have receded from $\frac{3}{4}$ to 1 per cent. Caledonian, Great Eastern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North-Western, Sheffield, Metropolitan, and North-Eastern (Leeds) have declined from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and Great Western and North-Eastern (Berwick) from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. The only improvement has been in North British and South Eastern, which are $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. better. In foreign railway shares, there has been a steady business doing, but limited, and for shares in British possessions, although the dealings have not been extensive, fair prices have been obtained.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the half-yearly meeting of the City Bank, Mr. P. Bell in the chair, a dividend and bonus equal to 12 per cent. per annum, both free of income-tax, were declared. The reserve fund now amounts to £130,000, and the directors consider the time has arrived to take into consideration the expediency of allowing it to accumulate at compound interest. The chairman stated that the earnings of the six months were considered in excess of those of any previous period, although high rates of interest had only recently come into operation, they being at the rate of no less than 17 per cent. per annum. The accounts altogether were regarded as satisfactory, and the report was unanimously adopted.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Imperial Bank, Mr. Dickson in the chair, a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum was recommended, which would absorb about £5,000, and that £3,000 be appropriated to a reserve fund, and the balance, £1,613, be carried to the credit of profit and loss account. The chairman stated that the gross profit for the last half-year amounted to £20,227, being an increase of nearly 60 per cent. upon the profits of the previous half-year. The bank had been admitted to the clearing house, and in consequence had received a number of additional accounts. A reserve fund would be established, because the directors thought that it would give the public more confidence. The report was unanimously adopted and the dividend agreed to.—At an extraordinary meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, a resolution was agreed to authorising the issue of £1,000,000 new capital, in 10,000 shares at £2 premium per share; 8,000 shares to be allotted among the shareholders at the rate of four shares for every five shares previously held, and 2,000 shares to be reserved for distribution by the directors.—At the ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the London and South Western Bank a balance-sheet was read, showing an available balance of £1,910, which would enable the directors to declare a dividend equal to about 9 per cent. per annum, but they recommend that the amount should be carried forward to the next half-year. The gross profits amounted to £4,214, and the report showed that the branches opened had worked most successfully. The report was adopted, and the recommendation of the directors agreed to.—A private meeting has been held of the shareholders in the Unity and London and Middlesex Banks, to discuss the necessary steps to get the directors to convene a general meeting, and generally with a view to extract additional information respecting the position of the affairs of these concerns, now in course of winding-up. After some discussion it was eventually resolved "That as the directors of the Unity Bank have so long and unnecessarily delayed the publication of its affairs and the distribution of the assets, a public meeting be convened on the 2nd July next at the Guildhall Hotel, and that notice be given to the directors to produce the separate ledger of the Unity Bank which is stated to contain all the transactions since the London and Middlesex Bank has been acting as the Unity's bankers; and also any further information they may possess respecting the bank and its affairs. The discussion had also reference to the loans which the directors of the London and Middlesex Bank are stated to have had, and to other large and irregular transactions.—At the Annual General Meeting of the London and Westminster Bank, held this afternoon, the report presented stated that, after making provision for all bad and doubtful debts, paying the income tax, setting apart £2,000 towards the building of the bank, and presenting a gratuity of 10 per cent. on their salaries to all the officers of the establishment—the net profits for the half year would amount to £147,815. This sum, added to £27,759, the unappropriated balance of the previous half year, would amount to £175,575. Out of this amount interest on the rest or surplus fund at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum had been added to such fund, which now amounted to £275,953. The directors declared a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum and a bonus of 12 per cent. on the paid-up capital. After these payments had been made there would remain a balance of £18,844, to be carried to profit and loss account for the current half-year. The report was adopted nem. con.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the St. Katherine Dock Company it was stated that the earnings during the past six months exceeded those of the previous like period by £15,000 or £16,000, while the expenses were only £6,000 more. The chairman intimated that everything had been done towards carrying out the amalgamation scheme, and he had no doubt that the proprietors would be convened in general meeting in due time to signify their approval of the bill for this object. A dividend of $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. was declared, free of income-tax, making, with the previous amount divided, a total distribution of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the first year.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the Oil Wells Company of Canada, Sir Henry Leeke presiding, it was unanimously agreed that the Company should be dissolved in accordance with the recommendation of the board, and that the thanks of the proprietors should be given to the directors for their prudent conduct and consequent entire prevention of loss.—The Scottish Australian Investment Company have this afternoon issued their report, preparatory to the half-yearly meeting to be held on the 29th instant. The report embraces the operations of the Company for the half-year ending the 30th of June last in the colony, and on the 31st December last in London. From this it appears that the gross profit realised in the colony during the above period is £15,972; to which must be added the sum of £78, received in London for interest, and transfer fees, making a gross profit, for the six months, of £16,050. A comparison of the accounts with those issued in the last three reports shows that there has been, during the two years ending at the 30th of June, 1863, a gradual increase in the net profits of the company, those of the half-year ending at that date having exceeded the net profits of the corresponding six months of 1862 by the sum of £1,523. The whole of such increased profit has been derived from the ordinary sources of the company's revenue, viz.—rents, interest, and commissions. The directors propose a dividend on the ordinary stock of the company, £200,000, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, less income-tax, which will require £10,000, and leave £261 to be carried to the credit of the reserved fund. The amount of that fund will then be £7,343. The most recent advices received from the manager are dated the 20th of November last. He then writes:—"Money continues scarce, and we are, I think, more closely invested up than we have ever been. . . . It is satisfactory to feel that we have grounds for being substantially pleased with the position of our investments. . . . The season has been a fine one; as a consequence, sheep and cattle generally are healthy and in good condition. There is a fine clip of wool just coming off the sheep's backs, while the latest report of the European wool market is more encouraging than it has been for some time back, and prices of store sheep and cattle are looking up.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the London Chemical Company, with a proposed capital of £40,000 in 2,000 shares of £20 each, of which more than one-half, it is stated, is already subscribed. The directors announce that valuable works in the neighbourhood of London have been secured, and that the demand is such for the chemicals to be manufactured that a return of at least 20 per cent. may be anticipated.—The International Financial Society have intimated that they will receive subscriptions for the capital of the Land Securities Company (Limited) amounting to £2,000,000 in 40,000 shares of £50 each, but of which £1,000,000 only is to be issued at present. The Company, it is stated, will act as agents between the investing public and the borrower, make advances, repayable at fixed terms or by terminable annuities on landed estates, and on any charges upon land, such as county and parish rates, levied on land under public or private Acts of Parliament, Royal Charters, Commissions of Sewers, improvement rent charges on private estates, town improvement rates, ground rents, harbour trusts, &c. Acting by their debenture system, the directors will be enabled to turn over the paid-up capital many times in the year, and it is estimated that a working fund of £200,000—being £10 per share—will be sufficient to conduct a business involving operations of three or four millions per annum.—The prospectus has been issued of the London, Italian, and Adriatic Steam Navigation Company. The object is to establish a line of screw steamers between London and Genoa, Leghorn, Naples, Messina, and Palermo, to sail regularly at intervals of not less than ten days, and also additional lines to meet the requirements of the general trade with the Adriatic and Mediterranean ports. Four new steamers are ready for the purposes of the undertaking. The proposed capital is £500,000 in shares of £50 each.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets business is checked by the critical position of continental politics, and the increasing stringency of money. Purchases in nearly every department are made with considerable reserve. So much so that even articles whose value would be necessarily enhanced by the outbreak of war, remain stationary, while such as would suffer a diminution of demand, are saleable only on lower terms. The cotton market is extremely dull and the rates of last week are not now obtainable. The corn trade remains without improvement. For foreign wheat quotations are barely supported, whilst English is lower. The demand for oilcake is less active owing to the open weather. We have recently had some large arrivals of linseed, which may extend the supplies of home make. American bacon is firmly held and singed sides at 44s. show an advance of 2s. Beef remains out of demand. The activity in American butter has abated and stocks have rather increased. American cheese moves off slowly at about the previous currency. In petroleum there is more doing, and rates are firmer at 2s. and 2s. 1d. per gallon for refined, whilst crude is quoted at £17 10s. per tun. The tallow markets, affected by foreign politics, is a point firmer, but with no great amount of activity. Linseed oil is the turn cheaper, 35s. 3d. being accepted on the spot. Rape is not materially altered. Cocoa-nut is very dull, the continental demand having fallen off considerably. Sperm remains at £75 to £76 per tun. As yet saltpetre, the stock of which is heavy, has not been affected by the apprehensions of war, and to-day a sale was made for cash at a small decline. The sugar market has given way fully 6d. to 1s. per cwt., and there is no disposition to purchase beyond immediate requirement at the reduction. Rice is quite neglected on the spot, and meets but little inquiry floating. Jute has suffered a further fall of £2 10s to £3 per ton. Hemp maintains its value. Cochineal has declined 2d. per lb. for all descriptions. Other dyes are inactive, without essential change in price. A decided pause has taken place in the speculation in metals. Scotch pig iron has receded to 64s. 3d., and spelter for arrival has been sold at £18 10s., but closes £21 or £21 5s. per ton. English copper has however been advanced to £116 for best selected, and £113 for common cake.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 20.

OUR cotton market has shown but very little animation during the week; the dealings have been comparatively limited, and prices are again lower, with still a declining tendency. The state of affairs abroad and the continued decrease of gold at the Bank of England, with the unfavourable advices with regard to the Bank of France, preventing anything like a speculative movement. The total sales last week have amounted to only 18,000 bales, of which 5,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 72,820 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 105,710 bales. There have been imported this year 27,955 bales, against 56,610 bales to the same time last year. The exports this year, so far, have been 11,064 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 9,727 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 48,000 bales, and in 1863, 44,300 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 15,950 bales; same last year, 18,540 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 250,260 bales, and at the same period in 1863, 395,040 bales. Of American descriptions the stock on hand is not abundant, and as only a small supply is generally anticipated, there is no great pressure to sell, consequently prices of this description are rather firmer than for other sorts. At present the chief demand is for Surats of the best qualities, which are scarce, and prices steady. The latest quotations were—American descriptions from $25\frac{1}{2}$d. to 28. Egyptian, $27\frac{3}{4}$d. to 33d. Pernambuco, 27d. to 33d. Maranhams, $27\frac{1}{2}$d. to $28\frac{1}{2}$d. Bahia, 28d. to $28\frac{1}{2}$d., and Surats $15\frac{1}{2}$d. to 23d.

MANCHESTER, January 19.

Business in this market during the past week has been exceedingly dull, and prices for yarns and goods are tending downwards, although scarcely sufficient has been done to test them.

Continental politics assuming a more gloomy aspect day by day, and an increasing demand at the Bank of England for gold having set in for export, tend to depress the tone of our market, and induce many spinners who are without orders, or are running out of contracts, to close their mills for an indefinite period. According to the report of the Central Relief Committee, there was an increase in the number of applicants for relief for the week ending 9th inst. of 10,000 persons, with a prospect of a still further increase.

To-day our market has been very quiet, holders being anxious to sell, and agents for yarn received orders not to refuse any offers, however low, without first submitting to their spinners, who are very anxious to clear out; yet, notwithstanding this desire to meet buyers no business has resulted, and the market is voted the dullest one of the past few months.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

It is in vain the New York papers daily report that "the military situation is unchanged." It is in vain that General Meade informs the people of Philadelphia that, weather permitting, operations in Virginia will be recommenced, and that he trusts peace will be restored before next summer by hard fighting. Wall-street will not be comforted or assured. No great battle has been fought, but the activity of the Confederates in every quarter convinces the most credulous dupes of the Federal Government that the South is not exhausted, and is as united and determined as ever. Whilst the commander of the hybernating army of the Potomac was on the stump in Pennsylvania, General Stuart with 5,000 cavalry, was moving about, some said making the circuit of the Northern camp, to the terror of the Federal Government. General Lee announces the capture in Hardy County, Virginia, of 300 Federals and some cattle. The Federal gunboat Iron Age has been destroyed by the Confederate batteries at the entrance of Wilmington harbour and her crew captured. At Charleston the bombardment was suspended, the Federals having quite enough to do in repairing their batteries. General Longstreet has been reinforced, and General Johnstone maintains a bold front at Dalton. The only military movement of the Federals is sending an extra brigade of troops under General Terry to Johnson's Island, for fear the suffering Confederate prisoners should attempt to escape across the ice.

The destruction of a Federal ironclad inside the bar of Wilmington gives some colour to a report recently published by the American correspondent of a Manchester paper, that a secret expedition was about to start for Wilmington, under command of Commodore Farragut, and that the result would be decided before the correspondent's letter could reach its destination. It is certainly difficult, on any other supposition, to account for the presence of the Iron Age in so unusual a place, as it is improbable that a vessel of her class should be employed in blockading, and it is therefore fair to see in this event another addition to the long list of Federal failures.

We have at present merely a telegraphic summary of the proceedings at Halifax in reference to the seizure of the Chesapeake, but unless the summary is unusually deceptive, the conduct of the President of the Admiralty Court, the Hon. Judge Stuart, C.B., is unprecedented. Mr. J. W. Ritchie represented the Confederates; but at the opening of the case, and before that gentleman could speak, the Judge said the case was entertained upon the ground that the seizure of the vessel was a piratical act, and that in his opinion she ought to be given up to the owners. Upon this, Mr. Ritchie asked the Judge to contemplate the probability of an application of the Confederates for her, but his Honour said he would not entertain anything of the kind. What was the use of the trial if the Judge had already determined upon his verdict, we are at a loss to conceive. Mr. Ritchie, in spite of the foregone conclusion of the Judge, argued that the seizure by the Confederates was valid, and that any citizen of the Confederacy, with or without a commission, has an absolute right to seize any vessel belonging to the Federals. The Advocate-General was not quite so confident as the Judge, and confessed he had some difficulty in bringing his case into Court. He said, however, that, in his opinion, there was primâ facie evidence that the capture was piracy, and that, therefore, the vessel should be given over to the Federal owners. It appears from examination of the citizens charged with aiding the rescue of the Confederates that the commander of the expedition had a commission from the Confederate Government. The persons charged with aiding the rescue are to appear before the Supreme Court.

We suppose no Englishman can read without a feeling of passionate indignation the account just published of the murder of Mr. James Gray, the mate of the bark Saxon, by an officer of the United States war steamer Vanderbilt. A public investigation of the case has been made by the resident magistrate of Cape Town. The Saxon left Table Bay on the 2nd September with a cargo of cattle for the Government. Having discharged at Ascension she proceeded, according to the orders of the owners, Messrs. Anderson, Saxon, and Co., to Angra Pequina, and there took in a cargo of skins and wool. On the 30th October, when just ready for sea, she was boarded by a boat's crew from the Vanderbilt. The cargo and papers were examined and the latter were taken to the Vanderbilt, Mr. Donoghan being left in charge. After a while another boat arrived from the United States steamer, and without any communication to Captain Shepherd, of the Saxon, the deck was placed in charge of armed men and the crew was driven below. Captain Shepherd protested against this rough treatment, and said to the United States officer, "You ought to have come to me as a gentleman to tell me your business, instead of taking charge in the manner you have done, and before your commander has seen my papers." Soon after this a boat came alongside from the island for some promised bread and meat. Captain Shepherd told his chief officer, Mr. Gray, to give it, after first mentioning it to the Federal officer, Mr. Keith. At first Keith assented, afterwards refused, and Shepherd ordered Gray to throw it into the boat, unless prevented. Keith then came forward and said to Captain Shepherd, "You go aft, you are giving too many orders. I will put you where the dogs won't bark at you," and Shepherd went aft. At this time Mr. Gray—totally unarmed—was standing half-way up the poop ladder. Donoghan, who had been dining with Gray, told him to "go down." Gray, not hearing the order or not understanding it, did not move. Donoghan then repeated the order, adding, "or I will shoot you," and simultaneously gave Gray a push on the shoulder which made him stumble. As Gray was trying to recover himself, the United States officer drew a revolver and shot him. Poor Gray never spoke, and died in about two minutes. One of the seamen of the Saxon rushed forward and took his murdered officer in his arms, and remarked that his life was gone. Donoghan said, "No, it is not," and held his pistol to the seaman's face. Donoghan said he was sorry, and Captain Baldwin said he was sorry, and perhaps Mr. Seward may inform the British Government that he is sorry; but their sorrow will not restore the murdered man to life, and is worth no more than the jest of one of the Vanderbilt's men over the dead body—"Donoghan is a good shot, but he is a great deal too fast!" There was a time when a British seaman could not be butchered with impunity by the officers of any government. Perhaps that good time may come again.

The arrest of Mr. A. M. Palmer, the private secretary of Mr. Hiram Barney, the Collector of the Port of New York, has caused considerable excitement. Mr. Palmer is charged with conniving at the evasion of the law and with being in league with shippers to the Confederate States. Mr. Benjamin, a merchant, who is in Fort Lafayette, was a friend of Palmer's, and appears to have given him money at various times. Amongst Palmer's papers seized by the officers, was a memorandum written by Palmer on custom-house paper, requesting Benjamin to send $150 immediately. Mr. Palmer is a staunch Republican and a strenuous advocate of the ultra war policy. On a late occasion he attended a meeting at King's county and vehemently declared against the Peace party as a band of traitors to their country. Mr. Lincoln must be obtuse indeed, if he does not know that Mr. Palmer's is a fair specimen of the patriotism of the party leaders who support him. The New York World commenting on this affair says, "Mr. Palmer is a prominent Republican politician, a member of the Republican State Central Committee, its secretary, and of its executive committee. The facts which have already been made public in the cases of Stanton and Smalley, and those which cannot now be concealed in the case of Mr. Barney's private secretary, will demonstrate, beyond the shadow of a reasonable doubt, that the 'aid and comfort' which have been given so constantly through the Custom-house of New York to the rebels in arms against the Government, have been given, not in spite of all the vigilance of the custom-house Republican officials, but by their organised assistance and to their pecuniary profit. It is to the desks of the custom-house that the vigilant officer has gone who has unearthed these corruptions; it is to the private apartments of Collector Barney himself that he has tracked the scoundrels who, paid liberally to serve their country in a peaceful and honourable occupation, have been assisting the rebels with the means of endurance against the Government, with the power to cost and extort from the nation more of its treasure, and from our soldiers more of their blood."

But the most ominous incident, and which clearly indicates the great extent of the official corruption, is that the House of Representatives rejected a resolution proposed by Mr. Fernando Wood to investigate the charges against General Butler of fraudulent conduct at New Orleans, and also the frauds committed in the various executive departments of the Government. In order to make this rejection seemingly less disgraceful Mr. Fenton introduced a resolution to inquire into the frauds at the New York Custom-house, which was adopted. What need is there to order an investigation of an affair that is already being investigated? If General Butler is guiltless of the thefts imputed to him, and if the other departments are honest, how is it they dread investigation, and why are they not anxious to have their innocency made manifest? No one doubts the guilt of Butler and the corruption of the Government employes. What must be the condition and prospects of the country when crime and corruption are connived at by Congress?

General M'Clellan's long talked of report, or a portion of it, has just been published. According to a summary of this document, which is dated August 4, 1863, the cation by measures which would admit to the franchise the élite, and only the élite, of the working-classes. Here was a point on which the conflicting sections of the Liberal party could concur. Lord John Russell was at once enraged and terrified by the prospect of his own extinguishment. Once let Reform be taken out of his hands, and settled by the Conservatives in a permanent manner, and there would be an end for ever of his position among the leaders of the Liberal party. The Radicals were equally alarmed; for the Conservative plan threatened also to extinguish them, by annihilating their sole grievance and depriving them of the only support which could do them any good. If the really intelligent portion of the artisans were admitted to the suffrage, then clamours on behalf of the unintelligent and thriftless would neither be plausible nor formidable. The approach of a common danger led to a coalition. Lord Palmerston had learned the necessity of respecting the personal claims of the Radical leaders; and they agreed to waive their animosity to Lord Palmerston on certain conditions. Their honour was to be saved by a Reform Bill—which need not, and did not, become a Reform Act—by the conversion of the leading Whigs on the question of Church-rates, which has equally failed of practical effect. The substantial part of the bargain was that two seats in the Cabinet, one of them a secretaryship of state, should be placed at the disposal of the "Manchester School," which, for convenience and truth, we had better for the future call the American School. Mr. Cobden was to have the refusal of the first; the second was the price of Mr. Bright. That gentleman could not be asked to enter the Cabinet in person. The country abhorred him; Parliament despised him; his inveterate habits of slander and vituperation, his vulgarity, and his incurable want of veracity, had made him so hateful to the educated classes that it would have required no common courage to give him office; his insolent sneers at royalty would have made his appointment little less than a personal insult to the Queen; and his bad temper would have made him an intolerable colleague in the council. But Mr. Bright had another self; a faithful shadow, which had no ideas, no soul, no other existence but what it borrowed from him, while its previous life and education had accustomed it to the society of statesmen and of gentlemen. It was arranged that an office of no power or importance should be bestowed on this decorous nonentity, and erected for the nonce into a cabinet office. The arrangement was not completely carried out. Mr. Cobden, to whom was offered the most laborious and least influential of the greater cabinet offices, declined it; and was gratified with a diplomatic mission, conferring unheard-of powers, and involving negotiations of vaster importance than are usually committed to any other than cabinet ministers. The home secretaryship could not be given to a shadow, even though that shadow were John Bright's; and accordingly, it was filled up by the appointment of an amiable scion of a great Whig family, a veteran in office of tried incapacity. En revanche, another cabinet place was made for an aristocratic ally of the American party; and that faction is now represented in the cabinet by the President of the Poor Law Board and the President of the Board of Trade. The former is generally silent, in mercy to an audience which contains no worse speaker than the Right Hon. C. P. Villiers; the latter is heard about once a year in the House of Commons, where he makes an official speech, and once a year at Ashton, where he gratifies his affectionate feelings by echoing, with amiable feebleness, the wild untruths and extravagant declamation of his more substantial self. John Bright, diluted through Milner Gibson, is poor stuff indeed; and Ashton must envy Rochdale, which is privileged to hear the Billingsgate of the arch-demagogue at first-hand.

At Ashton, Mr. Milner Gibson casts off the minister and assumes the Radical member. We do not know whether he made a compact with his colleagues that he should be allowed to do so, inasmuch as he might find it difficult to please his supporters in that constituency if he were restrained by the bonds of ministerial reserve. Perhaps he did; perhaps, also, he pointed out to them that it was necessary for him, in order to satisfy his constituents and his faction, to retain his name on the lists of the Liberation Society, and to express annually his abhorrence of the Church and his reverence for the ballot. If so, we may be sure that their consent was given with a promptitude as contemptuous as courtesy would allow. Lord Russell would not be permitted to do this sort of thing; he could not be enrolled among the open enemies of the Protestant religion as by law established, or allowed to run loose about the country, cursing the South and talking nonsense about Slesvig-Holstein. Nay, it would not do for the Duke of Argyll or Mr. Cardwell, or any other of those who are cabinet ministers in something more than name, to indulge in such vagaries. The country would be frightened, and foreign ministers might ask explanations. Therefore, the major ministers are reserved in their speeches, and the minor ones, unless their chief feels sure of their discretion, are bidden to hold their tongues. It is, therefore, a proof of Mr. Milner Gibson's utter insignificance that he is permitted to make a fool of himself when and where he pleases. Such licence could not be accorded to any man whom the Premier did not heartily despise; nay more, it could be accorded to no one who was not thought too insignificant to attract attention from the country. But the minister feels, and perhaps says, "Oh, it's only Milner Gibson; no one will think that we mean anything by allowing him to talk." And the orator, with a Christian humility, evidently understands and accepts this position, and talks with careless freedom, insulting a foreign State in one sentence, defying public feeling in the next, advocating revolution at home and repudiation of treaties abroad, in an evident and touching reliance on his own irresponsibility. No one can think of calling him to account. "It's only poor Tom, nobody minds Tom," is the only excuse which either others or himself would dream of offering for the imbecilities of the right honourable orator.

Thus it is that he allows himself to talk such wonderful nonsense about Denmark and Germany. "He don't understand the question, how should he? but it can't be worth a fight. Let us refer it to arbitration." If a responsible minister had said such a thing, we should have been bound to remind him that England cannot refer to arbitration a dispute which involves a distinct pledge given on her part to one of the disputants. No arbitrator can be asked to decide whether or no the signataries of the treaty of 1852 shall abide by their signatures. Until the King of Denmark is acknowledged by Austria and Prussia there can be no question for arbitration to decide. But we need not give a serious answer to the member for Ashton. "Nobody minds him."

It would be held exceedingly indecent for a responsible minister to sneer at the arguments of the greatest lawyers in England in the case of the Alexandra, to push aside the judges, and to pronounce sentence himself in the name of uneducated and unaided "common sense." But the country does not notice the indecency in Mr. Gibson, simply because no one can possibly regard him as a responsible statesman; and neither Sir Hugh Cairns nor Sir Roundell Palmer are likely to resent the impertinence of such a critic, further than by

> Smiling as a master smiles at one
> That is not of his school, nor any school
> But that where blind and naked Ignorance
> Delivers brawling judgments, unashamed,
> On all things all day long.

It would not be permitted to a minister to accuse a foreign Government of a systematic attempt to evade and violate our laws; the fact being that that Government has throughout taken the utmost care to keep within our laws, while its enemy has been permitted to violate them with impunity. Nor would it be held exactly correct in a man whose position gave weight to his words to exult over the continuance of emigration to New York, in view of the notorious fact that the conscription has put an end to legitimate emigration, and that the figures of the New York Commissioners simply represent the number of Irish and other victims seduced by Yankee recruiting agents to manure the fields of Virginia and Tennessee. Such a man might be asked, on the one hand, whether he conceived that the Foreign Enlistment Act was intended only to interfere with trade, and not to put a stop to foreign enlistment; and on the other hand, whether the Confederates had ever gone half so far in "evasion" of our laws as the Garibaldian expedition; which, nevertheless, was openly supported by the Radicals, and permitted to take place in open day by the Government? But we need not waste reasoning or remonstrance on the President of the Board of Trade. A man who accuses the South of "having undertaken a war of aggression" is either morally or intellectually unworthy of refutation.

Mr. Gibson's speech, however, contained one word, which, if not true, had in it a germ of truth, and of a truth not sufficiently regarded by English observers of the American struggle. He denounced secession as "a revolt against democracy;" and in that phrase he explained at once the hatred of his faction to the South—a hatred which is of very recent date, and has no sort of connection with the subject of negro slavery. While the slave States remained in the Union, neither Mr. Bright nor his disciples had a word to say against slavery; some of them were, so far as they dared, its covert apologists. They hate slavery only because, in their own phrase, "slavery broke up the Union;" that is, because slavery was the field on which the political conflict that destroyed the Union was fought, and because the slave-owners happen to be the seceding party. But their real ground of quarrel with the South, their real view of the American war, has been correctly defined by Mr. Gibson. The South has repudiated the rule of the rabble; she has committed treason against the divine right of the multitude; she is fighting against the principles of democracy, and the North is fighting for them; and therefore the South is hateful in the eyes of European demagogues.

There is some truth in this view. The maintenance of the Union during eighty years was mainly due to the conservative character of the Southern people, which the presence of an inferior race naturally tended to bring out into strong relief. Their reverence for established order, their aversion to violent or wanton changes, their faith in the lessons of the past, and distrust of reckless innovations and mere experiments, in fine, their calmer habits of thought, formed so many barriers to the progress of that wild Radicalism, that political and religious scepticism, partly indigenous partly imported from Europe, which swayed the Northern section of the Union. By these virtues the Southern people long contrived to hold their own against the superior numbers and resources of the North; though, beaten back from one position to another, and forced from one compromise to another, each more unfavourable than the last, their situation was gradually becoming intolerable and untenable. But the passion and power of the democracy of the North grew too strong for them. Envy of Southern wealth and refinement, impatience of the check imposed by Southern firmness and unity, the hatred of brawling demagogues for Southern statesmen, urged the North on from one aggression to another, from one encroachment to a further one, until the determination of the multitude to rule by its own mere will, in defiance of right and contempt of law, found its full expression in the election of a President, against whom every Southern vote was given, on the express understanding that he should lead a crusade against State Rights and Southern institutions, and establish the reign of a rampant democracy on the ruins of the Constitution. Against this pretension the South rose in arms, refusing to acknowledge the right of numbers to inaugurate confiscation and override the fundamental compact of the Confederation. In this sense the cause of the South is truly a revolt against democracy; the revolt of right against might, of law against licence, of order against anarchy. Such is its title to the hatred of demagogues; and such its irresistible claim to the sympathy and support of honest men.

SOUTHERN FINANCES: ANOTHER REMEDY.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—I have read with great interest your admirable articles on "The Embargo on Cotton," and "A Method of Meeting Southern Engagements," also the well-considered and statesmanlike Report of Mr. Memminger. You will excuse my presumption in thinking that neither of these have yet exhausted the subject, nor indeed go quite far enough for an effectual remedy, and that, after combining and adopting in full the recommendations of each, there is still room for important additions to them.

Mr. Memminger's scheme, perfectly practicable and sternly conscientious as it is, appears to me to have this serious fault, that it accepts, as an unalterable and unavoidable fact, the public debt at its present exaggerated computation in an enormously depreciated currency. At my latest advices from Richmond, to the middle of December, the brokers were paying from $15 to $16 in currency for the gold dollar, and somewhat less for silver. It is clear, therefore, that if the Confederate Government had in its possession a sufficient amount of specie or foreign exchange, it could redeem the whole of its indebtedness with about one-fifteenth, or less than 7 per cent. of its nominal amount—that is to say, but little more than it proposes to pay after peace, annually, as interest. There would be no repudiation in this, as each creditor would obtain the full market value of his claim, and all would no doubt be only too glad to avail themselves of the chance. I should not trouble you with the suggestion of an Archimedes' lever, unless I believed myself prepared to suggest also the fulcrum whereon to rest it.

Every bale of cotton now in the Confederacy may, without any very extravagant figure of speech, be compared to an ingot of gold, worth, minus the dangers and cost of exportation, at least £40 sterling. The lowest estimate of the quantity of cotton extant is 3,000,000 bales, representing a value at ruling Liverpool prices of not less than £120,000,000. You have already so conclusively demonstrated the duty of the Confederate Government to undertake the realisation of these values as an arm of the national defence, and its ability to do so at the rate per annum of about one-twentieth of the entire stock of cotton, that I need not enter here upon this part of the subject. Suppose it had assumed this duty in the earlier stages of the war, say in the autumn of 1861; suppose it had bought the whole stock of cotton at 6d. per pound, and paid for it in notes of convenient size, redeemable in specie in England; suppose, further, that no other issues of the Treasury had competed with the £30,000,000 thus thrown into circulation with suitable precautions, nearly the whole would have been floated by the business requirements of the country and but a very trifling percentage would have been offered at the place of payment. The necessity for greater expenditures than could be raised by taxation would have been met by regular loans, to which the people would have been both able and willing to subscribe, and which would not have added to the volume of the circulation. The Government should have treated these notes as specie, and received them as such in all cases where specie payments were exacted by law. It is obvious that any serious depreciation would thus have been impossible.

I have not made this supposition idly, for it is not yet too late to try the curative virtue of what, if adopted in time, would have been a preventive. To supplant the present currency by one such as I have described is not practicable at one stroke, but it may be done partially and gradually. Let Congress authorise the issue of $150,000,000 of notes payable at ninety days' sight by the depositaries of the Treasury in Europe. They should not be below the denomination of $50, or the average value of a cotton bale, so as not to interfere too suddenly with the lower issues at present in circulation. Let it further authorise the purchase of all produce, cotton, tobacco, &c., in the country at stipulated prices, with this currency, and this alone. In my opinion, Mr. Memminger made an error in his disposal of the cotton coupon bonds. The sale should be optional with the holder of the produce, but the purchase, under certain precautionary conditions, should be compulsory with the Government. So soon as 10 per cent. of the specie notes, or $15,000,000, are thus paid out, the further issue of new notes of any other description should cease, and then, not before, another 50 per cent. of the specie notes should be offered in the market to the highest bidder, and exchanged for currency. This would still leave 40 per cent. of the original amount, or $60,000,000, as a reserve for continued purchases of produce. The next step would be to provide for the cancelling of the old notes thus returned to the Treasury, and this, I admit, could not be done until the specie notes commenced to flow back in the shape of taxes, subscriptions to national loans, &c. Of course the success of the plan presupposes the prohibition, either by an embargo or by a heavy export duty in specie, of all private exportation, and a vigorous exportation on Government account. I have only to add that the specie notes in question should not bear interest, for the double reason that they should be at once available for currency, which interest bearing notes never are; and secondly, that the holders may have every inducement to invest them in Bonds, thus loaning them again to the Government. I have sketched the scheme roughly; if you think it worthy of consideration, I shall be happy to explain it more in detail in a subsequent communication.

Respectfully yours,
SUGGESTION.

DAN TO BEERSHEBA.*

A LADY, very passé and who had been notoriously ugly from her youth upwards, desired to present to her friends a pleasant memorial of her person, and with this view paid a visit to a provincial portrait painter. She said she wished to have her likeness taken, and thereupon the artist bowed in the semi-grand style peculiar to provincial celebrities. The lady added that she required an unmistakable likeness, and also a pretty picture. The limner was puzzled. Of course he was quite accustomed to make his fair patrons look wonderfully juvenile and fascinating on canvas, or he could not have gained his daily bread by the exercise of his profession, but how to represent a desperately ugly dame as a charming Anglo-Saxon Venus, and yet preserve a resemblance, was a difficult problem. The prospect of a fee sharpened the poor painter's wit. His client had a nose sui generis. It was large, hooky, and awry. "Madam," said he, "let me do as I like with your nose, and I will undertake the commission." The lady assented, and the artist painted an exceedingly pretty face, except that he copied the exceedingly plain nose. Everybody recognised the likeness but nobody was deceived by the device. The nose was an evident fac-simile, and the rest of the picture was an evident effort of the imagination.

"Dan to Beersheba" has suggested this story. The purpose of the book is to damage the Southern people in the estimation of those who may chance to read this anonymous work. The author—probably a woman with rather a lax, unfeminine mind—is clever enough to perceive the folly of the Stowe school, and that a slanderer, to be effective, must be cool and discriminating. Upon this sound principle half the volume is written, and displays an amount of tact and ability altogether admirable. Miss Sybil Fanning, the Northern heroine of the book, is from Boston, and is set forth as a precise representative of the genuine Yankee girl. The late Mr. G. P. R. James never sketched a more perfect beauty, Sir E. B. Lytton never dreamt of such a superlatively constituted mind, and the old romance writers never invented such a paragon of all the virtues. Still Sybil has a few faults, or rather some of her virtues lean a little to the wrong side. She is a trifle too independent in her speech, now and then forms a hasty judgment, and is rather unbecomingly conscious of her own manifold perfection. She goes to the South and makes sad havoc with the hearts of the gentlemen, but she does not flirt and cannot be held responsible for the killing effects of her beauty. Perhaps our readers would like to know how a Southern gentleman makes love to a Yankee girl, and we therefore transfer a few sentences from the "offer" made to Sybil by Mr. Gabriel Montfort:—

"'Only give them back to me to-morrow; I meant to ask you that when I gathered them. Oh, Sybil, I love you, and you are looking so beautiful, so divine to-night, that I cannot keep silence. You drove me mad, talking to those two men for so long. You don't care for either of them, do you, Sybil? say you don't care for either of them!'

"'Gabriel Montfort,' she exclaimed. 'Are you out of your senses?'

"'Yes—yes—mad with love, and jealousy, and adoration. You don't love me now, Sybil—dearest, dearest Sybil—but say you will, say perhaps you will!'

"'Mr. Montfort, let my hand go, and let me go into the house. You have no right to call me by my first name, nor to address me in this strain at all. Let my hand go!' she added, peremptorily.

"'No, Sybil, you shall listen to me. I have a right to speak; for I love you—I worship you. Oh, give me some hope! What are all the women in the world beside you? How can a man see you, speak to you, and ever have a moment's thought for another again? Oh, my dear, dear, dear Sybil, give me some hope!'

"'Gabriel,' said Sybil, more gently, 'you are foolish—you are over-excited. You can't mean this really—you don't know what you are saying. Let me go!'

"'She calls me foolish!—she treats me as if I were a boy!' he cried in desperation. 'Sybil, will nothing make you believe in my love?'

"He raised the hand which she had not been able to release to his hot forehead, and she felt that his eyes were wet with tears. They hurt and shocked her; but she was young, and not calm, and hardly knew what she said.

"'I do not, and cannot love you. I am sorry for you; but this is unmanly. Let me go!'

"'Unmanly!—by God!' he exclaimed; and dashing her hand from him, he turned down the steps into the surrounding darkness."

What a dark background does Southern society form to the lovely Sybil! The men are not the insolent, whiskey-thirsty wretches described by our New England brethren, but on the contrary they are sometimes offensively ridiculously ignorant of books and manners, given to drunkenness, scant about their chivalry without knowing the meaning of the word, and their courage is not so much stimulated as exercised by alcohol. The Southern men are as obedient to the Yankees as a faithful dog is to the Yankee—we mean obedience to our own precious cur. The Southern women are poor creatures. Those who are not arrant fools are wickedly inclined, and certainly we prefer the wicked to the foolish. The negroes are not beaten by machinery according to the engravings exhibited at the office of that highly respectable journal, the Morning Star, nor cooked or eaten as a regular thing as was reported by the journal which, when it had a little influence, bore we believe, the romantic nickname of the Daily Lie; but the servile race is ruined body and soul by indulgence. Idleness, idleness, nothing in the South but idleness. The men do nothing, the women do nothing, the negroes do nothing. In that wonderful land cotton grows without culture, gins itself, bales itself, and ships itself, without help. The corn grows without ploughing or sowing, and is converted into bread and cakes without human intervention. How appropriately does Mrs. Lamar, the Southern heroine, typify the character of her country and countrymen. She is a faded beauty, rather clever, rather accomplished, and kind-hearted, but what the unctuous Beecher would call naughty. Not a commonplace vicious woman, but not a paragon of all virtues and propriety, like the Boston St. Cecilia. The frail Elise (Mrs. Lamar) had several devoted lovers in her youth married an old man whom she did not love, struck up an intimacy with one of her former lovers, and when her husband died conducted herself as a kind of Becky Sharpe lorette. Would our readers like to know how a Southern lady behaves herself in a moment of great affliction, according to the author of "Dan to Beersheba"? Mrs. Lamar determined to settle down, and reward one of her old flames, Ralph Montfort, with her hand and often perforated heart. The day before she intends to tell Ralph of the blessing in store for him, the unfortunate gentleman is shot through the heart in a riot attending the recapture of a runaway negro. Mrs. Lamar hears the news, has hysteria, gets icy cold, does all that is proper for a lady in a novel, and has a long swoon. After being insensible for some hours, she rouses up and says:—

"'Oh, Sybil, don't flirt! How much misery I have caused him by that.'"

This absurd anti-climax is, however, near the end of the volume, the last half of which is neither clever nor ingenious. Midway we are plunged into a seething mass of violent scenes of the well worn Abolition type. A Yankee lawyer of considerable reputation loses his way in a Southern wood, is met by a party of negro-hunters, is seized, threatened with death, and is only saved from hanging by making a sign of freemasonry. A negro woman is killed by bloodhounds, because the dogs had not been properly trained. There is a chapter on Southern fanaticism and a chapter on Northern fanaticism, and the latter gives an account of some Southern gentlemen rioting at a Northern Abolition meeting. Mrs. Lamar poisons herself by the aid of her slave, and the Boston damsel is betrothed to a Yankee lawyer, who, after telling of his love, says:—

"'Great Heavens! if I have been mistaken! Do speak!'"

"'How did you dare to suppose that I loved you till I told you so?' she said, turning towards him with a heavenly blush and smile."

This passage is followed by a line of asterisks, thus allowing the reader to imagine what followed the Yankee girl's "heavenly blush and smile." The author is very proper, but for all that the book is full of naughty suggestions. Altogether, we have never met with a more unequal volume. Some passages are sillier than the mawkish trash of the sea-side novel, whilst there are chapters that display much skill and a sensible horror of ridiculous bathos. "Dan to Beersheba" will not hurt the South, and as there is no name on the title-page the author will also escape injury. It is entirely harmless, though written with the evil intent of violating the ninth commandment.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, January 13.

THE severity of the weather has suspended military operations in Northern Virginia. The two armies are taking what care they can of themselves against the snow storms and freezing winds which have made the winter thus far so much harder than the last. We have shocking accounts of the bitter sufferings of the Union soldiers in camp, protected and supplied as they are out of the abundance of the North. Cared for as they are, we nevertheless hear of numbers that have been frozen to death. There are harrowing tales circulated of the sufferings of the Southern prisoners of war, confined in the camps out West and at Johnson's Island on Lake Erie, where thousands, who never knew anything of winter more than the elastic coolness of their native South, have been sent, by a Yankee refinement of cruelty, to perish with cold or be crippled for life with rheumatism. How the Confederate soldiers stand this winter, if the half be true that deserters and contrabands and "reliable" gentlemen report of the destitution in the Southern army, is difficult to be conceived. Certainly there is a vitality about them which is amazing, and a fervor of earnestness in their cause which is entitled to the highest admiration; for notwithstanding the general repose of the two armies, parties of Confederates are constantly beating up the out-posts of the Unionists, all along the line to the Ohio River, and occasionally putting them to alarm for an advance in force on some one of their positions. The same inertness prevails generally in East Tennessee and south-western Virginia, which, although some degrees further south, are mountainous regions, and feel the winter very severely. Still there are rumours that the Confederates are not so inactive as they seem, but are engaged in preparing a winter campaign for the re-capture of Knoxville. Longstreet is in command, and the last Federal rumour was that he has been reinforced, and intends to advance, with the expectation of reconquering that part of East Tennessee, and thus making Grant's tenure at Chattanooga uncertain.

The bombardment of Charleston continues, without any further effort to enter the harbour or take the forts. The Union batteries have got the range, and are sending shells and Greek fire into the city from time to time, which occasionally do much damage, destroying houses and churches; but there is no nearer advance to the capture of the city. It will not be captured, although it may be destroyed, bit by bit, from a distance. The excuse for thus destroying a city which cannot be taken is, that it affords a shelter to Southern people, and that it is a legitimate operation of war to destroy everything which may be of any possible use to rebels. The avowed purpose of the North is to repossess the Southern territory; if, in order to do so, it be necessary, to lay the land utterly waste and exterminate the people.

Further south, the military operations are more active. General Banks has returned from Texas to New Orleans; and the reports given by the journals are, that he occupied many points along the coast, and is approaching towards Galveston, but waits for reinforcements before he can hope to penetrate into the interior. The territory he has occupied and controls is that sandy and almost desert region east of the Rio Grande, which is of such a sterile character that it was seriously proposed a few years ago, when the public mind was uneasy about the prospect of border conflicts with Mexico, to forbid settlements on a wide space, and keep it as a desert barrier between the two countries. The United States have now got hold of a large tract of this sort of land, and with it a few thousands of wild adventurers, who have gathered there to be as far as possible from the reach of the law. There is a pause in the movement, but it is suspected, with good reason, that the next step will be more political than military. The sterile region, without civilised population in regular settlements outside of a few ranches, and some clusters of huts, by courtesy called towns—mere places of deposit for goods destined to the interior or the resorts of smugglers and other outlaws, will come up, under the auspices of the military occupants, to claim in time for the next presidential election the benefit of Mr. Lincoln's new process for manufacturing States in the Union. The extemporised constituency will take the oath prescribed by the President to support everything which he and Congress have done or may do in the course of this war; and they may then, if his policy prevails, cast a vote in a presidential election before the House of Representatives, as well as New York or Pennsylvania, and will weigh equally with them forever in the United States Senate.

There are some accounts through Federal sources, which seem to intimate that the Confederates under General Magruder design to interpose an obstacle to the present success of this plan by re-occupying the country. There are reports that the available forces west of the Mississippi are to be concentrated on the Colorado, for the purpose of driving out the occupying troops of General Banks before the reinforcements so urgently called for can get there. Private letters from New Orleans say that there is really an apprehension there among the Unionists that all is not right with them in Texas, and this impression is strengthened by the absolute reticence preserved and enforced by the authorities in respect to all intelligence from that quarter. The more confident among them affirm that all things are going favourably in Texas, and that General Banks, instead of needing reinforcements there for any present purpose, is gathering troops for the purpose of making a land attack upon Mobile.

You will thus perceive there is little variation in the position of military affairs this week. Both parties are suspending the movements of their principal armies during the winter, and straining every effort to prepare for renewed operations on a grand scale in the spring.

The exchange of prisoners halts under the new obstruction caused by the offensive selection by the Government of the United States of General Butler, the most odious man in the Federal army, to be its representative, with full power over the whole subject. Butler has signalised his accession to this appointment, by recommending cruel and unrelenting retaliation, as he calls it, upon the Confederate prisoners in the hands of the United States, in the event that what terms he may dictate shall not be acceded to by the Confederate Government, or that they shall refuse to treat with him. By retaliation, he is understood to mean that a Confederate soldier is to be held for like treatment with every slave whom the Confederates find in Federal uniform and subject to the law of the State from which he is either runaway by the local law, or traitor under the Federal rule of the duty of allegiance, as they apply it in their own case; and that all the Southern prisoners of war should be fed on the same rations only which the Southern Government distribute among the Union prisoners. These rations are the same as the Confederates give their own soldiers. It is the assumption of Butler that these are starvation rations, and his advice is—Starve the prisoners, in order to exact from the Confederate Government submission to indignity and the admission in terms of a fact which would be an acknowledgement that they are subjects in rebellion.

The matter is better managed away from Washington between officers, who have the instincts of humanity, which seem to be wholly lost wherever the direct influence of Government rules the daily transactions of war. There have been, and continue to be, in Louisiana frequent exchanges of prisoners between General Banks on the one side and General Taylor and General Kirby Smith on the other, and the excess of prisoners on either side are admitted to paroles whenever there is not a special order for the transmission of prisoners North. This transmission is, however, going on more or less by nearly every steamer. Hundreds of Southern officers and soldiers have been brought on, since the beginning of this winter, to try what effect the rigours of a Northern climate can have in breaking their spirits or destroying their health.

Congress has been discussing the Conscription Law ever since it reassembled on Tuesday of last week, but has not come to any definite conclusion. The whole subject is at sea again. Anticipations of financial trouble are at the bottom of some of these difficulties. The exemption clause, which allowed any drafted man to escape service by paying $300, was at first thrown out as an unjust and unpopular feature; but its restoration is likely to take place as a measure of financial relief. Some of the leading friends of the war policy of the Administration have been speaking out plainly of the frightful rapidity with which the public debt increases, and the danger that it may reach a point where national bankruptcy will be inevitable. The exemption fee on unwilling conscripts who are able to pay is supported as a means for levying a contribution for war purposes in addition to the regular taxes. The imperfect draft of last summer raised $14,000,000 for exemptions. It is contended in Congress that the Government cannot afford to part with even this source of revenue in aid of the expenses of recruiting the army. The draft of the 5th was postponed to the 15th, and a longer postponement is expected. There is scarcely a probability that the amended Bill will pass both Houses for a week or ten days at least.

In the meantime the members of both Houses are bringing forward multitudes of propositions and schemes for disposing of the Southern States, Southern institutions and Southern property, as though the "rebellion" were, as is assumed among them for these purposes, "at an end." Last week the representatives were tried on the question, whether they would make or accept any proposal for peace, by conference or negotiation. An Administration member from Massachusetts brought forward a resolution declaring, on the part of the House, that it would not consent to any negotiation or overture for peace with the authorities of Richmond. It was carried by a vote of 89 to 24. On the same day an Opposition member from New Jersey moved a resolution which, avoiding the authorities at Richmond, favoured peace, "by the return of the States." This was laid upon the table, equivalent to a rejection, by a vote of 78 to 42. These were meagre votes as to numbers, but they shew the fixed purpose of a majority in this Congress to carry on the war without regard to any question of State rights or the distinctive character of States under the Constitution, as of old, in the South, but simply for the conquest of the territory and the subjection of the conquered people to the pleasure of the conquerors. There are a few members of Congress who resist this, and who hold that it is a total revolution in the Government, but they are a powerless and dispirited minority, who only open their mouths to be scoffed at.

The work of confiscation is going on vigorously in all places where the Union armies have got possession of Confederate soil. The thirst for spoil grows more ravenous with what it feeds on. The provisions of the Act itself are not sufficiently comprehensive and summary, to transfer to the Northern men who rush into those districts titles to the lands of rebels and refugees who have abandoned their estates. There is a soupçon of law about that course, and possibly delays may be interposed, which chafe the impatience of the cormorant tribe. A new plan is now put in force, which puts the Northern speculator into immediate possession for a mere trifle, under colour of law. The United States claim that their internal revenue and tax laws have always been legally in force over the Confederate as over the loyal States, and wherever they institute government after military occupation they proceed to seize and sell for arrears of taxes. This is in consideration of the seizures for purposes of confiscation under the statute, and is more convenient, inasmuch as it makes no distinction of Rebel or Unionist, and dispenses with the ceremony of proof or conviction. All estates which the owners have left, or of which they are unable to pay the taxes, are sold, and conveyed immediately to the Yankee purchasers. Government gives special facilities and passes for all such Northerners as desire to go down and take possession of a Southern farm in this cheap way. The motive is plain. Besides the national taste for plunder for its own sake, and the immense value to a party in power of having the property of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of people as the spoils to be fought for and parcelled out among the victors, there is the consummation of the Northern policy of driving the Southern people out of their homes, and settling there a population which shall be a ruling class, dependent for their maintenance against the subjected natives on the military strength of the Government at Washington, and therefore subservient allies of the dominant political faction at the North. In some instances Unionists of the South have tried to preserve lands in their vicinity from this spoliation, alleging that the absent owners were Unionists, and offering, to pay the deficient taxes, and hold the land until the question of loyalty was fairly examined. These offers are refused, and the peremptory sale ordered of all property of which the owner is not present to prove his loyalty, and pay the taxes in person. The presumption is, that all absentees are rebels, and all rebels are to be despoiled of whatever they have possessed by every means which can be contrived to make the process as rapid as possible.

The confiscation law is proposed to be further amended, so as to make that process more complete. When it passed Mr. Lincoln had scruples, and gave Congress to understand that he would not approve the Bill, which extended the penalties of confiscation of real estate beyond the life-time of the party convicted. He based his objection on the clause of the Constitution which provides thus: "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life-time of the party attainted." In compliance with the President's wish, Congress passed a declaratory resolution, in respect to the confiscation law, by which it was enjoined that no proceedings or punishment under the Act "shall be so construed as to work the forfeiture of the real estate of the offender except during his natural life."

It is now contended that this phrase in the Constitution means only that no man shall be attainted to the confiscation of his property after he is dead. Mr. Sumner has introduced a resolution into the Senate of the United States, declaring that the Congress only meant by this explanatory enactment to say that they only confined the operation of an attainder to the term of the natural life of the person attainted, because they thought they had no power under the Constitution to carry it further; but if the power could be found in the Constitution the law must be meant to mean something more. By this juggle it is thought to give a wider scope to the Confiscation Bill, and give the entire South, as fast as conquered and occupied, to the Northern spoilers and their heirs for ever.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, January 27th.

AFTER all the scathing criticism Mr. Gibson's pro-Federal speech has been subjected to by nearly the whole of the daily and weekly press, there is just room—nor is it yet too late—for a word or two upon the local side of the question—that is, as showing the light in which Mr. Gibson's politics are viewed by a large portion of his constituency on the one hand, and by all but his few co-Federalists in Lancashire on the other. To serve the former of these purposes, I cannot do better than quote the words in which, at the conclusion of Mr. Gibson's speech, the gentleman who was deputed to propose the customary vote of thanks acquitted himself of his formal though significantly performed task:—

"Mr. Alfred Reyner said he rose to perform a pleasing duty; viz., to move a vote of thanks to the right hon. member. Mr. Gibson had descanted upon the quarrel between North and South; and when he (Mr. Reyner) looked around him during the speech, he saw few signs of assent or dissent, and therefore, from his previous knowledge of the state of feeling in Ashton, he concluded that the meeting was very much divided in opinion. He was as much opposed to slavery as any Christian man in this country; but they were not to suppose that, if the South were separated from the North to-morrow, they would be farther off from the abolition of slavery than they were now. Abraham Lincoln, in his proclamation, or whatever it was called, said that the honest Union man should be let off by giving liberty to his slaves in the year 1900; but that the Southern people, the disunionists, must do it instanter. Now, he would ask them what sort of justice or mercy was that? They would excuse him for saying that he could not acquiesce in all Mr. Gibson had said; but although, like many others in Ashton, he entertained different opinions from the right hon. gentleman, he would still move the vote of thanks to him, which he believed he well deserved at their hands."

So much for Mr. Gibson in his relations to his constituents. Nor are the right hon. gentleman's opinions more satisfactorily in accord with those which are most commonly heard throughout the north of England, and are best worth reading in the Manchester Guardian. "We do not quite understand," says that journal, "what Mr. Gibson means by saying that a stage of the great contest in America has been reached at which it is fair to speak out frankly one's opinions. The best time would apparently have been at the beginning of the quarrel, or at some point before it had become embittered by recollections which forbid anything which may be said by observers to influence its termination. If the President of the Board of Trade may have meant that the Confederates are now reduced to so low and helpless a condition, that their cause can safely be aspersed with reproaches which, in view of their probable success, it would have been wise to withhold, we are respectfully of opinion that the latest accounts from America do not bear out this magnanimous view of statesmanlike interest and duty. To say the very least of it, there is quite enough uncertainty respecting the issue to make it prudent that the Ministers of the Crown should observe in the spirit of their remarks, as well as in the tenour of their acts, that neutrality which we all agree to consider their proper attitude in the circumstances. It would be awkward, moreover, if it should hereafter be said, in words borrowed from Mr. Gibson, that we desired the defeat of the Southern States, because their success would be in some sort a rebuke to the past policy of England, or, at least, a qualification of the glory which we assume to ourselves for having emancipated our slaves in the West Indies. It does not by any means follow, as he would have it, that if the Confederates are right, we must have been wrong. Each may be right in doing what it thinks fit, in so far at least as relates to its responsibility to the external world, and its claims to international justice and esteem. When Mr. Gibson, too, blames the Southerners for having seceded without reason, a prior question to that of the soundness of his opinion is, whether it is not for them, right or wrong, to be the best judges for themselves in the matter. It is true, as he says, that their grievances of an ordinary nature were few; but why? Because their liberties were preserved by institutions which existed before the Union, and which still remain; but their political reasons for desiring separation were, apart from slavery, much more substantial than Mr. Gibson seems to be aware, or to be willing to acknowledge; and, if they were wrong, we do not know that any foreign nation can justly disallow their decision."

The newest and cheapest attempt at rigging the Union and Emancipation market is to be seen in the transparent dodge of letting loose upon us a New York negro named Chester, euphemistically described as a "coloured gentleman who has been a resident magistrate in Liberia, and is at present a captain in the Federal army;" and whose mission it seems to be to enlighten us as to the rate at which emancipation is progressing in America under the proclamation of "that good man, Abraham Lincoln." I took the trouble to be present at the "captain's" first lecture, and experienced an agreeable sensation of fitness in beholding George Thompson occupying a seat on the platform. The lecture, I need not say, was a rich joke from beginning to end, and teemed with those self-evident absurdities which, in the mouth of a negro, amount almost to a new and unnamed variety of wit. When his statements were not absurd, they were visibly mendacious—without a rag of probability to cover their nakedness; and when they were neither one nor the other, they were simply profane. Upon the side of the North he saw moderation, forbearance of spirit and brotherly love; upon the side of the South, nothing but arrogance and impudence. He wished to correct a mistake common among Englishmen, that the Southerners had a monopoly of all the virtues, and left the Northerners nothing but the vices, of warfare. That was a very great mistake. General Lee had been set up as a model of a Christian gentleman, and all that; but it was not generally known that, in the course of his boasted campaign in Pennsylvania and Maryland, he took forcible possession of every negro he could lay his hands on in those States, to swell his wagon-loads of booty after his army had been annihilated at Gettysburg. And then, there were many English sympathisers with the South who endeavoured to throw slurs upon the friends of the North and upon the noble acts they had recently done on behalf of freedom, by pointing the finger of derision at them, and saying that the North was as bad as the South, and that the negroes were as badly off in the North as they were in the South. An Englishman who made such an assertion was to be pitied for his ignorance, and the American who uttered such a misrepresentation was to be condemned for his falsehood. There was no comparison. It was well known that everything that could be done in the North for the elevation and encouragement of the black man was done by those honest and noble friends of freedom who had been battling for them since the foundation of the country. And so on. The "captain" then proceeded to prophesy that the time was not distant when the Southern States would be held under subjection by negro garrisons, and he hoped that the wealthy and philanthropic men of Manchester would liberally subsidise the freedman's wages for the cultivation of the cotton plant. At all events, let Lancashire possess itself in patience until the war is over. All he asked from us was our moral support. Let us do all we consistently could to aid the North in its holy cause; but whether we aided the North or not, let us at least withhold our assistance from the South. "In preferring this request," (said the waggish resident magistrate in Liberia) "I feel in the position of the man who, on encountering a bear, asked Providence to help him, or, failing so, not to help Grizzly,"—adding, as a recommendation to the latter alternative, that Providence would in that case, see such a fight as had not been witnessed on the face of this or any other planet.

The "George Thompson Soirée" came off in due course, the chief object of the affair being to present an address of sympathy to that gentleman on the eve of his departure to the "United States." Mr. Thompson deserved this demonstration of respect from his small band of admirers; indeed, a mere address seems a very feeble recognition of "thirty years' public service," attended with such personal sacrifice as to render "expatriation" an eligible alternative in his future prospects. It was quite proper that the fullest justice should be done to Mr. Thompson in the handsomest form which addresses and complimentary testimonials can assume—for do but listen to what Mr. Thompson has achieved for mankind:—

"For upwards of thirty years you have been prominently and meritoriously associated with nearly every advanced movement for the welfare of the human race; but pre-eminently, and with uniform consistency, have you laboured and suffered in the glorious cause of human freedom. In Great Britain, in India, and in America, your energies and sympathies have been consecrated to the service of mankind—of whatever race, colour, condition, or creed. Nobly have you borne the heat and burden of the day, and never have you flinched in the utmost stress of conflict, in the darkest hour of danger, or in any crisis, however appalling to the less hopeful champions of freedom. Whoever the foe, whatever the difficulty, and however others may have faltered, compromised, or retreated, you have always been the steadfast friend and defender of liberty and justice. Your able pen, your eloquent tongue, your indomitable spirit, have always been at the service of the true friends of universal emancipation. We cannot rehearse the many occasions on which, as a public man, you have stood forward the advocate and friend of those who were prostrated by ruthless oppression, crushed by unjust social burdens, or trampled upon by iniquitous legislation."

Happy the man whose claims on public gratitude justify such a panegyric! Well might one of the "supporters of the address" describe the occasion as "in some respects gratifying, and in others melancholy." A benefactor of the most cosmopolitan order, a teacher of "the great truths that should guide public men and measures," a man who never "set his hands to a bad cause and never turned his back upon a good one," who had "made the homes of many people bright by his efforts," and who, on no less authority than that of Mr. George Wilson (chairman on the occasion) occupied a place "in the very front rank of living men," a philanthropist of this strain and quality finds it desirable to leave his native country for whose sake he had done so much, and, in his own metaphorical language, "go to America to do something to keep the wolf from the door." George Thompson is not the first who has experienced that England is but a stepdame occasionally to "the very front rank" of her worthiest sons, and Carlyle hushed her well for the unnatural neglect some, twenty years ago. George Thompson heaps coals of fire upon her offending head, for, "without reflecting on his country," he apostrophises her after his own favourite Cowper:

"England! with all thy faults," &c.

Charity effaces a multitude of sins, but here it is the ornament and crown of many virtues! Well, well! National gratitude is capricious. To some it awards testimonials more substantial than addresses, though, by the way, modern precedents of this kind of return have not uniformly been successful. George Thompson, it seems, must be content with compliments in his new mission of developing "the virtues," of which (in the words of his speech) "the negro race is redolent."

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, January 26.

THE French press is as busy with the question of Slesvig Holstein as if Mr. Milner Gibson had not given utterance to the judgment long since formed by universal Europe, that it is intelligible only to German learning of German patriotism. They eschew, however, the question of right, and take it for what it is worth as a possible cause of European war, and a probable means of dissolving the German Confederation. Behind it, not unwelcome glimpses of the Rhine are discerned by many French politicians, which may account for the doubtful position taken up by France, so unlike her usual readiness to take a part in every quarrel. But there is a very general feeling here that there will be no recourse had to active hostilities. The great German Powers have not only discontent at home to make them pause before entering on an adventure which might embroil them with England; they have in addition to contend with the sentiments of Germany, now excited to frenzy by their disregard of the decisions of the Diet. They may remember the freebooting expedition against Holland in favour of Belgium thirty-odd years ago, but they can hardly hope that on this occasion the weaker Power will be without allies. Unless Lord Russell be voracious indeed, he has of late eaten humble-pie enough, and would hardly survive a fresh surfeit, such as his eating all the "brave words" he has spoken and written about Denmark. The last news, threatening as it is, has not affected the money market this afternoon. There has been a slight rise in the funds, which may be ascribed to the immense success of the loan, for which more than twelve times its amount have been applied for. But if a general war were considered imminent, even this financial success would not have counterbalanced the effect of the alarm this would cause.

Poland is almost forgotten. The Patrie and Siècle, with the Opinion, continue to pour out article after article proving that the insurrection is stronger than ever, but they gain little attention and less credence. As to the American war, from time to time the republican Siècle and the infallible Débats indulge in a repetition of their old tirades about Southern slavery and Northern liberty; but their articles read like a set task, where there is more care to add words to words and lines to lines, than to produce conviction on their readers. I have for some weeks remarked a very improved tone in the most courtly of the Opposition papers, the Opinion, which may be called cousin to the Constitutionnel. It contained a short time ago a parallel of the speeches of the two Presidents, not friendly to Mr. Davis, but still more unfavourable to Mr. Lincoln. Last night there appeared in it a most able analysis of Governor Seymour's Message—more fair and more thoroughly French, because more logical, than anything I have before read in its columns. The American quarrel is one of those which Frenchmen are slow to understand. It is a practical one, and therefore completely satisfies no theories, and French minds are so constituted that only theories have the power to impassion the masses. There can be no question that in the last eighteen months very great strides have been made in the right direction—I mean, in recognising the false pretences put forth by the North in its war of appropriation, and the true ground on which the South appeals to the sympathy of freemen—but such ideas, obscured as they have been by declamation and prejudice, make their way but slowly. The lovers of things as they are, more numerous than may be supposed in France, and the friends of indefinite progress, the militant Republicans, were alike inclined to wish well to the North. Now the position is very different, and in all the great centres of thought the majority will be found inimical to their pretensions, and loudly commemorative of the means by which it has sought to make them good.

The news from Miramar represents the Archduke as packing up for his departure to Mexico. The votes of the municipalities are not expected till early in March, when the deputation will return to lay them before him, on which, it is said, he will at once assume the imperial title. His intended stay in Paris is confirmed.

SOUTHERN PRISONERS RELIEF FUND.

MR. J. H. ASHBRIDGE, the Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners Relief Fund, has favoured us with some letters, from which we make the following extracts:—

NEW ORLEANS, December 30, 1863.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE, ESQ.

DEAR SIR,—I have been waiting an opportunity for several days to write you: a violent storm this morning, which prevents all out-door occupation, favours my wish. Your letter to Mr. S——, of November 28, containing kind messages to me and a Christmas present for the poor Confederates of £25, was received by last steamer. The papers you speak of have not come to hand. They may be in the mail just arrived, but not assorted. Thank God! if governments and politicians look coldly on this struggle for home and liberty, there are individuals with hearts not callous to the miseries wrought by civil war, and open hands ready and willing to extend relief to the oppressed and suffering.

My dear friend, I hardly know how or in what language to express our thanks to you and your noble-hearted coadjutors for the timely assistance rendered us. Your liberality, aided by our sympathisers in Nassau and Havana, has enabled us to clothe in a warm and substantial manner many destitute paroled prisoners, many families whose protectors and support are in the army, give clothing and nourishing food to over forty sick Confederates still in the hospitals, besides all the prisoners that have been brought here since the spring. Last week we witnessed the departure of twenty officers and one hundred and twenty-seven privates, exchanged in the Trans-Mississippi Department. Such glad hearts and bright faces I have seldom seen, and the cheer upon cheer they gave as they past us was a moment in my life I shall never forget. God bless you! God bless the good people that help us! was a welcome reward for the many anxieties endured before I could make up my mind to make an appeal to our friends abroad—for that help I found from sad experience had been exhausted at home. But when the helping hand was stretched out to us from over the wide ocean, and our call so quickly answered, from the beautiful isles near our own loved land, my work—our work—became more than a pleasure. With the financial assistance of Mr. S——, and our excellent friend Dr. M—— (you know him by reputation at least), in seeking the best articles on the lowest terms (we are fortunate in having a few Confederates among our merchants), in visiting with me the prisons and finding out the actual wants of each inmate, our time and your charities have been used, we trust with judgment, and we feel in a good cause. I am happy, and am sure the friends of our brave soldiers will be equally so, to know, that every one who left for Dixie, officers and men, were well and comfortably clothed from head to foot, and a blanket beside. The cause will have no better or braver soldiers than these, for another incentive is added to "do deeds of noble daring,"—gratitude and cheering faith in a cause that lives undying amid such surroundings. The remainder of the prisoners still here (about the same number of officers and privates that were exchanged), are as well prepared to leave at a moment's notice. I have never spent so pleasant a Christmas as the last. Many ladies joined in giving a Christmas dinner to the inmates of the three prisons: Rampart-street (Mr. Connor's house), where the officers are confined; Barrone-street (the old slave depot), where ninety Texans are; and at the Custom-house, the home of the remainder of the privates. Many a family spoiled their own usual feast on that day that our poor boys might at least feel they were not forgotten (I know we did with glad hearts); and on a day so calculated to call up thoughts of home and home pleasures, we would do something to drive away home sickness, and give them a few hours' enjoyment, and we must have succeeded if the glad voices that joined in a Confederate song was an indication; and I think the passer-by would have been startled at hearing the dear old "Bonnie Blue Flag," if the joyous shout and our pleased faces had not disturbed the Union feelings of their jailors, who bade them cease their merriment; but they did not prevent the distribution of the good things at any of the prisons. Should no more prisoners be brought here, and God grant there may not be, we will make use of whatever funds our friends advance to the care of the poor, and to assist in liquidating a debt incurred by the burial of those Confederates who have died here. The Federal authorities gave permission to take from the hospitals their bodies; we have the ground, and are allowed a burial without demonstration; four persons, with a clergyman, permitted to follow the hearse. Every unnecessary expenditure is avoided; a plain coffin and hearse, those attending going in the cars, (as the lot is in Cypress Grove, No. 2); and yet we have a debt of over $1,200. So many of the brave defenders of Vicksburg and Port Hudson came here but to die, utterly prostrated by fatigue and sickness, without medicine and proper nourishment. We were only too happy to have our "boys" separated even in death from those who came willingly to destroy their homes and desecrate the graves of their fathers. If your friends can give us further assistance, this would be the use we should wish to place a part of it. It is for the dead, Although no prayer of gratitude can issue from their lips, those of many a wife, mother, and sister, in their far-off home, will call down blessings on those who have saved the remains of their loved ones from unknown and forgotten graves. You cannot imagine, dear Mr. A——, how beautiful this little cemetery looks, with its evergreen wreaths and fresh bouquets, placed almost daily over the simple mounds of the martyrs of liberty.

DEAR MR. ASHBRIDGE,—From prudential motives alone have I refrained from writing until a sure opportunity presented itself, to thank you for the very liberal donation (£40) sent me through Misses S. and Brother Phil., which I had forwarded to a friend in New York to sell when he thought best, in the meantime borrowing from home for the pressing wants of the present time. I cannot express to you how sincerely grateful and thankful our unfortunate friends are for your great thoughtfulness, sympathy, and generosity. Three hundred and forty men were prisoners for a few weeks near us, and when I told them to whom they were indebted for the good things, &c., I assure you that they were deeply affected, and wished with the new year that health, wealth, and prosperity might attend you. Never was there such a need for money, for never was there such a number who required aid. The first money expended after the receipt of yours was in behalf of the unexpected but successful exodus from Ohio. A friend of ours was among the lucky ones, whose name I will mention when I write next. Doubtless you have seen by the papers that General Butler is our master—and a hard one he is—but, believe me, in one of his subordinates we have a harder one still in a general of the coloured troops, by the name of Wild. The outrages committed by this man far exceed anything hitherto practised against any people, save the unfortunate Poles. To give you an idea what he does, and is allowed to do: a few days since he had brought to the city two young girls, white ones, tied hand and foot, and thrown in the common gaol, where they now are. The nature of their offence, or if they offended at all, is an unexplained and never to be answered mystery. And this case is not an extreme one by any means, for these dreadful scenes are daily enacted here; but we are powerless to help ourselves or others, and all that is left us miserables to do is to mourn departed days, when we had gentlemen to deal with. . . . . The white and negro troops disagree so that they dare not keep them in the same station. I find that my letter has been but a dirge, which chapter of horrors pray excuse me for troubling you with, but "from the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh" must be my apology. With the hope that your Christmas may have been a merry one, and may the New Year bring you all the blessings that a good man should enjoy, is the sincere wish of

Your Norfolk friend,
M. B. K.

GENERAL BRAGG.—General Bragg has undoubtedly been relieved of the direction of the army now in north Georgia, and General Hardee is in command ; whether temporarily or permanently is yet to be seen. General Bragg has, of late, laboured under difficulties which, independent of all military skill or sagacity, would have weighed down almost any commander. He has not had the cordial confidence of his officers and his army, and without these the battle is half lost before it commences. The cause of this state of feeling towards him is not easy to account for in all its extent. His alleged harshness as a disciplinarian had its effect on the army. The hostility of the newspapers, produced by his rigour towards their correspondents, had much to do with his unpopularity. His want of success, his incomplete victories, and his many retreats, naturally chagrined his subordinate officers, and made them reluctant to follow his fortunes ; while they were further alienated by frequent misunderstandings from whatever cause. And yet there are good judges who see in General Bragg the qualities of a gifted commander. If he has made retreats it has not been without brave and bloody fights. He has not feared or hesitated to stake his reputation and his fame on the gage of battle. If his constrained retreats have lost us territory, they have yielded no more than has sometimes been sacrificed to a mysterious strategy. From Shiloh, where he won his honours, down to Chickamauga, he has had no bed of roses. If unsuccessful, he has, at least, not been idle. And when we consider the untoward circumstances against which he has had to contend, we cannot but think, even after making due allowance for his faults and infirmities, that he has been more sinned against than sinning, and that, if he had been better supported, he would have accomplished more. But whatever the reason—whether through real incompetency or through the suspicion of it, and that unacceptability to which we have referred—the time of Bragg's usefulness as a commander is over. Shaken and crippled before, the unsuccessful battle of Chickamauga has left no further room for question. Bragg himself saw it, and immediately asked to be relieved.—Richmond Sentinel.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Jan. 27.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THE Bank directors have not made any further alteration in the minimum rate of discount this week, the late rise having materially checked the efflux of gold, which for some weeks previous had been continously increasing. It is not therefore apprehended that any further change will take place at present. For all commercial purposes money is abundant, but within the last day or two the applications for discount accommodation have been very moderate, both at the Bank and in the general market. The brokers however, are obtaining full rates for their advances, very little indeed being done under the Bank rate. The Joint Stock Banks are employing their resources at $7\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. On the Stock Exchange there is a good inquiry for short loans, for which $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 7 per cent. is obtained.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion movements at the Bank of England since the alteration in the rate of discount have been more favourable than for some time past. This week the withdrawals of gold for transmission abroad have amounted to only £134,000, against which there has been sent in £65,000. The arrivals of specie have been to a fair extent, the total being £399,491, all of which is from America, with the exception of £945 from Alexandria. It is, however, believed that nearly all the American gold has been purchased for France. The steamer for the East which sailed to-day takes out £567,940, of which £23,590 gold is for Alexandria ; £57,100 gold and £487,310 silver for Bombay. There has not much activity in the silver market, and the price for bar has declined $\frac{1}{8}$d. per oz., the present quotations being 5s. 2d. The supply on hand is moderate. Mexican dollars have been in better demand, but there are very few in the market. The gold ships from Australia still to arrive are, the Suffolk, which will bring £115,500 ; the Water Nymph, £56,000, and the Omar Pacha, £71,000, making a total of £242,500.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has shown considerable fluctuations during the week. After the rise in the Bank rate of discount on Wednesday last the market became steadier, and the advices from the Continent being regarded as more favourable with respect to the Danish dispute, prices rather rapidly advanced. Later accounts, however, of a far more gloomy character having come to hand, quotations again receded, but not to the full extent of the improvement previously attained. The closing price this evening for Consols was $90\frac{5}{8}$ to $\frac{7}{8}$ for money, and $90\frac{3}{4}$ for the February account, which is an advance on the week of about $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are again declining, the present price being 10s. to 4s. dis. There has also been more animation in the foreign stock market, although there has been but little speculation going on, and prices for most descriptions have improved. Greek stock has advanced to 22 to $22\frac{1}{2}$, being a rise of $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. Mexicans are $1\frac{1}{2}$ better, the present quotation being 36 to $36\frac{1}{4}$. Spanish have improved only fractionally, the Passives closing at $33\frac{1}{4}$ to $33\frac{1}{2}$, and the Certificates $13\frac{1}{4}$ to $13\frac{3}{8}$. Turkish continue firm, the Six per Cents of 1854 being $88\frac{1}{2}$ to $89\frac{1}{2}$, and those of 1862, $66\frac{3}{4}$ to $67\frac{1}{4}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Again the business transacted in American Government and railway securities, has been very restricted, the dealings recorded having taken place in the leading descriptions, but the closing prices are lower than at the beginning of the week. The official transactions were—Atlantic and Great-Western, New York section, 75; Do. do. Pennsylvania do., 78, $77\frac{3}{4}$, 78 and $77\frac{3}{4}$; Erie Shares $100, all paid, 66; Illinois Central Seven Per Cent, 72 and $71\frac{1}{2}$; Do. do. $100 shares, $90 paid, $24\frac{1}{2}$, 23, $22\frac{1}{2}$, and $22\frac{3}{4}$ dis.; Do. do. all paid, $69\frac{1}{2}$; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway, 74 ; and Panama Railway, second mortgage, $106\frac{1}{2}$.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British railway securities, although the amount of business transacted has been large, has shown less animation with regard to prices. Towards the close of business to-day, however, there was a tendency to greater firmness, but without any positive advance. As compared with last week there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Glasgow and South-Western and London, and North-Western ; of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Western, Metropolitan, Lancashire, and Yorkshire and South-Eastern, and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in North-Eastern (Berwick). On the other hand there has been an improvement of from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Cornwall and North Staffordshire. In foreign railway shares, business has been of a more quiet character, and the variation in quotations has been only fractional. There has not been any particular demand for shares connected with British Possessions; business in them has been somewhat limited, but prices have been well supported.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There is an increased demand for this security, and considerable purchases having been made, the price has advanced to 49 to 51. The favourable accounts from the South, and the approaching dividend and drawing, have induced the public to come forward more freely as buyers, and this security has met with more attention, notwithstanding all others are rather depressed.

BANK MEETINGS.

The half-yearly meeting of the Consolidated Bank took place this afternoon, when the report of the directors was unanimously adopted. It stated that the directors had succeeded in forming an amalgamation with the old established banking firm of Messrs. Hankey and Co., whose business has been incorporated with the Consolidated Bank. The result of this arrangement has proved in every way satisfactory to the board. The net profits of the Bank for the half-year, after deducting current expenses, &c., amount to £49,842, which, with the balance left unappropriated, and premiums on shares allotted during the half-year, makes a total of £58,427, from which it is proposed to carry to the reserve fund £20,000, and to declare a dividend for the half-year at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum and a bonus of 1s. per share, being an additional $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, and to carry forward to the next account £1,076. At the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of London, the balance-sheet showed that the balance of profit upon the operations of the Bank for the past half-year amounted to £61,394. After the payment of all expenses, including a gratuity to the clerks of the establishment of 10 per cent. upon the amount of their respective salaries, there remained for disposal the sum of £35,530. Out of this a dividend was declared at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, with the addition of a bonus of £1 5s. per share, being at the additional rate of 5 per cent. per annum free of income tax; a sum of £12,000 was transferred to the reserve fund, which now amounts to £112,000, and a balance of £1,030 was carried forward. The directors' allowance was increased by a grant of £1,000, and the salary of the auditors was increased to £50 each for the half-yearly audits.—At the meeting of the shareholders in the London Joint Stock Bank, the report of the directors showed that during the past half-year the net profits amounted to £80,573, of which it was proposed to devote £61,500 to the payment of the usual dividend of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, with a bonus of 8s. per share, and to carry £19,075 to the guarantee fund. The report was unanimously agreed to.—At the third general meeting of the proprietors of the Alliance Bank of London and Liverpool a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. was declared. The total amount available for dividend was £26,933. The dividend would absorb £16,000, and after placing £2,000 to the credit of the reserve fund, there remained £8,933 to be carried forward.—At the first ordinary general meeting of the Joint Stock Discount Company, a dividend was declared at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. A sum of £35,000 was carried to the interest new account as rebate on bills not yet due, and £17,988 was appropriated as the nucleus of a reserve fund.—At the twenty-first ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank, the report, which was adopted, stated the balance of profit for the first half-year was £2[illegible]627. This would admit of an increased dividend, but in accordance with the recommendation of the directors it was determined to continue the dividend at 6 per cent. per annum.—At the ordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the Metropolitan and Provincial Bank, the report stated that there was a balance of profit upon the half-year of £14,666. After payment of interest on current and deposit account, £8,183 was applied to payment of current expenses and bad debts, £925 to writing off preliminary expenses, £3,650 to payment of a dividend of 5 per cent. per annum, leaving a balance of £1,874 to be carried forward. The report was adopted.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets business continues to be checked by the uncertainty involving both political and monetary affairs, and transactions in nearly every department are upon a very limited scale. Quotations, as usually is the case in dull markets, have a drooping tendency, but sales are not heavily pressed and the variations are not generally important. The value of cotton has remained nearly stationary, with moderate operations from day to day. The grain trade has not presented any new feature. For all descriptions of wheat the demand is very dull, but rates are upheld. In American provisions a steady business is doing : singed bacon sides sell to a fair extent at 42s. to 44s. For beef prices are still unsettled by fresh arrivals. American butters are rather cheaper, owing to increased supplies. The depression, however, is not heavy, as the receipts of other foreign butters are small. In consequence of a continuous advance in English hops, all kinds of foreign, are held with increasing firmness. In American tobacco there is not much passing, the attention of the trade being attracted to other descriptions by their relative cheapness. Petroleum continues very steady at 2s. per gallon for American refined. French turpentine has receded to 71s. 6d. sellers. American is quite nominal. Linseed oil is rather easier at 35s. 3d , and pale rape at 41s. 6d. per cwt. Sperm is unaltered. Political influences have rather increased the strength of the tallow market, but quotations are not advanced. Saltpetre remains very inactive, with a heavy stock. In chemicals there is not much change, beyond an advance in sulphate of copper, which is now quoted £35 to £36 per ton. In dyes but little is doing. For cochineal there is a limited inquiry, at about the rates of last auctions. Jute has recovered about 10s. per ton from the recent decline. Manilla hemp is in demand for arrival, and £35 per ton has been refused. Sugar remains extremely inactive, but holders still avoid pressing sales, and any material decline is in this way prevented. Spices of all kinds meet a fair demand ; for pepper and cloves the tendency is against buyers. The metal trade is still inactive. Scotch pig iron has drooped to £3, but closes £3 to £3 6s. Business is doing in spelter at £21. Copper is very firm at the recent advances, and lead at £21 10s. for common English pig. For tin there is no inquiry, and the quotation of Straits is quite nominal at £117 to £118 cash.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Jan. 27.

THE demand for cotton has this week been again very limited, and the market presents a dull and drooping appearance. It is with difficulty that sales are effected, even at the lower prices taken. There is more firmness exhibited with regard to American descriptions, there not being an abundant supply, but even for these lower prices have to be accepted, in order to do business. The sales this week have amounted to 26 000 bales, of which 8,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 98,510 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 129,270 bales. There have been imported this year 68,693 bales; to the same time last year 74,254 bales. The exports this year have reached 17,501 bales, and in 1863, 13,524 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 65,800 bales, whilst last year they were 57,400 bales. 11,170 bales have been taken on speculation this year, against 56,440 bales in 1863. The computed stocks at present are 266,560 bales ; last year at the same time they were 395,680 bales. To-day the market has been rather better supported, prices being firm, but the sales were again limited. The latest official quotations were, American descriptions $25\frac{3}{4}$d. to 28d.; Egyptian, 24d. to 24d.; Bahia, 24d. to $26\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maranham, $28\frac{1}{2}$d. to $28\frac{3}{4}$d.; Pernam. $27\frac{1}{4}$d. to $27\frac{1}{2}$d.; and Surats, 14d. to $24\frac{1}{2}$d.

MANCHESTER, January 26.

Our market still continues in a dull, stagnant state, and the tendency of prices is against producers. The India advices to hand, and dated 28th and 29th ult., give a very gloomy report of our principal markets there, the Calcutta letters more especially, which bring us intelligence of a very serious monetary panic existing there.

This and the threatening aspect of the Dano-German question have produced a most depressing effect on buyers generally, that next to no business is reported.

Many mills have stopped work during the past week, and many more are reported as closing.

Yarns generally are much neglected, and quotations are only nominal. Goods, although not much inquired for, are much more firmly held than yarns. To-day, Tuesday, has been one of the flattest market days known.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and Depôts of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circubsire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

AN unusually severe frost has prevented any important military operations. If the weather prophets are to be relied on, and a very cold winter is the forerunner of a very hot summer, the Federals will encounter a new enemy, and the Confederates will find a powerful ally in the Southern climate. But though there is a dearth of battles, there is by no means a truce to hostilities. General Gilmore renewed the bombardment of Charleston on the 10th of January, and from the morning of the 12th till the evening of the 14th threw 471 shells into the city. The shells exploded at the proper time and the casualties were nil. The reason Gilmore has not succeeded in "bagging" some stray women and children is, that the combustible material of which the "Greek fire" is composed turns out to be worthless. It is intimated that the siege operations are temporarily suspended, and the Federal commander has removed his headquarters to Hilton Head, to fit out an extensive secret expedition. Preparing for a secret expedition is now the usual accompaniment of the admission of a Northern failure. The Federals are getting fidgety about Charleston; and to add to their discomfort, the purveyors of news to the New York papers state that four Confederate ironclad rams are lying in Charleston harbour, nearly ready to make a descent on the Federal fleet. It has also transpired that a secret expedition, sent out by Admiral Dahlgren, in December last, has not succeeded. The naval failures of the Federals have lately been so numerous that it is impossible to say to which of them this announcement relates.

There is no news from Virginia. Having tried fighting and strategic movements, the invading army has gone into winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Washington. Under these circumstances Mr. Lincoln and his friends are carrying on the war in Virginia in their peculiar fashion. The plan is to frighten the Confederates so as to make them lay down their arms. It was proposed in the Federal Congress "to raise 100,000 men for 100 days to drive the Confederates out of Virginia, and to rescue the Federal prisoners at Richmond." This terrible proposition was not carried, perhaps because the majority of the members did not quite see where the 100,000 men for 100 days were to come from, and had some slight doubt as to the certainty of 100,000 recruits being able in any number of days to drive the Confederates out of Virginia. Then we have a semi-official intimation that in the spring two large armies are to simultaneously move upon Richmond by two different routes, each of these armies being able to cope with General Lee's army. Why two armies should be sent to do the work that one of them can accomplish we do not understand, unless it is to reward the patriotism of Government contractors. Moreover, we are quite in the dark as to how Mr. Lincoln is to get two large armies to operate in Virginia in the spring. However, it is very kind to give the South due notice of the double invasion. Possibly the report is only circulated to help Mr. Chase in keeping gold down and greenbacks up. Lastly, for a hundredth time, it is reported that the Confederate Government has abandoned Richmond, and carried its archives into South Carolina. This news did not affect the price of gold.

In Texas the Federals have been taught a lesson. On the 30th December an expedition to the Matagorda Peninsula, after effecting a landing, was driven back by the Confederates and only escaped capture by the protection of the gunboat Granite State. This was evidently a small affair, or one gunboat could not have afforded such efficient aid. From this the Federals will learn the wisdom of an invading army in a hostile country keeping together, but this being so, how can any considerable portion of Texas be held and conquered? It is said that the Confederate vessel J. F. Carr took part in the engagement, grounded, and was destroyed by her crew to prevent her capture. It is reported that the Confederates had altogether four steamers in Matagorda Bay. The Federal gunboat Sciota has been surveying the Texas coast and has discovered strong Confederate batteries at Velasco and Quintana, near the Brazos river.

General Grant telegraphs to General Halleck that General Vance captured twenty-three Federal wagons near Tennille, but that General Palmer recaptured the wagons and took General Vance, two of his officers, and seven of his men prisoners, "with 150 horses and 100 arms." This telegram bears evident marks of General Halleck's editorial supervision.

We are indebted to the Northern papers for some abstracts of the diplomatic correspondence just submitted to the United States Congress. In the style of Mr. Seward's despatches there is a remarkable sameness. He indulges at every opportunity in diplomatic bullying, and is, as usual, boastful about the resources of the North and the conquest of the South. We will give a specimen of his reckless assertions. He writes, "The great question, heretofore, has been, Can the Constitution and Union endure through the trial? There is no longer any ground for despondency on that point. When we compare the military and naval condition of the country now with what they were when Congress came together a year ago (1861), &c." It is certainly a novel doctrine that an increase in the army is a guarantee of civil liberty, but the false theory is nothing to the false statement involved in the foregoing passage. In 1861 the Constitution of the United States existed, though its days were numbered; in November 1862, when the despatch from which we have quoted was written, liberty had fled from the land, and all that remained of the Constitution was its forms and history.

But Minister Adams, as well as Secretary Seward, excels in the art of misrepresentation. Towards the close of 1862 Mr. Adams writes: "It is a little remarkable that both in England and France the tendency of public opinion is gradually to fall into the old channel of party divisions. The advocates of strong power side with the rebels, while the more liberal and popular party befriend the cause of the Government." This is becoming more and more visible as the struggle goes on." The truth is, that at the outset of the struggle all parties were either indifferent or pro-Northern. After a few months there was a great change in public opinion, and thoughtful and generous minded people sympathised with the South. As the war went on the circle of Southern sympathisers widened, until now, in public conveyances, in public rooms, and in all places of public resort, it is rare to meet with a person who favours the Northern cause; and not only so, but the operatives of Lancashire and the working classes in other parts are rapidly getting rid of the prejudices instilled into them by Northern agents, and at large meetings of artisans resolutions advocating the recognition of the Confederate States are passed by overwhelming majorities.

Mr. Seward still harps upon the recognition of the Confederate States as a belligerent Power, and brings forward on this point an argument which has the merit of novelty. He writes: "The whole case may be summed up thus: the United States claim that in this war they are a whole sovereign nation, and entitled to the same respect as such that they accord to Great Britain. Great Britain does not treat them as such a sovereign; and hence all the evils that disturb their intercourse and endanger their friendship." Did not Great Britain claim to be a whole sovereign nation when France recognised the independence of the United States? Did not Spain claim to be a whole sovereign nation when the great Powers recognised the independence of her revolted colonies? Did not Austria claim to be a whole sovereign nation when the United States despatched an envoy to recognise the independence of Hungary?

Mr. Adams complained of the enlistment of British subjects in the Confederate service, and Earl Russell replied, that "If thousands of British subjects are to be found fighting in the ranks of the Federals, on the invitation of the United States authorities, it is no breach of neutrality that some hundreds should be found in the ships and armies of the Confederates upon a similar invitation on their part." To this home thrust Mr. Adams gives rather an evasive reply. He says he is glad to find the British Government does not intend to oppose any obstacles to his Government, remonstrating "against the enlistment by parties within this kingdom, of Her Majesty's subjects, for the purpose and with the intent to carry on war against a nation with which she is at peace." But we are at peace with the South as well as the North, and despite the Fenian Brotherhood, Ireland, where the Federals have so largely recruited, is a part of this kingdom. However, as the Federals got very much and the Confederates next to nothing by the breach of law of which Mr. Adams complained, the subject dropped, Earl Russell not thinking it his duty to take any steps to enforce the observance of the law.

The case with regard to sale of ships to the belligerents is treated altogether differently. The complaints of the Federal Government are persistent, and our Foreign Secretary does what he can to prevent a breach of the law, that would be of considerable service to the Confederates and of very little service to the Federals. Writing about the decision in the Alexandra case, Mr. Seward declares that if the British law is not amended, or if the Government construe it according to the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron, the United States will have to protect themselves; that is, the British Government will be held responsible for the damage done by Confederate cruisers, the President will issue letters of marque, and the Federal navy will be instructed to pursue Confederate vessels into British ports. In other words, we must change our laws, or our Executive must act independently of the decisions of our tribunals, for if not, we shall have to reimburse he Federals for their losses at sea, have privateers sent against our commerce, and have our ports entered by the Federal navy in pursuit of vessels belonging to a Power with which we are at peace. Since the days when the Stuarts had become virtually the dependents of the French kings, such an insolent despatch has never been read to a British Minister. A month later Mr. Seward writes about the steam rams, which he describes as "the formidable rams which, virtually with the consent of the British Parliament, are within a few weeks to come forth against us from Laird's shipyard." He admits that the naval forces of the United States are strained to the utmost and cannot resist the rams, and therefore he declares that if they leave the British port a retaliatory war will be inevitable. A week later, that is on September 11, Earl Russell wrote a letter to Mr. Adams, which is very apologetic and meek, and shows that Mr. Seward's threats had had their due effect. His lordship assures Mr. Adams that Her Majesty's Government desires to be neutral, and that if there have been breaches of neutrality, it is owing to this country being governed by definite laws, and not subject to arbitrary will, and that our independent Courts "will not admit assertion for proof nor conjecture for certainty." Having thus defined the constitutional system of this country, Earl Russell has a splendid opportunity of proving the friendship of the Government to the Federal Government. Our "independent Courts" will not admit assertion for proof, nor conjecture for certainty; but to oblige Mr. Adams' Government our Foreign Secretary has done so, and writes: "I have to add that instructions have been issued for preventing the departure of the ironclads in question from Liverpool, until satisfactory evidence can be given as to their destination, or, at all events, until the inquiries which are now being prosecuted, with a view to obtain such evidence, shall have been brought to a conclusion." Thus we have it on the word of Earl Russell, that after being threatened with war if the rams left the Mersey, he detained them at the request of the United States Government—not that he had any evidence of an intended infraction of the law, but until Federal spies could discover or concoct such evidence. Earl Russsell had his reward. Mr. Seward, for a moment, ceased from threatening, and patted his lordship on the back. On the 28th of September, Mr. Seward writes:—"This Government has not been forgetful of the agency of disloyal citizens of the United States in inaugurating the hostile enterprise, and in instigating debates in Parliament and in the press, which have tended to embarrass the British Ministry and aggravate the responsibility which has devolved upon them. The President, therefore, thinks that he apprehends in some degree the firmness and fidelity to just principles which the Cabinet of London has exercised; nor does he for a moment doubt that a sincere desire to cultivate the friendship of the United States has had its proper influence in the determination at which the Cabinet has arrived." The one-time Liberal member for the City of London must have experienced a curious sensation upon being commended by a foreign Government for his disregard of parliamentary debates, and the opinions of the press, and for setting aside the law to conciliate the good-will of the Federals.

The correspondence about the Alabama is very voluminous. The Federal Government urges from time to time its claims for compensation, and Earl Russell replies by long despatches on international law. At length our Foreign Secretary was tired of the matter, and wrote to Mr. Adams, disclaiming on behalf of the British Government all responsibility in regard to the proceedings of the Alabama or any other Confederate cruiser, and hoping that Mr. Adams would not for the future be instructed to put forward claims which the British Government cannot admit to be founded on law or justice. Perhaps the most remarkable passage in the Alabama correspondence is in a despatch from Earl Russell, dated December 19, 1862, to Mr. Adams. His lordship writes:—

As regards your demand for a more effective prevention for the future of the fitting out of such vessels in British ports, I have the honour to inform you that Her Majesty's Government after consultation with the law officers of the Crown, are of opinion that certain amendments might be introduced into the Foreign Enlistment Act, which, if sanctioned by the Parliament, would have the effect of giving greater power to the Executive to prevent the construction in British ports of ships destined for the use of belligerents. But Her Majesty's Government consider that, before submitting any proposals of that sort to Parliament, it would be desirable that they should previously communicate with the Government of the United States, and ascertain whether that Government is willing to make similar alterations in its own Foreign Enlistment Act; and that the amendments, like the original statute, should, as it were, proceed pari passu in both countries. I shall accordingly be ready at any time to confer with you, and to listen to any suggestions which you may have to make by which the British Foreign Enlistment Act and the corresponding statute of the United States may be made more efficient for their purpose.

Did it not occur to Earl Russell that alterations might be proposed that would be entirely unfair to the Confederate States? Does neutrality consist in altering the law during the continuance of hostilities to meet the requirements of one of the belligerents? We much mistake the spirit of the British Parliament if it would consent to such a course at the request of any Government.

The abstract of the French correspondence presents a marked contrast to that with Great Britain. It is studiously courteous, and even on the subject of Mexico there is no manifestation of anger, but the predilection for a republic is expressed in very respectful terms. Mr. Seward avows that his Government have no desire to intervene in Mexico. They think republican institutions are best fitted for the country, but they only submit their opinions to the Emperor "on proper occasions, as worthy of his serious consideration in determining how he would conduct and close what might prove a successful war in Mexico." A month later, that is on October 23, Mr. Seward, in reply to a despatch from Mr. Dayton, announcing an election in Mexico for the empire, writes: "You will inform M. Drouyn de Lhuys that our opinion remains unchanged. On the other hand, the United States cannot anticipate the action of Mexico, nor have they the least purpose or desire to interfere in their proceedings, or control or interfere with their free choice, or disturb them in the enjoyment of whatever institutions of government they may, in the exercise of an absolute freedom, establish." Contrast this with the language used to Earl Russell, and it is clear that a spirited policy is the best policy for dealing with the Federal Government.

In reference to the Imperial views respecting the American war there is a long despatch from Mr. Dayton. On July 30th, Mr. Dayton writes that he called on M. Drouyn de Lhuys to inquire about the reported intention of the Emperor to acknowledge the South, and about the conversation between the Emperor and Messrs. Roebuck and Lindsay. The questions were not put authoritatively Mr. Dayton remarks: "You will observe that in this way I reached the subject matter without saying I had had any formal instructions from my Government to interrogate France on these questions." Mr. Dayton then gives the "substance" of M. Drouyn de Lhuys' answer, which in some respects is a palpable misrepresentation of what that gentleman said. It may be true that "the Emperor had at no time made any proposition to England to acknowledge the South:" for the Emperor proposed, as a preliminary step, the offer of mediation. But it is not true that the Emperor told Messrs. Roebuck and Lindsay "that the only proposition as to any action in our affairs had been made to him by England, and been rejected by him," because a diplomatic correspondence has been published, in which the offer to mediate is proposed to the British Government by the Government of France. It is not true that Messrs. Roebuck and Lindsay went to Paris to urge the Emperor to acknowledge the South, but their mission was to ascertain if the report circulated by Federal agents that the Emperor would not act with England was true or false, and Mr. Dayton is correct in writing that the Emperor said, "that he had given England no cause to believe he would not act with her."

The correspondence with Russia contains a despatch from Mr. Seward, in which he observes, "Russia has our friendship in every case in preference to any other European Power, simply because she always wishes us well, and leaves us to conduct our affairs as we think best." Prince Gortschakoff is not quite so warm. He told Mr. Taylor, "We earnestly hope for the maintenance of the Union, but at the same time we have no hostility to the Southern people—and for the sake of both sides we shall gladly proffer our services when they are mutually requested, but not until then."

The correspondence with the other Powers does not call for lengthened comment. Mr. Seward instructs the Minister at the Court of Turin to express to the Italian Foreign Secretary the sincere satisfaction of the Federal Government "with the answer which was given by him to the proposition of the British Government concerning visits of the insurgent vessels in Italian ports. Their recognition of the insurgents as a belligerent was an unnecessary proceeding on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It has been very injurious to the United States, while it has brought to the British nation itself only troublesome inconvenience, and requires constant efforts to prevent new and more dangerous complications." France also recognised the Confederate States as a belligeren , but that is not noticed in this dispatch. To the Federal Minister at the Netherlands, Mr. Seward writes on October 10th:—"There are indications that the world's patience toward the utterly vicious insurrection in this country is beginning to fail." Mr. Seward's own patience is exhausted, or he would not get into such a railing passion. Writing to the Federal Minister at Copenhagen, on the 14th April, Mr. Seward became prophetic. He observes, "It now looks as if by another year we can put down the rebellion by starvation if in no other way." The year is nearly gone, and the Confederates have food enough at all events to keep them until the next harvest. How coolly Mr. Seward writes about starving 8,000,000 of people!

We will conclude our summary with two extracts on the question of emancipation, which we commend to the attention of those who place faith in the philanthropic intentions of the Federals. In November, 1862, Mr. Adams writes, "Efforts are now making here, with a good prospect of success, for a more effective organisation of the anti-slavery movement in our behalf." So the anti-slavery movement is not for the benefit of the negro but to aid the Federal Government. When Mr. Adams penned the foregoing sentence he did not think of its being published. But on this subject the most remarkable despatch is that addressed to the Federal Chargé d'Affaires at Madrid on September 3rd, 1863, by Mr. Seward. The Federal secretary writes:—

The Spanish Government can easily determine for itself whether the continued enjoyment of Cuba with slavery is more likely to be secured by a recognition of the insurgents, which would be an act hostile to the United States, than it will be secured by the policy of cordial friendship towards the United States, which has induced them for sixty years to respect that occupation themselves, and to insist upon its being respected by all other nations. The United States Government do not want any more territories—certainly they do not want any more slave-holding territories. The United States Government is not a forcible propagandist of emancipation even at home, although it does not hesitate to strike slavery down when it rises in resistance to the Government. Much less is this Government an armed propagandist of emancipation or any other policy in foreign countries. But it certainly could not, if assailed by any foreign slave-holding Power, show any greater forbearance towards the slavery maintained by a foreign army than it shows to domestic slavery when employed by the Government against the insurgents.

Thus the Federal Government can be all things to all nations. In England, hoping to get a little sympathy, they profess to be ardent emancipationists. In Spain a different policy is pursued. Mr. Seward repudiates the idea of fighting for the negro, or of emancipating slaves except from military necessity, and even parades the United States Government as the protectors of the system of slavery in Cuba. What will sincere Abolitionists say to this? According to Mr. Seward, the way to get rid of slavery is to recognise the Confederate States, and the way to preserve slavery is to keep on terms of cordial friendship with the United States.

On the 3rd January his Excellency William Smith was duly installed with the time honoured ceremonies, at the Capitol building in Richmond, as Governor of Virginia. In his inaugural Address the new Governor referred to the fact of his entering on the same high office that day seventeen years before, and drew a rapid sketch of the changes that had come over the land since that period, and the causes of these changes. He argued from the terms of the Federal compact and the recorded action of Virginia in its formation, the right of peaceable separation, as contradistinguished from the right of revolution. "I cannot," he said, "too earnestly insist that the right of secession, practically recognised and admitted, is the guarantee of peace, while the right of revolution necessarily leads to civil war. One applies to a confederation of States, and cannot be politically wrong; the other acts within a nation and is rarely right. It is true, the power of the parts is not equal to the power of the whole; but what of that? Governments are not instituted for aggression, but for the security of the rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.'" Of the future he spoke hopefully, and avowed his unflinching determination to resist the aggressions of the North to the last extremity.

The two branches of the Confederate Congress have passed the following joint resolutions of thanks to Major Heros von Borcke, of Prussia, Adjutant and Inspector-General of Cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia:—

"Whereas, Major Heros von Borcke, of Prussia, Adjutant and Inspector-General of the Cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia, having left his own country to assist in securing the independence of ours, and by his personal gallantry in the field having won the admiration of his comrades as well as of his commanding general, all of whom deeply sympathise with him in his present suffering from wounds received in battle: therefore, resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, that the thanks of Congress are due, and the same are hereby tendered to, Major Von Borcke, for his self-sacrificing devotion to our Confederacy and his distinguished services in support of our cause.

"Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to Major Von Borcke by the President of the Confederate States."

The current letter of our New York correspondent gives a very intelligible account of the condition of Northern finances, and explains the late depreciation of the Government issues. Besides the admitted indebtedness there are a vast number of claims pressing for adjustment, which, according to Judge Spalding, of Ohio, will, if allowed, make the Treasury bankrupt. An ingenious plan has been devised to postpone the settlement. In 1861 Congress decreed that certain of the demands incident to the war should be settled by the Court of Claims, a tribunal established some years ago so that Congress might not be liable to the corrupt influences of suitors who were willing to pay members to promote a favourable adjustment of their demands. It is now proposed that Congress should resume the office of settling these money claims, and the plan will no doubt be very acceptable to the "loyal" members.

Our correspondent also comments on the despotic power of the ruling faction and the total loss of popular and constitutional liberty.

The Federal authorities are or pretend to be alarmed at the prospect of an attempt being made to rescue the Confederate prisoners on Johnson's Island. They are aware of the miseries of their captives and think rightly enough that no effort would be spared to liberate the gallant soldiers from their cruel situation. It is reported—we can hardly credit it—that two companies of Canadian Rifles have been sent to Windsor to prevent any attempt at rescue. We are quite aware that the British authorities ought not to allow any expedition to be fitted out against the Federals, but it seems very strange for soldiers owing allegiance to Queen Victoria to be aiding the Yankees to torture and kill their prisoners. If the Federals are wise they will not trust too implicitly to the zeal of Canadian Rifles engaged in such a service.

Travellers tell strange stories, and the Boston Traveller newspaper has just shown there is something in a name. A correspondent of that journal asserts "that a convention had been called in Raleigh for the purpose of carrying out the secession of North Carolina from the Confederacy." It is, however, not impossible that several Confederate States may be represented in the Federal Congress in order that the next presidential election may be in accordance with the forms of the defunct Constitution. We hear, for example, that the Federals have abandoned the whole of the Teche country, and by the same mail that General Banks had ordered a State election in Louisiana. It is just as easy for General Banks to manufacture 100,000 votes as it was for General Halleck to capture 10,000 prisoners; and there is this advantage in the system, that when the votes are manufactured by the Government there is no doubt about "loyal" candidates being returned. It is also notified that a delegation, headed by a Confederate deserter, has arrived in Washington to apply for the re-admission of Arkansas. By Mr. Lincoln's plan there is no difficulty in having all the Confederate States represented in the Federal Congress, or, for the matter of that, in having all the Federal States represented in the Confederate Congress.

In the debate in the Federal Senate on the motion to expel Mr. Davis for the introduction of some resolutions which were designated as treasonable, Mr. Wilson declared that in other days the Senate had rung with threats of disunion and civil war from the "rebel chiefs"; and he asked, "Who among us does not now regret that the Senate of the United States did not hurl headlong from this chamber those rebel chiefs, even as the rebel angels were hurled from the battlements of heaven!" Mr. Wilson must be oblivious of the past, if he does not recollect that threats of disunion often came from Northern Abolitionists. In the course of his reply, Mr. Davis said, "He assumed that if a convention of all the States were called together, and should resolve to do away with the Government, that they had the right and power to do it. He was opposed, of course, to any such exercise of power as a practical thing. He considered this compact a political partnership." Mr. Davis also asked Mr. Wilson "if the rebels in the Southern States were to offer to come back, with their rights, under the Constitution, save where it forfeits to them their rights for their rebellious actions, would he agree that they should come back?" Mr. Wilson did not reply to this question.

The Federal Congress is doing what it can to assure the people that the war is not being carried on for "the reconstruction of the Union." In the House of Representatives the following resolution was proposed, and rejected by 79 to 56:—

That the President be requested to make known by public proclamation, or otherwise, to all the country, that whenever any State, now in insurrection, shall submit itself to the authority of the Federal Government, as defined in the Constitution, all hostilities against her shall cease, and such State shall be protected from all external interference with her local laws and institutions, and her people shall be guaranteed in the full enjoyment of all those rights which the Federal Constitution gave them.

It is said that Northern Democrats are about to publish a national address, advocating a vigorous prosecution of the war, but opposing the unconstitutional measures of the Administration. That is, they uphold the cause but object to the effect. There must be very few bond fide "War Democrats," or else the United States must have more than an average number of citizens who are not capable of the simplest process of reasoning.

In reference to General McClellan's Report a remarkable letter is published in the New York World. The letter states, "In 'the report on the conduct of the war' (Part I. folio 339) I find the same letter with a slight variation. In General McClellan's report the two last sentences of this letter are:—'If I save this army now, I tell you plainly that I owe no thanks to you, or to any other person in Washington. You have done your best to sacrifice this army.' In 'the report on the conduct of the war' this plain, frank charge against Secretary Stanton is left out." The writer asks, "Query? Was it purposely left out in the copy furnished the committee by Stanton to shield himself, or by the committee to whitewash him? If so it shows the partisan conduct of that committee, and throws a suspicion on the truth of their whole report."

Mr Welles has sent a challenge to the New York Chamber of Commerce offering to run the navy steamer Eutaw against any side-wheel steamer, foreign or American, now in New York harbour. The challenge was refused, and a New York journal observes: "The Secretary wants to run his steamer Eutaw against the Adriatic, Illinois, Fulton, Eagle, or any steamer of the Cunard line. We propose that the Secretary shall select three steamers like the Eutaw and match them against the rebel steamers Rappahannock, Alabama, and Florida. If our steamers overtake those of the rebels the Government may pocket the stakes. This is a much fairer trial than that offered by Secretary Welles, who will find, if he ever gets awake, that bombast and braggadocio will not catch the rebel privateers any sooner than Government vessels of nine knots an hour."

Confederate patience seems to be tired out in North Carolina, and the cruelties of the Federals have been followed by retaliation. When we consider what the people of Norfolk are now suffering under the rule of Butler, and the atrocities that are committed by Federal soldiers wherever they come, we fear that a plan of retaliation must, ere long be generally adopted.

Mr. Meagher has made a little capital out of the death of General Corcoran. He addressed a large audience at the Cooper Institute on the virtues of the departed hero, and made some observations about the Fenian Brotherhood that were loudly cheered. Our noble Foreign Secretary need not be alarmed. There is nothing in it, despite the friendly and mysterious warnings of Messrs. Seward and Adams. Ireland is not ripe for revolt, and we do not need Mr. Meagher to tell us that the Yankees are at all times longing to injure England.

A military commission has been appointed to try the prisoners in Forts Lafayette and Warren. Thus those charged with treason to the Government are deprived of an appeal to a civil tribunal.

The Maryland Legislature has rejected the nomination of Mr. Lincoln for the next Presidency, although it was elected under the auspices of Federal bayonets.

In a debate in the Federal Senate on the exemption of clergymen from the draft, Mr. Conness objected to the proposition, and said, "He believed the safest and truest way to Heaven was to strike a rebel whenever you can reach him."

The Isabel, from Mobile, has arrived at Havanna with 480 bales of cotton. The Gray Jacket, loaded with cotton, has been taken by the Federals off Mobile. The British ship Sylvanus has been captured off Doboy Sound, Georgia. It appears that Mr. Welles has sent orders to the provost-marshal of New York not to release but to detain the British blockade violators. According to the law of nations blockade running is not a crime, but only involves the forfeiture of the cargo and vessel; and consequently the Federal Government has no more right to imprison "British blockade violators" than it has to hang them. Will Earl Russell think it worth his while to object to this proceeding?

The fluctuations in the price of gold at New York have been considerable. After touching 60 per cent. premium, it fell to 55, in consequence, it is reported, of Mr. Chase operating. But all the efforts of the Federal Secretary could not keep the price down even for a single day. From 55 the price advanced, and on the 23rd January it was quoted at 56¼ per cent. premium. It must be borne in mind that this advance has taken place without any adverse military news, and is therefore indicative of the growing distrust in the resources of the Federal Government to meet its engagements.

The House of Representatives has adopted a Bill for increasing the duty on spirits, and raising the duty on cotton to two cents per lb.

ENGLAND.

HER MAJESTY'S Speech is before the public. It is singularly devoid of interest, and perhaps the most noteworthy feature is the entire absence of all allusion to the horrible strife now desolating the continent of America.

An assembly was held on Friday evening last, under the auspices of the Southern Independence Association, in the salon of the Clarence Hotel at Manchester. Numerous and influential representatives of the branch societies in many of the towns in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire, were present. The Right Hon. Lord Wharncliffe occupied the chair. Lord Campbell, and T. B. Birley, T. Briggs, C. Pooley, James Spence, and J. H. Clarke, Esqs., were present. There were also present some officers in the army, clergymen, and many ladies. Letters were read from Beresford Hope, Esq., and Sir J. Bowring, expressing their inability to attend. The Secretary then read the report, which stated that during the few months that the association had existed, it had acted upon public opinion in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire, by means of the platform and the press. "Papers for the People," conveying argumentatively the fullest information in regard to the origin of the war and the rights on which secession was based, had been issued to the number of 85,000; at least 160,000 handbills had been circulated, and 10,000 placards and reports of speeches. Lectures had been delivered in nineteen towns of importance, and others were in active preparation. In twenty-seven of the great towns branch associations had been formed. A London association had been formed under the presidency of Mr. Beresford Hope, and would take vigorous action during the session of Parliament. Public meetings had been held with success at Oldham, Stockport, Ashton, Bollington, Burnley, Preston, Glasgow, and Glossop, and in each case the chairman had been authorised to sign a memorial to the Foreign Secretary, or petitions to Parliament. Lord Wharncliffe first addressed the meeting, and dwelt on the boastfulness and mendacity of the Northern character, and the identification of the feelings and qualities of the Southern and the English people. The courage of the North consisted in destroying where there was no fear of resistance; their conduct was savage and vindictive beyond all precedent. The object of the North was to retain a great name by extent of territory, at the cost of the subjugation of the South. He believed the best thing for the peace of the world would be the establishment of two well-ordered governments on the American Continent. Lord Wharncliffe was succeeded by Lord Campbell, to whose speech we refer elsewhere. After a few words from Mr. Birley, in favour of immediate recognition, Mr. J. Spence made an address to the meeting. He exposed the mistakes and fallacies contained in Mr. Milner Gibson's speech at Ashton-under-Lyne, at considerable length. He then referred to the cruel manner in which the North had waged war, sinking stone fleets, confiscating all rights, shooting men in cold blood, insulting and calumniating the best of the nation. Public opinion in England was for the South, and the South itself could not have maintained the struggle against the power of the North, unless she had been supported by the conviction that her cause was just. The result of the reconstruction of the Union would be a war with England. The association desired peace, but permanent peace, and peace could only be permanent when based on the independence of the South.

The Lower House of Convocation will assemble in the Jerusalem Chamber at 11 o'clock to-morrow (Friday), to receive the reports which have been prepared by the committees during the recess, and transact formal business. His Grace the President will alone name the day on which the House will be again convened. Yesterday, by the invitation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops met at Lambeth Palace for the purpose of considering the subject of the Burial Service, and other matters of Church discipline likely to occupy the attention of Parliament and Convocation in the ensuing session.

The financial statement and balance-sheet of the Central Committee for relief of distress in the cotton districts are made up for the eighteen months preceding December last. The receipts during that time, including the foreign subscriptions and interest, reached the sum of £874,113. Out of this amount it appears that £396,811 have been disposed of by grants to 161 general relief committees, and £20,619 appropriated to 101 committees, as contra from the employment and school fund.

The weekly meeting of the committee was held at the Town-hall, Manchester, on Monday. The secretary reported the receipt of £1,293 4s. 1d. during the week, including £100 from the Society of Friends, and that the balance at the bank was £195,892. The committee made grants to the various towns in the cotton district, amounting in the whole to £14,060. The distress has by some means increased, the increase of paupers being but 144 during the week. From Preston a few alterations indicative of improvement are reported, but the main tide of events flows in an adverse direction. Strange as the fact may be, yet it is true, that the manufacturers keep building new mills or extending old ones. In Preston vast sums of money have been expended during the last few months in the extension of manufacturing premises, so that in some quarters hopes must be entertained of a return to the ancient days of prosperity. For thirty months the people have asked, in the gloom of disappointed hope, "when will the times mend?" and the utter failure of all attempts to supplement the lack of Southern cotton with foul Surat and the fine but scarce product of Egypt has taught men to look in one direction alone for a change. The ratepayers grumble and the shopkeepers become bankrupt, while the bravest sigh at the hardness of the times and the failing supply of human sympathy.

A Parliamentary paper detailing the general results of the census taken in England in 1861, has just been published, and some of the statistics are instructive and interesting in the highest degree. The paper first speaks of English born subjects domiciled abroad, excluding mere travellers and temporary settlers, and the army, navy, and merchant seamen, of which last three classes the numbers abroad are 250,356. France, of all countries in Europe, is the favourite resort of Englishmen, and there 25,841 English subjects are domiciled. In Belgium 4,092, in Switzerland 1,124, in Germany 7,365, in Italy 5,467, in Portugal 2,072, in Spain 3,879, in Turkey 2,360, in Egypt 931, in Denmark 372, in Norway and Sweden 653, and in Russia 3,749. As to Asia, there are 30 British subjects in Persia, 1,072 in China, 81 in Japan and 24 in Siam. The English population in India, according to returns obviously incorrect, is only 125,379, including the English army 85,008 strong; central America has 145 English residents, Ecuador 27, Chili 4,152, and Brazil 2,838. In the United States in the year 1860, according to the census of Mr. Kennedy, there were no less than 2,224,743 British subjects by birth, of whom 1,611,304 were born in Ireland.

The total population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in 1861 is stated to be 29,321,288, being an increase over the numbers as found in 1851 of 1,575,339 persons. If to this last number the number of registered emigrants during the ten years be added, the total increase will be swelled to 3,629,917 persons. Of the population of the United Kindom 20,228,497 were found in England and Wales, 3,096,808 in Scotland, 5,850,309 in Ireland, and 145,674 in the islands in the British seas. It is here worthy of remark that in 1801 the population of England and Wales was 9,156,171; at the time of the Reform Bill it was 14,051,986. There was, therefore, in 30 years an increase of no less than 6,176,511 persons. The boys born in England were to the girls as 104,811 to 100,000; and the males of all ages may be taken to be to the females as 100,029 to 100,000. This fine equilibrium was, however, disturbed by unequal emigration, the result of which was a majority of 351,433 women at home, after allowance made for the men of the army, navy, and merchant service abroad.

On the 8th April, 1861, the number of houseless persons was 11,444. Of these 7,130 belonged to the gipsy tribes, and dwelt in tents or caravans. Besides these, 11,915 persons were found living in barges; 6,665 in inland vessels in ports; and 55,765 in sea-going vessels lying in the home ports. There were 26,096 criminals in prisons; 24,345 lunatics in asylums; 10,414 patients in hospitals, and 125,722 paupers in the workhouses, besides 23,598 in charitable institutions. There were moreover, 64,840 soldiers in barracks.

Of houses—and by a house is meant all the space within the external and party walls of the building, whether there be a subdivision into flats or not—there were in England in 1861, 3,739,535, showing an increase of 461,166 in ten years. The mean annual value of all the houses in England is 15 10s. 519,991 houses had rentals varying from £20 to £2,000 a year, and the gross annual value of all the houses was £58,043,181. The capital value of all the houses might be taken to be £870,000,000. There were about 5 37 persons to each house, or nearly sixteen persons to three houses.

The number of families in 1861 was 4,440,524, and the number of persons to a family was as 4·47 to a family, and there were twelve families to ten houses. Two-thirds of the families had a husband and wife at their head.

Mr. Bright has again enlightened the men of Birmingham, and for once in a way he attempted, in deference to the ladies present and the genial occasion of a soirée, to give his country some praise and not much abuse. He admitted that there was a bright side of the history of this country, but to him all the splendour consisted in the changes which he himself had supported. Having made this very limited admission, he proceeded to speak of the Catholic Emancipation, the Reform Bill, the emancipation of the slaves, the repeal of the Corn Laws, and of the Navigation Acts, crowning his edifice with the French Treaty and the Penny Press. Of course Mr. Bright called for a further reform, and condemned the Bill as not going nearly far enough. His reason, however, is worthy of observation as affording a marvellous clue to his policy. He says that the insufficiency of the old Bill is proved by the fact, that in nine years after it passed, so entirely had the old governing class recovered from its fall that it entered Parliament in 1841 with a majority of 90. There is a charming candour in this confession. In Mr. Bright's opinion that state of the law must of necessity be detestable which allows the governing class to govern. It is not with him a question of the men most fitted by education, associations, high honour, and that freedom from corruption which is only possible in the independence of wealth and station. It is enough that a man is of the higher class to ensure his condemnation in the eyes of Mr. Bright. After a cry for the abolition of the Irish Protestant Church, Mr. Bright turned to foreign affairs; and having carefully explained to his audience how utterly absurd the conduct of England was in the matter of the Russian war, and how Mr. Bright alone took the honourable part, he brought Denmark on the tapis. He sympathised with the King of Denmark, which, to say the least of it, was a considerable stretch of kindness on the part of Mr. Bright; but he denied that England was deeply interested in the matter. He repudiated the idea of England being bound by the matrimonial alliances of royalty; and indeed, inasmuch as the alliances are far stronger in the German direction, Mr. Bright might have abstained from that imputation. He thought that Austria and Prussia were undertaking great operations from fear of a revolution in Germany. Mr. Bright then explained that in the English Cabinet there were thirteen members, and within that body an inner Cabinet of two or three persons, to whom alone the whole truth of our diplomatic relations was known. So Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Aberdeen had an understanding or memorandum with the Emperor Nicholas, and yet Lord Derby, who was in the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel, never discovered the existence of that document until he himself was Prime Minister some years afterwards. So Lords Derby and Malmesbury, during the Ministry of the former, had endeavoured to keep matters of high import to themselves; but another Minister had broken down that secresy, and had shared in their knowledge. At the present time Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell formed the inner Cabinet, and they no doubt wrote despatches while the rest of the Cabinet was ignorant in what direction the country was being dragged. Every member of that body, seeing the peril of the present crisis, ought to insist on knowing every single thing that is being done, and to determine not to be made a partner in transactions of great error or great crime. We candidly admit the excellence of this piece of advice, and, as Mr. Bright is a practical man, we will offer him a suggestion. Let him impress the importance of thus acting on his disciple, Mr. Milner Gibson, and let the latter insist on seeing every despatch and every document before it starts on its destination. We shall be curious to learn the result of such an application on the part of that distinguished member of the Cabinet.

Mr. John Jones, the principal partner in the firm of Jones and Co., of Chapel-street, Liverpool, ship store-dealers, and John Wilding, clerk in the service of that firm, surrendered last week for examination before the magistrates on the charge of committing a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, by aiding in procuring a crew for the Confederate steamer Georgia. Our readers will remember that Mr. Highet, a partner in the firm, has already been committed for trial on the same charge. After the hearing of some evidence, the two defendants were committed for trial, but were admitted to bail. No doubt the three defendants will be tried at the same time.

The George Victor Townley case has entered on a fresh phase. A letter from the magistrates of Derbyshire to the Home Secretary had contained the astounding intelligence that one out of the two medical men who signed the certificate of Townley's insanity was not a member of the Royal College of Surgeons at all, that the two justices who signed the certificate had not the most remote intention that the effect of it should be to absolve Townley from punishment and to consign him to a lunatic asylum, and that the attorney who managed the formalities was in sublime ignorance of the consequences of the Act. Thereupon Sir George Grey, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, requested Drs. Hood and Bucknill, visitors of Chancery lunatics, Dr. Meyer, the superintendent of the criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor, and Dr. Helps, superintendent of Bethlehem Hospital, to examine into Townley's state of mind and report thereon. Their report was conclusive as to Townley being of sound mind, and a formal certificate under the Act of Parliament had been received to that effect. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, have commuted the capital sentence into the sentence of penal servitude for life. So ends this attempt at a defeat of justice, successful so far as the ends of schemers against capital punishment and of morbid philanthropists are concerned, unsuccessful as to the daring endeavour to rescue the murderer from all retribution.

The history of Patience Swinfen, of Swinfen-hall, has been already detailed in our columns. How she, to maintain her claim to the Swinfen-hall estates, fought and compromised an action at law, through her counsel, Sir Frederick Thesiger, now Lord Chelmsford, how she repudiated the compromise and sued her counsel for damages for exceeding his authority, and how she eventually in a fresh action recovered the estates, it is not necessary again to relate in detail. In all her struggles and her victories she relied entirely on the judgment, the wisdom, and the eloquence of Mr. Charles Rann Kennedy, her counsel. By way of recompense she had executed to him an assignment of an interest in the Swinfen estates, for he had neither expected nor received any reward for his professional services except a share of their fruits. She afterwards had married a Mr. Broun, had repudiated all implied contract to indemnify Mr. Kennedy, and had filed a bill in Equity to set aside the deed of assignment. Mr. Kennedy had brought an action at law, had obtained a verdict for several thousand pounds, but had failed to sustain that verdict before the Court at Westminster. He had contested the suit in Equity, and the Master of the Rolls had decided that the deed was null and void, and now he had appealed to the Lords Justices. The deed under which he claimed recited that Patience Swinfen had for a long time past been engaged in legal proceedings in establishing her title to the estates therein mentioned, that the proceedings had been concluded and her title established, and that she desired to recompense Charles Rann Kennedy for his services as her counsel in such proceedings, and to convey to him the estates, subject to her life interest therein and certain other charges. Then it was witnessed by the deed that she, in consideration of those services, and also in consideration of her esteem and friendship for the said Charles Rann Kennedy, did of her own free will give, grant, and convey to him and his heirs all the Swinfen-hall estates, subject to her life interest, her debts not exceeding £10,000 and to any other charges which she might create, also not exceeding £10,000. The Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in giving judgment, said that the contents of the deed were alone sufficient to condemn it. It could not be sustained either as a gift or as made in pursuance of a contract. As a gift it could not be sustained between a client and a counsel so recently engaged in professional matters on behalf of the client for the recovery of the estates in question. As to a contract, the lady had a right to complain of want of sufficient advice, information, and assistance, at the time she executed a deed of great substantial and manifest impropriety. Relief could not be refused without manifest discredit to the administration of justice. The Lord Justice Turner concurred in the decision, and the appeal was dismissed with costs. So, then, the deed is annulled, and the last hope of remuneration for perhaps the most laborious and most successful services ever rendered by counsel to a client must be abandoned by Mr. Kennedy.

The case of O'Kane v. O'Kane and Palmerston came before the Divorce Court again on Tuesday, but inasmuch as the case had not been entered in due form and the counsel could not agree as to their mutual rights of mentioning and examining certain affidavits, the matter was ordered to stand over till to-day. The statements in these affidavits were, however, somewhat peculiar and worthy of attention. The first one was filed by Mr. Wells, the solicitor to the petitioner, and declared that negotiations for a settlement of the case were completed on the 16th day of January last, and that his costs were then paid; that he (Mr. Wells) verily believed that O'Kane was duly married according to the formalities of the Catholic Church on the 2nd of October, 1851; that the petition was not filed for the purposes of extortion, and that there was a good case upon the merits. To this affidavit was attached a letter from O'Kane to Mr. Wells, ordering him to stay proceedings in the suit, and alleging that this course was adopted solely for the sake of O'Kane's children, and not from any inability to sustain the allegations of the petition. The letter also declaimed against the frantic howls of a venal press, asserted that O'Kane was in no want of money, affirmed the marriage, and finally declared that the correspondence and other evidence would have left no doubt had the case gone to the jury. In answer to this affidavit the respondent's solicitor, Mr. Horsley, filed another affidavit, in which he swore that neither directly or indirectly was he a party to, or aware of, any compromise having been made in the suit, until he had a notice to that effect from Mr. Wells. Mr. Horsley then declared that he had inquired of the officers of the court and found that no further steps had been taken in the prosecution of the case; that he had interrogated the solicitors for the co-respondent and they had denied all knowledge of any compromise whatever. Moreover he (Mr. Horsley) had made no compromise, nor had the respondent herself done so. Consequently it appears that O'Kane has written to Wells, that he has settled the matter. If he has done so there must have been some one of the opposing parties or their solicitors with whom the settlement was made; on the other hand it is declared that neither the respondent, the co-respondent, nor their respective solicitors, have even heard of any compromise or proposition for a compromise.

THE CONTINENT.

The hopes we expressed last week have not been realised. The Austrian and Prussian troops have crossed the Eider, and the two great German Powers have thus commenced war against Denmark. Our anticipations that peace would be preserved were based upon the not unreasonable calculation, that when the British Cabinet threatened to make the invasion of Slesvig a casus belli, the threat would not fail of its effect at Berlin and Vienna. Nor would it have failed, if the Prussian Government had not been well assured that no steps would be taken to fulfil it. Herr von Bismarck was sufficiently impressed by it to propose a suspension of the invasion; but he was overruled by the King and the Crown Prince, who knew that the menace of Earl Russell was but a brutum fulmen.

We see no good reason why we should refrain from putting our readers in possession of the facts which explain this most unfortunate business. They will occupy, in a few days, public attention. The highest personage in the realm has, as we have already hinted, very strong sympathies with Slesvig-Holsteinism. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who gave the signal for the outbreak of the movement in Germany, is the brother-in-law, the Prétender is the nephew of the Queen. As soon as the Crown Prince of Prussia returned to Berlin from England, a change came over the spirit of the Prussian Government. Before that time it apprehended that England would really draw the sword for Denmark. The Crown Prince carried home the assurance that the sovereign would never give her consent to a war on behalf of Denmark against a country for which she has so strong an affection as Germany; and armed with that assurance he succeeded in removing the scruples of his father. The representations which the English Government has made have, therefore, been without effect. Prussia has pressed on, confident that England would do nothing. The Ministry were, we believe, sincere in the pledges they gave to Denmark of assistance; they were prepared to declare war against the German Powers, but when they submitted the measure to the Queen for her approbation they found that Her Majesty would on no account give her consent to war, and would rather see Denmark suffer the worst misfortunes. The constitutional, the honourable course, for them to have taken would have been to resign. They should have refused to be the instruments of their own humiliation. It seems, however, that their love of place was too strong, and they have consented to remain in office to execute a policy they do not approve. Her Majesty is of course perfectly justified by the letter of the Constitution in the course she has adopted. The responsibility devolves upon the Ministers who prefer place and court favour to the discharge of what they avow to be their duty. It may be taken for granted now that England will give Denmark no assistance, and as the French Government is resolved not to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for our accommodation, and incur the risk of war to protect a prince whom it regards as a client of England, we must make up our minds to see the Danes driven from Slesvig, and fraud and violence once more triumphant in Europe.

There is some doubt as to the day—whether Thursday or Saturday—upon which Marshal Wrangel, the Generalissimo of the Prusso-Austrian army, addressed his summons to the Danish Commander-in-Chief, General de Meza, to evacuate Slesvig. The answer, which of course was a refusal, was received on Sunday afternoon, and before the dawn of Monday morning the Austrian and Prussian vanguards had crossed the Eider. The Prussians form the right, the Austrians the centre, and the Federal troops, for all practical purposes—although they have not yet entered and may not enter Slesvig—the left of the line of attack. The Danish entrenchments stretch obliquely from Frederickstadt, on the Eider, the frontier of the two duchies where the Federal troops are posted, to Slesvig, and thence by the Slei to the Baltic. The Austrians, who form the centre, have advanced from Rendsburg towards the town of Slesvig, occupying the Kronenwerk after a trifling skirmish. The retreating Danes blew up the bridge over the Sorge and destroyed the railway, without, however, stopping the advance of the Austrians, who appear to have reached Kropp on the road to Slesvig, and thus to have come almost within cannon-shot of the Danes. As, however, rain has set in, and the Prussians' attempt to cross the Slei has failed, they may probably retire. The Prussians have advanced from Kiel, through the district called the Danischer Wold, by the road leading through Eckenforde across the Slei to Slesvig. They met at first with no resistance. Two Danish vessels of war in the harbour of Eckenforde gave them a parting salute, to which the Prussian artillery replied. Continuing their advance to Missunde on the Slei, they attacked the Danish positions there on the morning of Tuesday. Missunde is one of the few points at which the Slei can be crossed by an army; and if the Prussians could have crossed, they would have turned the Danish line of defence. The Danes, however, are fully alive to the importance of the position, and have strongly fortified it. The Prussians seem to have carried the tête du point on the southern side but to have afterwards lost it, the final result being that all the works remained in the possession of the Danes, and that the Prussians, who had 150 men killed and wounded, retired to Eckenforde. The Prussians were commanded by Prince Frederich Carl. It shows the sincerity of the Prussian profession that they enter Slesvig to maintain the treaty of 1852, that they have allowed the Pretender to be proclaimed at Eckenforde. The stories which come from German sources of the enthusiasm with which the proclamation has been received must be taken with great caution. A German patriot will never shrink from an invention which will serve, as he fancies, the national cause.

The King of Denmark and the Prime Minister, Bishop Monrad, are at Slesvig with the army. The Rigsraad has been convoked; the elections are fixed for the Folksthing for the 5th, for the Landsthing for the 29th March. An embargo has been placed upon all German shipping in Danish ports.

The Pretender, who had taken a short trip to Oldenburg, has returned to Kiel. The Prussians seem disposed to let him stay there.

According to some telegrams, the Crown Prince of Prussia who has joined the Prussian army, is at the Prussian, headquarters with Marshal Wrangel.

Marshal Wrangel has addressed a proclamation to the Slesvigers, in which he announces that civil commissioners of Austria and Prussia will assume the administration of the Duchy.

The Federal Commissioners have applied to the Diet for leave to summons the Estates of Holstein. One of them, Herr von Konneritz, the Saxon Commissioner, has published in a Hamburg newspaper a reply to the charges made in Mr. Murray's letter to Herr von Beust. As a defence of his conduct against the complaints of Mr. Murray, the statement of the Saxon Commissioner is extremely weak. What it wants, however, in argument, it fully makes up in impertinence.

It is said that Sweden has protested at Vienna and Berlin against the occupation af Slesvig. The protest will not be heeded.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath has adopted the proposition of the committee to grant the Government only the 5,000,000 florins required by the Diet as the Austrian contribution to the cost of execution in Holstein. The Government had asked 10,000,000. On the other hand it has rejected, by 103 to 59 votes, the resolution censuring the action of the Government against the decision of the Diet.

There are rumours of revolutionary plots in Hungary and Croatia, which show that Austria makes a tremendous venture in provoking war.

According to the Mémorial Diplomatique, the plenipotentiaries of the Great Powers have held another meeting in re Greece and the Ionian Islands, and signed another protocol, altering in some degree the position of the Islands in the new monarchy, and making fresh arrangements with reference to the destruction of the fortifications. The news from Athens is still extremely unsatisfactory. George I. has little reason to congratulate himself upon his elevation to a throne.

The debate upon the Address in the Corps Législatif is finished. Two amendments have been discussed and rejected in addition to those the fate of which we have already mentioned. The first, in favour of the rupture of diplomatic relations with Russia, produced a very able speech from the Duke de Morny in vindication of the policy of the Government. M. de Morny defended the Emperor of Russia against the attacks of which he had been the object, and declared that to encourage the insurrection was to expose the Poles to ruin. M. Rouher, who also took part in the debate, vindicated the scheme of the Congress, replying with much courtesy but great effect to the objections upon which Earl Russell founded the refusal of England. He expressed his hope that the meeting would still take place, and declared rather curiously that it seemed as if God came to the aid of the ideas of peace which animate France, because the question of the duchies had become so menacing as to make even those who objected to the Congress comprehend that it was the sole possibility of solving the question. The amendment, together with another one, proposing to strike out words declaring that the Chamber would see with regret that the good relations of France with Russia should be disturbed, were rejected without at division. An amendment directed against the occupation of Rome was rejected by 218 votes to 12, after a very brief discussion; and after a few words from the President, in which he expressed his pride in presiding over a body in which eloquence had been carried to such a height, the Address was adopted in its ensemble by 246 votes to 12.

The Emperor received the deputation charged to present the Address on Monday, and replied in a speech which may be taken as an indication that, although he will not withdraw one of the liberties he has granted, and will continue to develope them as he may think the nation ripe for them, he will not allow the power to pass from his own hands into those of a Parliament. He observed that the debates upon the confirmation of the members' elections and on the Address had been long and profound, and though they had taken nearly three months from the legislative business of the house, they had not been useless. To an impartial mind the result had been to reduce into nothing the accusations which had been skilfully spread. He continued—"The policy of the Government is better appreciated. We have a more compact majority, and one more devoted to our institutions. These are great advantages. After the fruitless efforts of so many forms of government, the first want of the country is stability. Nothing durable can be founded on an ever-shifting base without consistence. For sixty years liberty has become an arm in the hands of parties to overthrow the existing Government. Thence have resulted incessant fluctuations—power succumbing to liberty and liberty succumbing to anarchy. This must no longer exist. The example of recent years proves the possibility of conciliating what has long appeared irreconcilable. Really fecund progress is the fruit of experience. Its advance will not be hastened by systematic and unjust attacks, but by the intimate union of the Government with a majority inspired by patriotism and unseduced by vain popularity. Let us await from agreement and from time such ameliorations as are possible. Do not let the delusive hope of a chimerical future unceasingly compromise the present good which we have at heart to consolidate together. Let us each remain in our right sphere: you, gentlemen, enlightening and controlling the progress of the Government, I taking the initiative in all that may promote the greatness and prosperity of France." The Chambers has been prorogued until the 4th April.

The loan has been a remarkable success. M. Fould, in his report to the Emperor observes, that to realise the 300,000,000 and 15,000,000 more for discount and other charges, it was necessary to issue 14,253,393 francs of Rentes. The amount subscribed for was no less than 219,321,536 francs of Rentes by 542,061 persons—134,105 at Paris, and 407,956 in the departments; 2,409,366 francs of Rentes were subscribed in sums not exceeding six francs of Rentes for each person, and these subscribers received the full amount for which they applied.

The intelligence from Mexico is extremely favourable. The Juarez party has been everywhere defeated, and Juarez himself is a fugitive.

The Italian Senate has passed the bill for the suppression of brigandage in the Neapolitan provinces, i.e., a prolongation of the Act already in force. In the course of the discussion Signor Peruzzi, the Minister of the Interior, declared that the Government would be able, without danger, to withdraw a portion of the forces at present stationed in the Southern provinces, to reinforce the army. This is a statement of which the Austrian Government would do well to take note.

Signor Crispi, one of the leaders of the party of action, has scandalised the Chamber of Deputies by telling them that Greco, one of the four men charged with the conspiracy against the Emperor, had been until very recently a spy in the pay of the Italian Government. He demanded an inquiry, and insinuated that the Italian Government had got up the plot to discredit the Party of Action. Signor Minghetti, in an access of virtuous indignation, refused to defend the Government against the accusation of Crispi, and the Chamber refused an inquiry.

The Emperor of Russia has not allowed the revolution in Poland to stop the progress of reform in the rest of his dominions. An ukase recently published directs that a new system of provincial organisation, which has been for some time in preparation, by which a large measure of self-government is given the provinces and communes, shall be at once put in operation in the larger part of the Empire.

Meanwhile we hear of nothing from Poland but arrests, deportations, and encounters between the Russian forces and small bands of brigands.

The ministerial crisis in Belgium continues, much, we should fancy, to the annoyance of King Leopold, if not to the danger of his shattered health. A house has been taken for him in the Isle of Wight, and he would have been there long before this but for the political dead lock, which will probably terminate by the confirmation of the present ministry in power.

CHILI.

FOR one month previous to the 8th day of December in the Church de la Compania, at Santiago, devotional practices and offices corresponding to the Mes de Maria had been celebrated. That day was the anniversary of the Purissima Concepcion of the Holy Virgin, and was a high day. In the evening the Church de la Compania was gorgeously adorned with clouds of muslin and gauze draperies, flowers and garlands, illuminated with lights of oil, liquid gas, wax, and lamps of luminous camphine. The image of the Virgin in the centre of the high altar glared with a crescent of brilliant lamps. Incense, music, and singing were added to the prodigal splendour. Ugarte, the high-priest of Mariolatry, who never failed to draw tears of hysterical emotion from his audience, and Eizaguire, the apostolic nuncio, and the favourite of Pius IX., were to preach. To the church then came vast crowds of women: 1,000 ladies of fashion and 2,000 of a humbler sort. With these devotees came also a few men. The crowd filled the church to overflowing, and as they knelt in devotion they were packed and wedged in, a living and inseparable mass. The work of lighting all the lamps had scarcely been finished, when the liquid gas in the transparency on the high altar set the woodwork in a blaze. In a moment the whole altar was wrapt in flames. The fire then ran along the wooden roof, gathering fresh energy from the thousand jets of light suspended from the cornices, and playing furiously in the folds of muslin and gauze, in the garlands of flowers, and the ancient wood carving. The audience was seized with a fearful panic; some near the lateral doors escaped at the first alarm, others forced their way to the sacristy, a few burst through the tide of still approaching worshippers to the large door. The remainder made one wild rush to the entrance and became hopelessly entangled and locked together in one vast and increasing pile of helpless women, till a barrier was formed of crushed victims, more impassable than iron-bound gates. Heroic acts of self-sacrifice were attempted by men from without, but to no purpose. A country guaso, mounted on a powerful horse, threw his laso into the mass, and some were dragged out by the strength of the horse. But the flames had reached the dresses and the hair of the women and they became one body of fire. Some with mad shrieks, others in silent despair, gave themselves over to death. The building became a furnace above and below. Silence at length reigned supreme. As the fire burnt itself out, the bodies were visible lying in horizontal strata, in groups, standing or kneeling, preserving the postures of their last agony. In fifteen minutes the life, the beauty, the hopes that reigned in 2,000 beings had been extinguished and nothing remained but a heap of cinders.

The priests had not been idle. There were men and women to be saved, but than these there were other things more precious in the eyes of the ministers of the Virgin. They rescued from the fire the gilt images, the altar vessels, the vestments, sofas, carpets, tables and chairs. Lest they should fail in this holy work they closed the door of the sacristy in the faces of the flying victims. One priest was more thoughtful for his flock, for as he escaped with the last relic he turned for one moment, absolved the dying women, and bade them ascend to the bosom of the Virgin.

Visitors, on the succeeding day, to the burial-ground of Santiago, saw sixty men digging a huge trench, hard by a ghastly pile of human remains covered over with boughs of trees, which was 180 feet in length, 10 feet wide, and 5 feet high.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, January 9, 1864.

No event of a military character worth recording has transpired since I last wrote. The "on to Texas" movement is at a standstill, or at least General Washburne, who commands the Federal columns on the coast and frontier of the "Lone Star State," reports no progress. Within a week there have been more than one arrival here, from Brazos, Santiago, and other points on the Texas coast in Federal possession, but the Government organs in New Orleans are silent as to the movement of General Washburne. Every man here acquainted with the interior of Texas, its people and their temper in the war, and with the Confederate general commanding in that department, feel confident that should Washburne advance and offer battle, he will meet with a disastrous defeat. You will readily surmise Magruder's motives for leaving the enemy in undisturbed possession of those points on the coasts he now holds. Were it even worth the necessary sacrifice, had he a force large enough, the Confederate general could not, after dispossessing the enemy, hold the coast fortification without the co-oprration of a fleet. This he lacks, and this the enemy commands, in addition to his land force. By his flotilla he is enabled to hold with a comparatively small force every coast or river defence he captures. Magruder, I am told, will leave Warshburne in undisputed possession of the coast he has thus far acquired. The points Washburne holds are of no commercial or strategic importance, and Magruder is content that the Federal forces should be thus scattered and isolated along the Gulf, while he is left free to assume the offensive on the Rio Grande or, by reinforcing General Dick Taylor, threatening New Orleans from the Teche.

I think, myself, that Magruder will soon have the opportunity to carry out his wishes in either case. Banks is perhaps concentrating for a movement on Mobile, but to attempt the capture of that city with any hope of success he must call in his forces—now greatly reduced—from their very extended lines. His forces are scattered along the Gulf, from the Florida reefs to the mouth of the Rio Grande, and for 150 miles up that river, along Bayou Teche and the line of the Opelousas railroad, western Louisiana, and up the Mississippi, from Ship Island, at its mouth, to Donaldsonville and Port Hudson. This, you see, is a vast territory for any General to attempt to hold, even with a very large force, which Banks by no means has, unless 25,000 men be considered such, but I doubt his having even that many effective men. Now, seemingly, is the golden opportunity of the Confederates to strike an effective blow in the Valley of the Mississippi. It is but a seeming opportunity, for the winter season in this quarter puts an effectual bar to all extensive military operations, by reason of the impassable condition of the primitive roads, from the incessant rains, as completely as would the ice and snow of Northern latitudes. The Confederates, however, are not idle. Taylor, in western Louisiana, is watching his opportunity, and should Banks seriously weaken his forces in that quarter for the rumoured move upon Mobile, the Confederate general, reinforced from Texas, will surely threaten New Orleans.

In Mississippi, too, General Polk (the Episcopal bishop) who has succeeded General Joe Johnston, transferred to Bragg's late command, is busy reorganising, recruiting, and making ready for offensive operations. He has a splendid cavalry force, under command of a young, but daring, skilful, and experienced leader, Major-General Stephen Decatur Lee. General Lee is an officer of great activity and daring, yet prudent withal. He not only enforces the Federals to their fortifications on the river, but has forced Hurlbert, whose headquarters are at Memphis, to abandon the line of the Memphis and Charleston railroad, and withdraw his forces to the fortified suburbs of the city. Such are the rapidity of his movements and the vigour of his attacks, that there is not now a Federal post in the territory bounded on the north by the Tennessee, and west by the Mississippi as far up as Memphis. In West Tennessee, Forrest, Jackson, Stuart, and several other famous cavalry chiefs are pushing their operations with great success, and with constantly increasing ranks. So much for the subjugation and occupation of the rebel States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Tennessee. The leaders of THE INDEX know what the Federals have accomplished in these States; they know how long a time was required for the partial results won; and they can form some estimate of the sacrifice of life and treasure on the part of the would-be conqueror. If they hold so small a portion of these States to-day—and that so precariously—how long, it may be fairly inquired, will it be before they overrun, subjugate, and occupy the entire South? Not in a century at this rate of progress.

I do not place much faith in the rumoured preparations for an attack upon Mobile, though there is a suspicious movement of troops in this quarter. Regiments are arriving at Ship Island from Pensacola, while others are being transferred from there and from this city to East Pascagoula, and other points on the Mississippi Sound, south-west of Mobile. Banks cannot mean to threaten seriously Mobile with the forces at present at his disposal, though should he advance inland from East Pascagoula towards the city, even on a raid or for a reconnoissance in force, I am assured the Confederates will attack him vigorously. Banks may have the co-operation of a column moving across the State of Mississippi from some point—Port Hudson, Natchez, or Vicksburg—on the river. I have heard a rumour to that effect, and the arrival here of General M'Pherson, the Federal commander of all the forces on the river between Port Hudson and Memphis, gives some show of colour to the report. He has been here now going on a week, consulting and planning, doubtless, with Banks. The extraordinary and unprecedented weather which has prevailed here during the last ten days would have prevented any movement by either Banks or M'Pherson. General Dabney U. Maury, who commands in Mobile, has doubtless reaped the full benefit of the term of grace vouchsafed by the weather, and is now ready for the enemy. I take for granted that he is fully aware of the intended move, for the Federal commander here has never yet been able to make even the least significant movement without its being promptly communicated to the nearest Confederate post. The spy system of the Confederates in this department is vast beyond precedent and almost wholly voluntary. Should General Maury need them, General Polk, who commands in Mississippi, will be able to spare him fully 10,000 men, and retain at the same time sufficient force to hold in check any Federal column advancing from the river, unless, indeed, that column should turn out to be much larger than General M'Pherson could at present spare for such an expedition. I am assured that a force of from 15,000 to 20,000 men can be concentrated at Mobile in twenty-four hours, and from what I have learned of the extent and nature of the city defences on the land side, this force would be more than enough to hold it against twice its numbers. There is no talk of a fleet co-operating by an attack on the forts in the harbour. I opine the Federals know well enough that there would be just as little glory or profit in such a venture as in their vindictive, protracted, and bootless siege of Charleston. If a fleet does attack Mobile, you need not be surprised to hear of Admiral Buchanan, the hero of the Merrimac, receiving his late brothers-in-arms of the United States Navy with a very warm welcome. The navy yards in the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers have not been idle, and if the blockade fleet does not keep a bright lookout, both night and day, Buchanan may repeat the lesson of Hampton Roads

The Confederate navy is growing large and formidable in the former river, in the waters of Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile, and it will prove itself ere long.

No trial has yet been had in the case of the Sir William Peel, seized off the Rio Grande some two months ago by the Federal blockaders and sent to this city. I understand that the Federal authorities would be glad to be rid of the matter, but the owners insist upon heavy damages, and the case will go before the United States Circuit Court for this district, unless the Government compounds to the full amount, and in good and lawful money, for this gross and totally unjustifiable outrage upon the rights of neutral commerce.

I learn, through a trustworthy source, that on a certain day in the last week of the last month the largest army train ever seen in the West crossed the Mississippi near the mouth of Red river, protected by about 10,000 Confederate troops. It consisted chiefly of ordnance stores for the armies west of the river. So much for the opening of the Mississippi and the cutting of the rebel territory in twain. We may fairly conclude that the Western Confederate armies are not isolated from those East, and that the Mississippi does not travel unvexed to the sea, as Mr. Lincoln would have us believe.

I have just learned that Magruder has succeeded in capturing 1,500 Federal cavalry sent into the interior of Texas on a foraging and reconnoitering expedition. He paroled the men, not wishing to be encumbered with prisoners. These 1,500 horses, with arms, accoutrements, &c., are just the things the Texans wanted. The story may be exaggerated, but it is said to have been brought by a Federal transport arrived this morning from the Texas coast.

Banks's forces are making raids through the villages on the opposite shore of Lake Ponchartrain, where a number of of refugees from this city are at present located. There are no Confederate forces there, and these raids are nothing but wanton cruelty.

The farce of reorganising the State Government of Louisiana, according to the scheme set forth in President Lincoln's "Amnesty Proclamation," proceeds apace. This scheme requires a registry of one-tenth of the votes cast at the Presidential election in November, 1860. The total number of votes cast at that election in this State was 49,827, one-tenth of which is 4,982, and this number must be raised within the various lines—a comparatively small portion of this State. The Federal calculation is that the parish of Orleans (the city of New Orleans) and the parish of Jefferson, next above, and which is in fact but a suburb of the city, will be able to muster the required vote. What mockery, this! What a huge and unblushing fraud upon the rights of majorities! What a trampling upon the Constitution and upon the principles of representative government! How would the remaining portion of the voters like it if London were to legislate for the whole empire?

The military governor (Shepley) of Louisiana has issued an order for the registry of voters, requiring each one to subscribe to the oath prescribed in President Lincoln's Proclamation. Any adult male who has resided in this State six months, and in the parish where they register one month, is allowed to vote at the ensuing election for a State Convention. There will therefore be no difficulty whatever in obtaining those 5,000 votes. The negroes are clamorous for the privileges of citizenship. They have held several meetings and appointed committees to wait on the military governor, and obtain from him an express recognition of their status as "citizens of Louisiana, entitled, according to law and justice, to all the privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States." Frequent interviews were had, but without any satisfactory result, and the negroes have in consequence sent a committee to Washington, to present their cause to the President and Congress of the United States.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris, February 2.

After seventeen sittings, many of them stormy ones, the debates on the Address were ended by a graceful speech, in which M. de Morny proclaimed his pride at presiding over such eloquent discussions, and claimed the credit which he is very generally thought entitled to, of rigid impartiality in the discharge of his duties. No amendment or addition concerning the American war was proposed, but in the discussion on Mexico M. Berryer took the opportunity not to make an onslaught on the South, as it was reported to be his intention to do, but to reproach the French Government with jeopardising entente cordiale with the Union, by its enterprise in Mexico and the encouragement this was calculated to give to the South. M. Berryer's line of attack was not a fortunate one, proceeding from him who had so often denounced the servility of Louis Philippe's Government to foreign nations, and especially to the United States. His words were suffered to drop unanswered. They found no echo in the Chamber. Yet the Government commissary need have had no difficulty in quieting his scruples, so far at least as Mexico was concerned. The Patrie next evening supplied him with the substance of a despatch from Mr. Seward to the American Minister in Mexico, dated April 6th, 1861, in which he argues the necessity of the intervention of some power to put an end to the anarchy of Mexico, in the general interest of society. Doubtless Mr. Seward by "some power" meant the United States, and no other, but his admission is not the less forcible, although the guns of Fort Sumter blew this, with many another scheme, of conquest, into the invisible future a few days after the despatch was signed. While the subject of America was thus avoided in the Chambers by a tacit agreement with the Opposition I find in the press several items which may be worth calling attention to. The France shows that in the now acknowledged exhaustion of the North, Mr. Lincoln's determination to secure his re-election is the greatest obstacle to peace. All place-holders necessarily support him, for they have the natural antipathy to relinquish pleasant berths, and a still stronger horror of the idea of the subsequent examination of their accounts. M. Taboulaye, the witty author of one of the best satires on modern France, Paris en Amérique, is giving his hearers at the Collegè de France, where he is professor of comparative legislation, a review, which he might better call a retrospect, of the internal constitution of the United States. He is one of those few foreigners who saw only the fair side of society as it existed there some years ago, and who obstinately shut their eyes to the fact that, however true the picture may have been once from one point of view, it has utterly vanished under the dissolving influence of a military despotism more crushing than has been known in Europe since the days of the Convention. The Patrie furnishes a practical comment on the condition of the people in Mr. Lincoln's States. Thousands of women are now starving in Washington, whither they had gone to claim the arrears of pay due to their husbands, sons, or brothers, who have been killed in the war. "In some countries," says the Patrie, the government organisation for payments works slowly; then it does not work at all." In another paper of the same date I read the account of the passage-boat from Rucker's Island (the recruiting depot) bringing over the bodies of five negroes who had died of the effect of the drugs administered to them by the recruiters, who, not satisfied with robbing their victims of the bounty money, rob the government of its men. With all the dislike which I have for the Yankees, there is one point about them which is growing sympathetic to me; it is their indomitable insolence. In old days it was odious, but now, when they have gone down in the world, to see the old spirit bursting out more offensively than ever is really admirable. Not content with bullying England, which is big enough to bear a good deal of bullying, and vowing he will make her pay for the Alabama's exploits, Mr. Seward has been now down upon Portugal, and insists upon making her responsible for the doings of the Confederate cruisers off the Azores. This is asserting the empire of the seas with a vengeance, and reducing other powers to a position of vassalage.

Although no one believes that for the present there is the least chance of France being involved in the Dano-German war, the Bourse had a great fall yesterday—40 centimes. This great fall, immediately following the immense success of the loan, is a sufficient proof that the great mass of applications was speculative. I heard of one great banker, whose application was made only the last day of the subscription, after he had ascertained pretty nearly in what proportion offers would be accepted, who then applied for a very large sum, sending as security for the payment government stocks. The enormous mass of applications may be accounted for in this way:—the answer by the Emperor to the Address of the Legislative Body, is said to have been pronounced in a most courteous tone. As it treats of the internal situation only, no augury can be drawn from it in regard to foreign policy. The desire of the country for peace has been too plainly manifested to make the course he will take doubtful.

There was a small demonstration against the new regulation for the School of Arts made by the pupils one day last week. The police agents arrested a few of the loudest among the brawlers, on which the well known critic, Theophile Gautier, interfered on their behalf. He was told to go about his business, but persisting in his conciliatory endeavours, one of the agents lost patience and took him by the collar. In doing this he knocked the rosette of the Legion of Honour out of his buttonhole, on which the critic, irate at the insult to his dignity, gave him a sound box on the ear. He was at once arrested, but the arival of M. de Nieuwerkerke, with a neat little speech in his mouth, put an end to the fray, and M. Gautier and his young friends were restored to liberty.

The Debats of this morning has a very pretty little hit at the French Chambers, in the shape of extracts from Mr. Denison's speech at Mansfield. This is quite a French form of opposition, being accompanied by no kind of comment, but not on this account less relished by the classes who read the Debats. Anything which looks like blame proceeding from an official personage in England is eagerly laid hold of. It is the Orleans way of making war, using England as a sort of moral sand-bag.

The evening's Opinion Nationale has the following on the siege of Charleston:—"While we wish well to the North we cannot deny that at present the advantage is on the side of the Confederates. They display a vigour and a degree of skill which would be worthy of admiration if they defended a cause with which we could sympathise." The France announces that the deputation bringing the ratification of eighteen States of the twenty-three which compose Mexico, is expected at St. Nazaire on the 15th of this month. It will proceed at once to Miramar, which the Archduke will leave in about a fortnight afterwards on visits to the Emperor, the Queen of England, and the King of the Belgians. General Woll a veteran of the Mexican army, is said to have already the appointment of first aide-de-camp.

To-night's paper brings sad news for all who admire a brave woman. The Duchess of Parma, the last lily on the long stem of the House of Bourbon, has died after a few days' illness. As a wife, she was a model of patience and tact, and as regent for her son she made herself loved as well as respected by her subjects.

CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

In the Senate, January 5, Mr. Semmes, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill amendatory of the Tax Law, that the farmer and planter is not required to pay to the Government one-tenth of his straw of wheat, rye, oats, rice, or barley, or of the shucks and stalks of his corn crop. Passed.

Mr. Clay from the Military Committee, reported back, with the recommendation that they pass the joint resolutions of thanks to Major Heros von Borcke, of Prussia, the Adjutant Inspector-General of Cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia.

In the Senate, January 6, Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, submitted the following:—

"Resolved, that the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of an act to reform the system of enrolments, and particularly of an act to fix some limitation upon the class of persons, or officers, who may be appointed or assigned to positions of enrolling officers, and to prescribe by whom to be selected or assigned; and to limit the length of time during which any such officer shall be allowed to serve over one and the same district, county, or beat; and to establish some rule or regulation by which an inspector of enrolling districts may be appointed for separate States or sections; and regulating by which such enrolling officers shall be restricted in the number of men placed in their provost guard."

Mr. Johnson said that many of the present enrolling officers were appointed by officers in the field, and were citizens of the enrolling districts to which they had been assigned. These enrolling officers were guilty of the most barefaced favouritism, keeping men out of the army in the field who should be there, and putting in some who ought not to be put in. But he would say the latter cases were, in his opinion, rare. The favouritism of the enrolling officers, in most cases, sprang from a feeling of kindliness to relations and friends. They were unable to say to their relations and friends that they must go into the army, especially when they knew that their act in so doing would be a cause of lasting enmity. Complaints were made of this favouritism in this State. He knew it was practised in his own State, and believed it was more or less in every State. There was another point to which he would call the attention of the committee. It was a fact easily susceptible of proof that enrolling officers put numbers of those they designed to favour into their provost guards, thus keeping them from the army in the field.

Mr. Clark, of Missouri, desired in this connection to call the attention of the Military Committee to a communication in the morning's Enquirer, complaining that citizens of other States, but especially Missouri had taken out Maryland exemption papers, and that Maryland had to bear odium she did not deserve, while Missouri, had more skulkers than any other State. He was not prepared to say the statements in the communication referred to were not true, but would say that if any citizen of Missouri had been guilty of the meanness of taking out Maryland papers to avoid military duty, he hoped he would be ferretted out and punished. He thought the subject came precisely under the cognisance of the Military Committee.

Mr. Sparrow said he did not doubt that there were a great number of fraudulent exemption papers. There were many men from other States who claimed to be Marylanders. He had been credibly informed, at the last session, that at a certain place in the Confederacy fraudulent exemption papers were openly offered for sale. He, however, believed that the bill already reported by the Military Committee would reach all cases of fraudulent exemptions, and would also attain the object proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas. Nevertheless he hoped the resolution of the Senator would be adopted.

The resolution was agreed to.

In the House, January 6, the new Exemption Bill, reported some days ago from the Military Committee, was taken up.

Mr. Miles, Chairman of the Military Committee, explained and argued the provisions of the bill at great length. He said that the bill did not contemplate "putting every man into the army," as some had construed it, but exempted those whose agricultural and mechanical skill was needed by the interests of the country.

In Senate, January 7, Mr. Phelan of Miss., rose to a question of privilege. He had been reported as introducing a bill to authorise the President to suspend the writ of Habeas Corpus. The bill was to suspend the writ, not to authorise the President to do it. That could not be done, as the power to suspend it alone belongs to Congress.

Mr. Phelan introduced the following bill:

"Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, that all citizens of any of the Confederate States, and all other persons owing military service to the said Confederate States, who shall voluntarily depart beyond the boundaries of the said States after the passage of this act, with the intent to abandon the same, without the written permission of the President first obtained, shall be deemed and held as alien enemies, and shall be subject in every respect to all laws passed in relation to persons and property of alien enemies, in the same manner as if such persons had never been on the soil of the Confederate States.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that all officers and agents engaged in the execution of the acts known as the acts of sequestration and confiscation, and all other laws involving a forfeiture and disposal of the property of alien enemies, are hereby required promptly and efficiently to urge the enforcement of said enactments against the property of all persons departing from the Confederate States contrary to the provisions of this act.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, that this act, immediately after its passing, shall be published three times in at least two newspapers in each of the Confederate States."

The bill was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. Henry, of Tennessee, introduced the following bill, which was also referred to the Judiciary Committee.

"AN ACT TO DECLARE CERTAIN PERSONS ALIEN ENEMIES, AND TO SEQUESTRATE THEIR ESTATES.

"The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, that all persons in the Confederate States, liable to military duty, who shall abscond or otherwise leave the Confederacy, and go into any foreign country, or beyond the lines of the enemy within the Confederacy, to avoid performing military service, shall be held to have made their selection to take sides against this Confederacy in the war with the United States, and as such are hereby declared to be alien enemies, and all their lands, tenements, and hereditaments, goods and chattels, rights and credits within the Confederate States shall be and the same are hereby sequestrated by the Confederate States of America, and shall be held subject to all the laws of the Confederate States for the sequestration of the estates of alien enemies.

"Sec. 2. That all deeds of conveyance of real or personal estates, made by persons so seeking to avoid military duty as aforesaid, be and the same are hereby declared to be fraudulent and void."

"In the House, the same day, Mr. Smith of North Carolina, introduced a preamble and resolution reciting the outrages recently committed in Northeastern North Carolina, in which ladies were forcibly seized and handcuffed, and asking that a committee of five be appointed to inquire into and report the facts, and recommend such action as the dignity of the Confederate Government may require. The resolution was agreed to.

In Senate, January 8, the President laid before the Senate a communication from Governor Brown, of Georgia, covering a copy of resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Georgia, expressing a determination to prosecute the present war with the utmost vigour. The communication and accompanying documents were ordered to be printed.

In Senate, January 12, the bill to increase the compensation of certain civil employés of Government being called up,

Mr. Brown, of Miss., offered an amendment that the increased compensation shall not extend to persons able to serve in the army, unless the head of his department certifies that no one can fill the place of said employé, which was agreed to.

In the House, the same day, Mr. Ingram, recently elected from the State of Georgia, appeared and took his seat, after the usual oath had been administered by the Speaker.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the President, transmitting the number of persons, including enrolling officers, surgeons, physicians, and soldiers, employed by the Conscript Bureau in the States appended, as follows:—In Virginia, 94; North Carolina, 870; South Carolina, 219; Georgia, 781. Aggregate, 2,816.

Mr. Russell, of Virginia, offered the following, which was rejected.

"Resolved, that the Committee on Elections inquire into the expediency of authorising the citizens of Maryland serving in the army to elect a delegate to this House, with rights similar to those conferred on delegates from the territory of Arizona and from the Indian nations, and without the power to vote."

In Senate, January 1[illegible], the resolution of the General Assembly of Georgia, asking that the appointment of all [illegible] officers in that State [illegible] liable to conscription [illegible] be revoked, and that citizens not liable to [illegible] be appointed in their stead, was reported on [illegible], and the Committee on the [illegible] discharged from its further consideration.

In the House the same day Mr. C[illegible], of Virginia, offered the following, which was adopted:

"Resolved, that the Committee on Printing [illegible] and report a list of reports [illegible] in the hands of the public printer, ordered to be printed by the House."

Mr. [illegible], of Georgia, [illegible] a bill to be entitled "An Act to authorise the suspension of the writ of Habeas Corpus, [illegible] [illegible] the President [illegible] [illegible] the privilege of the writ of Habeas Corpus [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Referred to Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Foote presented the following letter from Mr. Kelley, Delegate in the Virginia Legislature, from the city of Petersburg:

"RICHMOND, January 6, 1864.

"Hon. H. S. Foote. Permit me to call the attention of the House of Representatives, through you, to a very remarkable oversight, as it seems to me, in the financial legislation, of [illegible] respecting [illegible], whereby the revenue from imports is received in Treasury notes instead of specie.

"The transactions of our [illegible] commerce are conducted in specie [illegible], or [illegible] [illegible] converted into specie, and [illegible] are so enormous that there has never been a time when it would have been a hard stress to have imposed a far higher tariff than our own in specie. The stock of [illegible] [illegible] an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] exceed any [illegible] of [illegible].

"Why, then, should we depart from the standard which, in peace times, and with [illegible] profits, was thought just, and was easily and [illegible] borne?

"The great public interest concerned in this matter will excuse, I trust, the intrusion of a stranger.

"You may make any disposition of this note which will best serve the purpose of calling attention to this evil. Very respectfully your friend and fellow-citizen,

"A. M. KEILEY."

Mr. Foote then offered the following, which was adopted:

"Resolved, that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the revenue laws as to subject goods received during the existing blockade from abroad to the payment of duties in specie."

A bill fixing the rations to naval officers was passed, allowing rations as follows:—

To Admirals,	the same as	Generals.
To Vice-Admirals	"	Lieut.-Generals.
To Rear-Admirals,	"	Major-Generals.
To Commodores and to Captains	"	Brigadier Generals and Colonels
To Commanders and to 1st Lieutenants	"	Lieut.-Colonels and Majors.
To 2nd Lieutenants and to Lieuts. for the war	"	Captains and Chaplains.
To Masters and to Pass'd Midshipmen	"	Lieutenants.

And to officers of the medical, pay and engineer corps, and to boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers, the same as to the foregoing officers of the line of the navy with whom they have assimilated rank.

Mr. Clay presented a communication from the Chief Engineer of the Confederate States at Mobile; proposing to impress negroes and employ them as labourers in the engineer department, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. Hill, of Georgia, the bill providing that the next regular session of Congress shall begin on the first Monday in May, 1864, was taken up and passed.

In Senate, January 2, Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, submitted the following:—

"Whereas, the campaigns of the brave and gallant armies covering the capital of the Confederate States, during the two successive years of 1862 and 1863, under the leadership and command of General Robert E. Lee, have been crowned with glorious results, defeating greatly superior forces massed by the enemy for the conquest of these States; repelling the invaders with immense losses, and twice transferring the battle-field from our own country to that of the enemy; and

"Whereas, the masterly and [illegible] achievements rendering for ever memorable the fields of the 'Seven Days of Great Battles,' which raised the siege of Richmond, as well as those of Cedar Run, Second Manassas, Harper's Ferry, Boonsboro, Sharpsburg, Shepherdstown, Fredericksburg, Winchester, Gettysburg and Chancellorsville, command the admiration and gratitude of our country; and

"Whereas, these and other illustrious services rendered by this able commander since the commencement of our war of independence, have especially endeared him to the hearts of his countrymen; and have imposed on Congress the grateful duty of giving expression to their feelings, therefore,

"Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, that the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered to General Robert E. Lee, and to the officers and soldiers of the Confederate armies under his command, for the great and signal victories they have won over the vast hosts of the enemy, and for the inestimable services they have rendered in defence of the liberty and independence of our country.

"Resolved, that the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to General Robert E. Lee, and to the officers and soldiers herein designated."

After some remarks by Messrs. Johnson, of Arkansas, and Sparrow, of Louisiana, highly complimentary to General Lee and the army of Northern Virginia, the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

In the House, December 29, the following memorandum from the Army of Tennessee in relation to measures best calculated, in their judgment, to maintain the efficiency and vigour of the army, was received and read:—

"To the Congress of the Confederate States.

"In the existing condition of affairs it is hoped your honourable bodies will [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] deliberation, but under the [illegible] conviction that the [illegible] of the country [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible], and that delay, even for [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the dangers [illegible].

"In our opinion, it is essential to [illegible] for the term of the war, without [illegible], the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the President [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] fifty and sixty years of age, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] duty; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the present system, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and then to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] service as cooks, [illegible], teamsters, and hospital attendants, with the [illegible] and [illegible], [illegible] negroes and mulattoes, [illegible] and free.

"These measures, we think, if properly [illegible] as to give time for organising and disciplining the new material, would make our armies [illegible] at the opening of the campaign of next year, and [illegible] territory, and conquer a peace before that campaign is closed.

"We beg further to suggest that in our opinion [illegible] [illegible], a [illegible] of [illegible], from [illegible] [illegible] depreciated currency and the retention of old soldiers in service might be obtained by allowing [illegible] [illegible] in favour of the retained troops, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] rations not issued; and rations, or the value thereof, to officers.

"We have the honour to be,

"Your obedient servants,

"WILLIAM J. HARDEE, Lieutenant-General.

"C. S. STEVENSON, Major-General.

"P. R. CHEATHAM, Major-General.

"JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, Major-General.

"JOHN C. BROWN, Brigadier-General.

"EDWARD W. PETTUS, Brigadier-General.

"A. W. REYNOLDS, Brigadier-General.

"JOHN K. JACKSON, Brigadier-General.

"I sign this, with the reservation that I approve the President's proposed system of permanent [illegible].

"P. R. CLEBURNE, Major-General.

"T. C. HINDMAN, Major-General.

"JOSEPH H. LEWIS, Brigadier-General.

"D. C. GOVAN, Com. Liddell's Brigade.

"I approve the above except that portion which has reference to exemptions and the proposition to place in service those under eighteen and over fifty years of age. I believe the old men and boys would be of more service to the country at home; and that ministers of the gospel, and a necessary number of physicians and teachers, shall be exempt.

"M. P. LOWRY, Brigadier-General.

"R. J. HILL.

"Colonel Commanding Thirty-fifth and Forty-eighth Tennessee Regiments and Polk's Brigade."

In addition to the above names, there are some dozen others who have signed the paper, with certain reservations and explanations.

(From the Richmond Examiner, Jan. 15.)

BUTLER, in command of all the Confederate prisoners, will be, in Yankee opinion, eminently "the right man in the right place." Brutality and cruelty have been displayed in ample measure by others among their generals; yet, by a happy admixture of pettifogging chicanery with bloodthirsty barbarity, by ingenious invention of oppressive subterfuges and insinuating devices for torturing the feelings of the helpless victims who fall beneath his clutches, Butler has won a deserved pre-eminence of infamy, and stands facile princeps on the roll of tyrannical instruments, which comprises such distinguished names as M'Neil, Turchin, and Milroy. Bethel showed conclusively that the field of battle was not the appropriate theatre upon which to display his rare and surpassing talents. After the shock of battle has passed, and the work of danger been performed by others more adapted to that common-place duty, his sphere of glory expands before him. Then, like the jackal, he comes in to gorge himself with the spoil. Then he addresses himself to the congenial work of accumulating plunder while he enforces "loyal oaths," and of insulting women in honour of the flag.

Of course, the appointment of this man to the control of the Confederate prisoners is intended as a punishment of the refusal of this Government to treat with a criminal whom it has solemnly outlawed, and a menace by which to influence our feelings of fear and compassion for the fate of brave men, subjected to the will of such a miscreant, in favour of a consent to proceed with the exchange, even under the conduct of Butler. Doubly desirous, as we certainly must all be, of rescuing our brave and unfortunate soldiers from their sad captivity, now that this additional bitterness has been added to their sufferings, yet the true policy demands that we should adhere to the determination we have announced. To [illegible] from it under the operation of this threat is not only to undergo the mortification of being polluted by intercourse with this degraded being, but to encourage the Lincoln Government in its course of barbarity. Should they be successful in this expedient, they will at each occasion of disputed points in the conduct of the negotiation, recur to the same dastardly and inhuman means in order to enforce our compliance. The opprobrium and execration of humanity will be considered a cheap price to pay for the attainment of their object. With so admirable a tool in their hands for performing their dirty work, there will be a continual inducement to avail themselves of a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] without [illegible] [illegible], claim to possess the monopoly.

THE MATERIAL RESOURCES OF THE CONFEDERACY.

(From the Richmond Examiner.)

AMID much that is gloomy in our military affairs, we find at least one subject of congratulation in the fact that, during the past year, our supplies of arms and munitions, and our military material generally, have increased.

Arms of approved kinds are being made with more facility, at more places, and in larger numbers than at any previous time. Very valuable additions to our supplies of arms have been made during the year by importations from abroad, and thus have enabled the bureau promptly to repair the very heavy losses which were sustained in the [illegible] campaign in Mississippi. In the manufacture of powder, balls, shell, &c., progress has been marked and with some addition to the supplies of nitre from foreign sources, it is understood, there will be no want of adequate supplies of superior quality.

Special attention has been given to the distribution of these works in different portions of the Confederacy, so as not to leave our supplies dependent on single localities. While not yet wholly independent in the supply of nitre, there has been, until very recently, marked increase in the production. That increase has, during the past year, nearly [illegible] from [illegible] duction. The temporary occupation by the enemy of the districts of the country where the richest deposits of nitrous earth were found has for the present [illegible] the production, but it is encouraging to know that the artificial sources of supply, in beds of nitrous earth, will soon begin to be available, and much more than supply the deficiencies which have resulted from the operations of the enemy.

The mining operations in iron, lead, and coal have all been pushed forward with activity, in despite of all the embarrassments resulting from scarcity of labourers and fluctuating prices, and the result has been in each more abundant production and a better prospect of future sufficiency than we have yet enjoyed.

DIED.—Of typhoid [illegible] at the residence of their grandfather, N. C. Munroe, Esq., of Sylvan Lodge, Vineville, near Macon, Georgia, C. S. A., on the 24th Sept. last, [illegible], aged 2 years and [illegible] months, and on the 25th Sept. Nathan Munroe, aged 5 years and [illegible] months, only daughter and eldest son of Commander John M. Kell of the C. S. Navy, now acting as 1st Lieutenant of the C. S. Steamer Alabama.

Also at the same place and of the same disease, on the [illegible]th Oct., [illegible] [illegible], aged [illegible] years and [illegible] months, second daughter of Mr. John S. Hutton, of Savannah, Georgia, C. S. A.

Gone from the hearts that loved her,
 Gone to the realms of light,
Where [illegible] [illegible] [illegible],
 And [illegible] [illegible] bright.

The tender Shepherd called her;
 [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible].
Over [illegible] [illegible] sorrows;
 Her's the eternal rest.

Her home is the beautiful city,
 Where angels "[illegible] [illegible]" adore;
Her playmates the gentle [illegible] [illegible]
 Who had only "gone before."

There, safe from this world's pollution,
 Safe from all sorrow and sin,
Live the loved of our hearts forever,
 Where death cannot enter in.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1864.

Parties in Parliament.

PARLIAMENT met this afternoon, and the curtain has risen upon a scene curiously at variance with constitutional theories and with the ordinary ideas of political speculators. Power is lodged in the hands of a Ministry which commands the support only of a minority of the House of Commons, and of less than one-third of the House of Lords; and yet, unless it should ruin its own prospects by some gross blunder, unless it should be dissolved by internal dissensions, or broken up by the loss of the link which binds its members together, and the whole body to the country, this Ministry may hold office for months, perhaps for years, with less effective control and opposition than the strongest Government usually encounters from Parliament. The party which supports Lord Palmerston is united by no clear and definite bond of common principles. One portion is attached to the principles which the Ministry professes to represent, another to the policy which it actually pursues; one section is at heart quite as conservative as the Opposition, another really feels some interest in the liberal doctrines which the Cabinet holds with a passive, indifferent, and half affected faith, but does not dream of putting into action.

The Ministry itself contains men of divers shades of opinion: from Charles Villiers and Milner Gibson, who are professed Radicals, to old Whigs like Sir G. Grey and Lord Granville, and semi-Conservatives like Lord Palmerston himself. Even its three principal members are by no means harmonious in their views on any subject whatever. Mr. Gladstone is a sound churchman; Lord Palmerston an indifferent man of the world; Lord Russell has the narrow mind, the bigoted temper, and many of the peculiar views of the Dissenting sectaries, and would be quite willing, if he saw the way, to lead a crusade against Church rates and Church establishments. On foreign policy Mr. Gladstone is said to incline strongly to the party of "peace at any price"—as strongly as a practical statesman can lean to anything so wholly unpractical. Lord Palmerston is jealous of English honour and English influence; holds by the traditional policy of the country, and prefers the risk of an occasional war to the abandonment of our position as the umpire, because the only disinterested party, among the conflicting Powers of Europe and America. He is disposed promptly to punish insults to our flag—to extort apologies from nations amenable to civilised modes of action, and to bombard offenders whose limited knowledge of international comity makes them insensible to more Christian forms of argument. Lord Russell is disposed to meddle more and talk louder than Lord Palmerston; but, except in the case of very small Powers, he has a deeper dread and abhorrence of war and bloodshed than Mr. Gladstone. In finance, Mr. Gladstone is devoted to economy; Lord Palmerston to efficiency; Lord Russell to popularity. The Administration, then, has neither a united party nor an unanimous Cabinet. It has, moreover, bitter enemies. The more thoughtful Radicals, like Mr. Forster, gave it their support for a long time at critical moments, avowedly on the ground that, if the Tories came into power, they would probably take a view of foreign policy less agreeable to the malcontents than that of Lord Palmerston. But Mr. Bright has always been the bitter and unsparing enemy of the Prime Minister; and Mr. Cobden, forgetting the gratitude he owes to the Government for his French mission, and the completion of his free-trade scheme, declared himself last year in open hostility to the Administration. These men are the personal enemies of Lord Palmerston—the only avowed personal enemies whom he has made—and they and their section would do anything and join anybody in order to eject him from office. The more moderate Radicals have gradually been drawn in the same direction. An effort has evidently been made to form a regular and organised Radical party—and such a party must inevitably act in bitter hostility to Lord Palmerston. Without the Radicals, he cannot muster three hundred followers in the House of Commons; and the Conservatives alone are said to count about three hundred and ten. The Administration is therefore in a minority; and yet, as we have said, it is likely to remain in power for a considerable time, unless some unusually gross blunder, some outrage on public feeling, or some disaster clearly attributable to ministerial incompetence, should arouse a general revolt, not only in Parliament, but in the country. In fact, except the Radicals and that portion of the Conservative party which wishes for office, everyone is well satisfied to keep the present men at the head of affairs with the present balance of political power, which makes it impossible for them, either of their own mere motion or at the instigation of their followers, to make any move whatever in a democratic direction. In a word, so long as the Ministry does nothing but carry on the Queen's Government, a great majority, both in Parliament and in the country, are satisfied that the Queen's Government should be carried on by Her Majesty's present servants.

We do not say—we do not think—that this is a healthy state of things. The natural defects of a constitutional government—its tendency to compromise everything, even to national honour, for the sake of peace and quietness, and its disposition to allow too much influence to the personal crotchets of a powerful member of the Cabinet—are greatly aggravated by the want of an effectual, vigorous, and aggressive Opposition. But under present circumstances it is hardly possible that such an Opposition should exist. The Conservatives are too strong for opposition and too weak for government. They are too strong for opposition, because if they really oppose—if they move and press home a vote of censure, say on the Kagosima bombardment, or the imbecile mismanagement of the Slesvig-Holstein imbroglio—they would certainly turn the Government out; and they are too weak to form a ministry, because if they did so the Radicals would be drawn back, by ample promises, into the Liberal ranks, and Lord Derby's Government would again find itself in a minority. The cooler heads of the party, who do not mingle in daily political strife, and have time to look quietly at the future, are not, therefore, eager for office. The rich, thoughtful, unambitious, highbred, patriotic country gentlemen, of whom Colonel Wilson Patten is perhaps the typical representative, do not wish to see their chief in power, unless with a majority, or the certainty of obtaining one by an appeal to the country. Lord Derby himself does not wish to oust the Administration. Consequently, Lord Palmerston knows that there are but three perils that seriously menace his tenure of office. He may be overthrown by any serious complication abroad, or by any secession from his own Cabinet breaking up his party, and forcing office upon the opposition, or by any flagrant disgrace arousing the spirit of the nation. He will not, therefore, allow any affront which takes a strong hold on national feeling to pass unnoticed; he would rather go to war than endure another Trent outrage; but, short of this, he will do his utmost to avoid storms, seeing that in calm weather he may consider himself master of the situation. Also, he will be careful not to quarrel with Lord Russell or Mr. Gladstone. He knows that their crotchets are not likely to upset the Cabinet, but that their secession might do so. Hence Mr. Gladstone will have uncontrolled management of our finances, without that guidance from his colleagues which he above all men requires in order to prevent him from offending public prejudices and practical sense by a budget based on principles too purely scientific; and Lord Russell will be allowed to cringe to the United States and bully Brazil—to make the murder of a British subject the occasion of war against Japan and of mild entreaty to Mr. Seward—so long as his quarrelsome pen and timorous spirit do not involve the country in some intelligible and intolerable disgrace. There have been cabinets in which this latitude might safely be allowed to the chiefs of departments, but the present is not one of them. In the first place, the confidence of the country is not given to the Ministry, but to the Prime Minister. The public distrusts Mr. Gladstone because it cannot understand him; and it distrusts Lord Russell, because it understands him thoroughly. Again, the minor Ministers are none of them remarkable for administrative capacity; some of them are remarkable for the reverse. Sir George Grey, Sir C. Wood, Lord Granville, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Cowper, are distinguished only by their marvellous talent for getting into scrapes, for damaging the public interests, and provoking Parliament beyond its patience. Under ordinary circumstances these men would be held in check by the vigilance of the Opposition and the supervision of their chief; and some of them would probably be removed to less conspicuous posts. At present, they are allowed to go on as they please; because their colleagues confide in Lord Palmerston's power to get them out of the troubles in which they are perpetually involved, and because the Opposition feel that it is of little avail to provoke a debate with the forgone conclusion that the Ministry is not to be turned out. If they gain a few victories, Lord Palmerston threatens to resign, and puts a stop to their proceedings; if they allow themselves to be beaten, the Ministers gain by the division more than they lose by the discussion.

Hence we conclude that the first weeks of the session, at least, will witness no great party fight. It is quite true that the Ministry has laid itself open to some very damaging attacks. The bombardment of Kagosima was an outrage on humanity which certainly will not be seriously approved on either side of the House; and there will be, we suppose, a smart debate thereupon. The American leaders will taunt the Government with having exceeded the crimes which called forth high-sounding protests from the Foreign-office when perpetrated by Federal generals. They will ask, what is the destruction of a harbour compared to the bombardment of a populous city; or what has Gillmore tried to do at Charleston but what Kuper has actually done in Japan? Mr. Disraeli, in fulfilment of his functions as chief of the Opposition, will make a very eloquent and very bitter speech, which may hurt the feelings of some very thin-skinned Ministers—probably the least guilty of all—but which Lord Palmerston will regard merely as a display of fireworks, and not as a discharge of artillery—Roman candles, and not Greek fire. Lord R. Cecil, having no practical responsibility, will speak with still more effect, and probably damage the character of the Ministry more than any other of their assailants unless Mr. Walpole should bring to the aid of the accusers his high personal character, and the influence which he derives from his urbanity, his freedom from all individual animosities, and his unimpeachable conscientiousness. But after all, what can come of all these efforts? The Tories and the Radicals neutralise each other. Many who are disposed to vote with Mr. Disraeli will refuse to go into the lobby with Mr. Bright; many who are strongly impressed by Mr. Walpole will be repelled by finding Mr. Cobden and Mr. Forster on the same side. The argument will be all against the Government; but we doubt very much whether a division will take place. First, nobody wants to oust Lord Palmerston, especially at the suit of John Bright. Secondly, every one has a painful remembrance of 1857—when the House pronounced against the Chinese war, and Lord Palmerston went to the country; the result being a Parliament in which the Tories were paralysed, and from which Cobden and Bright were both excluded. Nobody wishes to fight on a similar ground again. Still less does any one care to fight about Slesvig-Holstein. If we go to war, the whole nation will be of one mind; till we know whether we are to have war or peace, most men are satisfied to have no strong opinion of any kind upon the subject—except that Lord Russell has probably muddled that, as he has muddled every other matter that he has handled. There are other reasons, to which we need not allude, which will make expectant Ministers very chary of that question. Of course something will be said about the infamous misconduct of Sir G. Grey in the Towuley case; but nothing, short of proved corruption, would induce Parliament formally to censure a Minister for his conduct in the exercise of a discretion so peculiarly belonging to the prerogatives of the Crown. And, we need hardly add, nothing will be done to alter the course of the Government towards the American belligerents. Not that the country approves that course. No one, except the partisans of the North, thinks that Lord Russell has acted honourably or impartially. But there are only two points clear and strong enough to form the ground of a vote of censure: the seizure of the rams and the non-recognition of the Confederate States. The first cannot be discussed in Parliament while the case of the Alexandra is pending in the courts of law. The second is in this position: four-fifths of the House wish that the Confederacy should be recognised, but do not chose to pass such a vote except on the responsibility of a leading statesman; and no leading statesman is prepared to take the responsibility of recognition. Lord Derby will not do it; and the Tories cannot come in without Lord Derby. Lord Russell will not do it, and Lord Palmerston dare not throw him overboard. And in truth, except Lord R. Cecil, we doubt if any prospective Cabinet Minister would dare to hazard his position by making the proposal. Moreover, any vote of censure on the American policy of the Government would rally the Radicals to their aid, and with the Radicals they have a sure majority. The Confederate States, therefore, have nothing to expect from either party. The only difference is that the sympathy of the Tories is with them, while the sympathy of some of the Liberals is with the North; and that the Tories, relying on the country gentlemen, would have borne less from the United States than the Whigs, who depend in great measure on the commercial classes and wish to conciliate the Radicals, and who, moreover, are less sensitive on points of national honour, and more alive to the blessings of peace than the country party. The Tories would not have tolerated the blockade of Nassau, and they would not have allowed the Federal Government to recruit in Ireland or to rob and murder on the coast of Africa; but they probably would have seized the Alexandra, and they would not have recognised the South.

We are of opinion, then, that so far as circumstances hitherto known affect the political temper of Parliament, the present Government has nothing to fear. At the same time, it is quite clear that any offence to the House of Commons or to the country would at once embolden the Conservative party to use their opportunity and seize the reins of power. And it may be assumed as certain that the death or retirement of Lord Palmerston would dissolve both his party and his Cabinet.

Federal Diplomacy.

MR. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS has this excellent quality in a diplomatist—that he suits his language admirably to the individual whom he addresses. There are passages in the correspondence of this gentleman, which, if addressed to any other Minister than Earl Russell, would probably have resulted in the very prompt departure of the American Minister; there are threats which would not have been endured for an hour by a Pitt or a Canning; there are arguments which could hardly have found a vent anywhere save in the despatches of a Northern envoy or the columns of the New York press. For all that, they tell; Mr. Charles Francis Adams, though he is the bête noir of the British Cabinet, is the thorn in the side of Earl Russell. Every despatch acts upon the Foreign Secretary as a touch of the spur upon an unwilling steed. We may discover cause and effect in regular series in comparing Mr. Adams' remonstrances with Earl Russell's acts; and although at times there is something like a struggle on the part of the recalcitrant "Britisher," an attempt to throw this "old man of the sea," who is such a terrible incubus on the shoulders of the last of the Whig Earls, it invariably ends in the acknowledged mastery of the Yankee minister, however cleverly the submission may be secured by a few bold words.

That terrible rover of the seas, No. 290, alias the Alabama, it is which most disturbs the peace of mind of Mr. Adams, and very earnest he is in urging his suit against the British Government on her account. We shall not weary our readers with recapitulating the worn-out charges about her evasion of the authorities at Liverpool, her manning and equipment on the high seas, &c., but go directly to the more heinous offences which are brought against this country. Mr. Adams actually complains that her captain, "claiming to be an officer acting under legitimate authority, yet is in the constant practice of raising the flag of Great Britain, in order to better execute his system of ravage and plunder on the high seas." Now this is no doubt very wrong of Captain Semmes, from a moral point of view. But we venture to say that the practice of hoisting false colours to deceive an enemy is one recognised by every rule of war; and we know that in the last naval war between Great Britain and the United States it was systematically resorted to by both Powers. To endeavour to hold this country responsible for this ruse is a childish absurdity which could only proceed from the pen of Mr. Adams, and which must have puzzled even Earl Russell's habit of deference to the American Minister. But Captain Semmes not only sails under false colours occasionally; he actually burns his prizes. In the first place, this is not Captain Semmes's fault. We imagine that gallant officer would be far better pleased to be allowed to take his prizes into neutral ports, and there dispose of them and their cargoes, but that privilege is denied him; so he destroys them. But to burn an enemy's ship is surely not an unheard-of thing. We know of no law of nations prohibiting it. It is simply a question of the convenience of the captor. If he burns an enemy's ship, the owner has his remedy against the Government whose flag he flies. But to imply that because Captain Semmes does not take his ships into the blockaded Confederate ports Great Britain is responsible for his depredations, is about as illogical and impertinent a suggestion as was ever addressed by one diplomatist to another. However, Mr. Adams fortifies his case by these and similar considerations, and puts in that convenient claim for "national and private injuries thus sustained," which some day or other, when the present conflict is at an end, is to form the casus belli between the old country and the United States. Now this claim has never been abandoned. It crops out in almost every despatch upon the question of belligerent rights during the last fifteen months. Mr. Seward never omits to hold it up in terrorem. Mr. Adams, at the risk of wearying even Earl Russell into a passion, reiterates it, and even when threatening reprisals and letters of marque never fails to remind Earl Russell that in his despatch box, ready to be presented at a fitting moment, he keeps the claim for redress which is hereafter to justify the chastisement of Great Britain.

We must do even Mr. Adams the justice, however, to acknowledge that he does not reach the audacity of Mr. Seward. In July, 1863, the Secretary of State of the Lincoln Administration makes use of the following pretty plain threat:—"Can it be an occasion for either surprise or complaint that if this condition of things is to remain and receive the deliberate sanction of the British Government the navy of the United States will receive instructions to pursue those enemies into the ports which thus, in violation of the law of nations and the obligations of neutrality, become harbours for the pirates?" Here is a direct threat: such an one as, we venture to say, is almost unparalleled in the correspondence between two friendly and equal Powers. The British Government having once recognised the Confederate States as belligerents, cannot refuse to them the rights that it affords to their enemy. It proclaims perfect neutrality, and in pursuance of that object limits the stay of the ships of either combatant in its ports to a definitely restricted period. The Alabama in this respect enjoys no greater advantages than are possessed by any of the United States cruisers; and yet Mr. Seward, crying out for neutrality, asks us to refuse admittance to our ports to the Confederate navy, and threatens us with hostilities in our ports in the event of our non-compliance with his demands. No wonder that, spurred on by this menacing language from his Government, Mr. Adams re-appears again, more courageous than ever, and frames half-a-dozen new indictments against this unhappy country. "Men and money," writes Mr. Adams, "ships, arms, and gunpowder have been continually purchased of Her Majesty's subjects almost from the beginning of the war." We will take these charges seriatim. Imprimis, the article "men." We wonder that even Mr. Adams did not blush as he penned this monstrous perversion of truth. At the outbreak of the war Her Britannic Majesty's Government warned British subjects from taking part in the strife, and thus responsibility is out of the question. But is it not perfectly notorious that Ireland has been one vast recruiting ground for the Federal armies; that British subjects have been not only illegally enlisted, but forcibly kidnapped; that at this moment hundreds of British subjects are serving in the Federal ranks who have been hired for agricultural purposes, taken off to the provost-marshal's office, drafted to the nearest depot, uniformed, equipped, and despatched to some Federal camp where remonstrance is impossible and desertion is death? For one British subject serving in the Confederate army or navy, one hundred have been deluded into the Federal service by the agents of the Government which Mr. Adams represents, and no one knows that better than Mr. Adams himself. But the Confederate loan is also a grievance. We can perfectly understand that. When Federal credit was so bad that Mr. Chase dared not address European capitalists, European faith in the honour and resources of the "rebels" was so strong that the amount of loan was subscribed in a few hours. Mr. Adams may feel annoyed, but he has no reasonable right to complain. The market was open to his Government, and they did not avail themselves of it. Where would have been British neutrality if it had been announced that a Federal loan was legal and a Confederate loan illegal? As to ships, the right of furnishing them at the builder's risk to either belligerent has never been seriously contested, and the mere fact that the North has no need to purchase does not destroy that right. As to supplies, arms, and munitions of war: 1st. There is no more definite principle of international law than that Governments are not bound to prohibit their subjects from trafficking in articles contraband of war; 2ndly. Unless British neutrality is to be the sham which Mr. Adams desires to make it, it is perfectly monstrous for the United States minister to complain against the export of arms into the Confederate States, whilst not a steamer starts to the Northern States without carrying in its hold those massive crates of "hard ware" which go to arm the mercenaries, the motley herds of Germans, Irish, and negroes, who are raised to devastate and subjugate the Southern Confederacy.

Mr. Adams' pretensions are extravagant, his logic is blundering, his threats laughable; but he has hit his mark. We can trace his influence in the detention of the Alexandra and the protracted judicial proceedings which have arisen out of it; in the sudden raid upon the rams at Birkenhead; in the announced intention of the Government to alter the Foreign Enlistment Act of this country in accordance with the views of the United States Cabinet. When one knows the calibre of Mr. Adams one feels inclined to marvel at his success. The astonishment ceases, when one reflects that the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs is Earl Russell.

Mexico in the French Chambers.

THE latest news from Mexico affords a curious commentary on the language of the French Opposition leaders in the recent debate. The week had not ended before the telegraph announced that the man with whom they expressed themselves ready to treat as the lawful ruler of the country, had been driven from his last place of refuge, had fled unattended, and was refused official recognition in the last quarter where a shadow of nominal authority still remained to him. Practically, by the admission even of the Northern American press, which has the most reason to be hostile to French success, all organized and systematic resistance to the occupation of Mexico is at an end, though a species of predatory and expeditionary warfare after the approved Mexican fashion may for a considerable period delay the complete pacification of the country.

We are surprised that any respectable portion of the English press should compliment M. Thiers on his speech of Tuesday week last. Clever enough as the claptrap of a mere partisan, but not rising to the level of his best oratorical efforts, it seems to us to seriously damage his reputation as a historian and philosophic thinker. We find it difficult to believe that a man of M. Thiers' calibre can be serious in putting forth such an argument as that "notwithstanding the large quantity of gold found in California, the Treasury of the United States has been forced to have recourse to paper-money," as showing the worthlessness of wealthy metalliferous provinces. It would, indeed, have been astonishing if California had from its own resources borne the burdens of the three years' war in America, or if her annual exportation of precious metals had sufficed to redeem a thousand million dollars of greenbacks. Yet California has added more to the power, the commercial prestige, and even the revenues of the Union, than any other single State. There is a certain school of political declaimers who estimate the value of each portion of the national domain according to the precise amount in pounds and shillings for which it stands either on the debtor or creditor side of the Treasury books, and who would economise by abandoning Gibraltar, selling India, and getting rid of the colonies. But we had thought M. Thiers a man of higher intellectual stature. Again, it is incredible that he should fail to perceive his self-condemnation, when he justifies his opposition to such distant expeditions as the Mexican on the ground that the expeditions of Clive and Hastings were in their time opposed in the English Parliament. Surely M. Thiers could not have forgotten that though the opponents of Clive and Hastings had a far better case then he and his party friends have made out last week, the precedent he invokes is that of the establishment of the most magnificent transmarine empire in history.

If we are unable to discover any marked ability in the manner in which the Mexican question has been handled by the best speakers of the Opposition, neither are we able to give the Government orators credit for more than average talent in the performance of their task. Neither the one side nor the other have shown the capacity, perhaps from lack of a deep conviction on either side, to seize on the salient features of the subject. Unless we except a few pompous truisms about national honour, and something about "France covering herself with glory," there has been no enunciation of great principles of action, no bold sketches of long-matured policy, no revelations of the depths of thought of the master mind. With a wealth of material at their command, both the assailants and the defenders of the new Mexican empire have contented themselves with languid commonplaces, giving the debate the appearance rather of a stage duel than of a combat à l'outrance in good earnest. There was not even a serious effort to expose the numerous blunders of facts and dates which formed the staple of M. Thiers' hastily and carelessly prepared brief:—a rare opportunity of inflicting a damaging blow, which in the English Parliament would not have been neglected. Perhaps all this may be accounted for by the Government's confidence in the inevitable result of the debate, and it may have been thought expedient to reserve the heavier ammunition for a more formidable attack.

It is less easy to find an explanation of the official indifference in another direction. The Mexican expedition is unpopular chiefly on account of the profound ignorance of the French popular mind on everything connected with it. The tactics of the opposition are as simple as they are obvious. They consist in playing upon this ignorance, and in this respect they are left absolute masters of the field. The average Frenchman is rather a sentimental than a philosophical traveller, knows little and cares less for countries very far beyond the horison of his ordinary vision. The periodical press necessarily reflects this phase of the national character, and with much acuteness and veracity, it is as a rule deficient in that extensive command of facts and painstaking research which constitute the "dull solidity" of English journalism. It requires, therefore, a more emphatic contradiction than has yet been attempted, to dispel the popular impressions about Mexico, which it is the diligent task of the Opposition writers and speakers to disseminate. Thanks to them, the most beautiful and the richest country on the globe suggests to the masses of the French people only ideas of yellow fever, musquitoes, dirty Indians, arid deserts, and deluging rains. And yet no other portion of the inhabited earth is so well calculated to seduce the imagination of a people like the French. It is difficult for the soberest pen to undertake a description that shall not read like a poem. The marvellous grandeur of the scenery, the delicious mildness of perpetual spring, and the fabulous fertility of the soil, have left their traces in the style of every traveller that has visited this favoured region. The American armies which overran Mexico in 1848, returned with glowing accounts of this terrestrial paradise to inflame the cupidity of their countrymen. It is in France alone that this concurrent testimony of the books of every language falls to-day upon sceptical ears; and the student who wishes to consult even so well-known and unimpeachable an authority as Humboldt's Nouvelle Espagne, can only find it in the catalogue of some public library. For this paucity of popular information on Mexico the Government must be held, in a great measure, responsible. If a company of merchants invites the public to invest their money in some distant or novel enterprise, they are not slow in employing the necessary means to enlist the interest of the public. A Government similarly situated cannot with impunity disregard this example. If to-day Great Britain were suddenly involved in some expensive and distant expeditions, the press would teem with facts and figures to awaken and to satisfy curiosity. French public opinion, so much more accustomed than ours to receive impulses and directions from above, needs such teaching in a correspondingly greater degree. Yet, with an army actually fighting in Mexico, when everything relating to that country has a peculiar interest to the humblest household, the French press has almost forgotten its existence on the map. There are no correspondents' letters, such as keep vividly before English readers the triflingest details of English achievements in the remotest corner of the world; there are no maps to instruct the curious, no pictures to amuse the idle, no scientific reports for the reflecting. What is almost equally surprising, there is no really good book produced by the expedition, nor even a republication of an old one. There is literally nothing, except, perhaps, a military melodrama or two. All this is far more a cause than a result of the unpopularity of the Mexican expedition; and so long as no systematic effort is made to propagate the truth about Mexico, the unpopularity will continue.

Again, it is a trick of the Opposition to make the wretchedly abject condition of Mexico during the last forty years the standard of what it had always been and always would be. Why did it not occur to one of the speakers of the majority, when M. Thiers spoke of California, to remind him that both California and Texas were, not many years ago, Mexican provinces, and that it was not until they came into the possession of a more energetic race that the one became the land of gold and the other the land of cotton?

There is one thing for which the French Government ought to be obliged to the speakers of the Opposition, especially at this moment, when the diplomatic correspondence published at Washington reveals the hypocrisy and cowardly cunning of Mr. Seward. These gentlemen of the Opposition are notoriously and avowedly the friends of the North, and the ardent favourers of its success. It is, therefore, not a little significant that they should, as M. Thiers and M. Berryer have done, so explicitly threaten the Mexican empire with the irreconcilable hostility of their clients. They do not hesitate to declare, these friends of the North, that France must prepare for war with the United States so soon as the latter are in a position to wage it; which means, so soon as the liberties of a brave and free people shall be trampled under the iron heels of conquering multitudes. We do not think that the Emperor of the French is deceived as to the nature of the entente cordiale which Mr. Seward has obsequiously concluded with him, but he has nevertheless cause to thank M. Thiers and M. Berryer for the frankness and opportuneness of their declaration, and to accept as a warning what he must despise as a threat.

The Danish War.

THE peace of Europe is broken. Lately no one has ventured to hope that a pacific solution of the Slesvig-Holstein question was within the region of possibility, yet so rapid has been the march of events, that when the actual outbreak of hostilities was announced everyone was surprised. The Great German Powers have hurried on the conflict as though their very existence depended upon provoking a war with Denmark, and as though they dreaded every day's delay, lest at the eleventh hour their imperious demands should be conceded and bloodshed averted. As to the merits of the original question, there is a great diversity of opinion, but in no quarter, so far as we know, has the conduct of Austria and Prussia found an apologist. But to censure their rash proceeding is now practically useless, for if public opinion is not strong enough to prevent war, it is still less able to stop it. It may be that the unanimity and firmness of other nations will prove to Austria and Prussia that they cannot violate the rights of a small kingdom with impunity, and that peace may be soon restored; but, on the other hand, history teaches us that little wars generally involve other nations in the conflict. We do not, however, propose to speculate on the probable results of the hostilities just begun, but to briefly recapitulate the immediate circumstances that brought about the skirmish of Mussinde.

When the contingent ordered by the German Diet took possession of Holstein, the only pressing difficulty that presented itself was the claim of the Duke of Augustenburg. The right of the German Diet to administer the affairs of Holstein in the name of the King of Denmark was indisputable, and despite the connivance of the army of occupation at the presence and pretentions of the Duke of Augustenburg, there seemed a strong probability that the invasion of the Slesvig would not be attempted, and that time would be given for the Powers interested in the convention of 1852, by which the succession to the throne of Denmark and consequently to the dukedom of Slesvig and Holstein was settled, to arbitrate upon the differences between the German Diet and the Danish Government. The claim of the Duke of Augustenburg was so monstrously unjust that it could have been disposed of to the satisfaction of all Europe, including the leading German Powers, and it was also notorious that King Christian was willing and even anxious to conciliate. Such was the situation, when Austria and Prussia, contrary to the expectation of the majority of the members of the Diet, forgot their hereditary jealousies which had been so lately fomented by the Congress at Frankfort, that was convoked by the Emperor Joseph, and announced their intention of taking the business in hand.

They offered a plausible excuse for so doing. They rumoured that their sole object was to preserve peace, which was jeopardised by the countenance given to the Slesvig-Holstein Pretender; but their actions soon showed that they were instigated by altogether different motives. Before the cabinets of Europe could deliberate on the new aspect of affairs, their armies were marching towards the Eider, and an ultimatum was presented to Denmark, couched in the most peremptory and unacceptable terms. They demanded of King Christian that, disregarding his obligations as a constitutional sovereign, he should at once revoke the constitution which had received the formal sanction of his Parliament. If the Danish Government had returned a scornful answer to this insolent and arbitrary mandate, Europe would have forgiven the act on account of the provocation; but with a rare, honourable, and wise forbearance, King Christian only asked for so much delay as would enable him to obtain the consent of his Parliament to the annulling of the measure which was put forward as the grievance. This reasonable request was incontinently refused. In vain did the English Government awaken too late to a sense of the exigencies of the crisis, and remonstrate daily, almost hourly, with the Governments of Austria and Prussia. Our telegrams and our despatches were treated with contempt. At last the English Government offered to guarantee that the promise made by the King of Denmark should be fulfilled as soon as the Rigsraad could be called together; thus pledging this country to no longer defend the rights of Denmark, if the Danes through their representatives refused to endorse the policy of their sovereign—and we are confident that the royal proposition would have been rejected. Thus every pretext for going on with the war was done away with; but still Austria and Prussia would not be satisfied. They did not want the supposed rights of Germany conceded and granted, but they wanted war, and the spoils they hope to get by war. So the invading army continued its progress, occupied Holstein, entered Slesvig, and with an eagerness that has given the Danes the victory in the first encounter, commenced the campaign.

Some ascribe the hasty movements of the Austrian and Prussian troops to strategic reasons. It would, no doubt, have been greatly to the advantage of the Danes to have delayed the campaign until the spring; for then, not only would the Dannewerk position have been rendered much more secure, but the Danish fleet could have struck a blow at German commerce. Others think that the haste is accounted for by the desire of getting possession of Slesvig before England could come to the assistance of Denmark; and that having obtained the duchy, they would be able to dictate terms involving the complete separation of Slesvig and Holstein from Denmark. The Austrian and Prussian Governments trust to a great extent to the unwillingness of England to go to war, and possibly thought, that though we should not submit to see a wrong done which we had the opportunity of preventing, we should be less disposed to resent it if accomplished, and ready to negotiate for a settlement of the dispute. Nor, we are told, was this the only consideration that weighed with them. We need not observe that the King of Prussia has not the remotest idea of the duties of a constitutional sovereign; and it no doubt entered into his calculation and into the calculation of his ally, that on account of family connections, and by reason of the long and intimate friendship between the respective courts, Queen Victoria would be very loath to take any step that might possibly lead to war between England and Prussia. Such, at least, is the official gossip at Berlin. Undoubtedly the position of our sovereign is an exceedingly painful one, but an English monarch in these days knows how to sacrifice private feelings for the public weal; and the course that will be pursued by this country will not be influenced because the Princess Royal is the wife of the heir to the throne of Prussia, or because the illustrious lady who is married to the Prince of Wales is the Daughter of Denmark.

But there is yet another, and we think equally fallacious calculation, on which the Governments of Prussia and Austria have acted. They suppose that the relations between this country and France are not so good as formerly, and that there is no possibility of a joint action in the North of Europe. Perhaps the blundering diplomacy of Earl Russell has to some extent impaired the cordial friendship that subsisted between the courts of London and Paris, but only those who are grossly ignorant of the spirit and character of Napoleon III. can imagine that he will permit his public actions to be influenced by the remembrance of Earl Russell's rude rejection of the proposed Congress. We do not pretend to peer into the motives of the Emperor, but we are sure that he will do that which best accords with the interests of France. Now it is notorious that the Emperor is not indifferent to what is passing in the North of Europe, and further, that his relations with the King of Sweden are of the most friendly kind. Is it likely, then, if England is forced to take part in the fray, that France can remain neutral? And can any complication be conceived that could make England and France take opposite sides in such a contest? If England is forced into the war there will again be an armed alliance between this country and France.

The King of Prussia may think that by engaging in a foreign war he will be enabled to put an end to the disputes between him and his people, but the internal condition of Austria affords no such explanation. Hungary is upheaving, the Italians are looking wistfully towards Venetia, and it would seem that the Emperor Joseph had quite employment enough at home for his army, and that to engage in a foreign war was to risk the integrity of his empire.

It is reported that in consideration of helping Prussia to conquer the Duchies, Austria is to receive assistance in Italy and, if necessary, in Hungary. If this is a faithful exposition of the secret treaty, we can only marvel at the blindness of the high contending Powers.

And what part have we played in this eventful drama? Are we altogether guiltless of the outbreak of war? We cannot give a very satisfactory answer to these questions. That Earl Russell has been sincerely and earnestly desirous of preserving peace is unquestionable, but it is hardly less certain that his vacillating policy has contributed to bring on the war. At one time he wrote a despatch favouring the views of Denmark; at another, he addressed a very sharp remonstrance to the Danish Government in favour of the pretensions of the German Diet. As the crisis approached his tone became more and more uncertain. He urged a conciliatory policy on Denmark, but he lacked the courage to warn the German Powers that there was a limit to concession. Only when the affair had virtually passed out of the domain of diplomacy did he take up a position by which Austria and Prussia could understand what bounds the British Government had set to its forbearance. It is rumoured that a few days since, when the Austro-Prussian army was advancing on the Eider, after the King had conceded everything at the solicitation of England, and that England had offered to guarantee the fulfilment of their concession, the Danish Government was notified that in case of need Great Britain would afford it material aid. Six weeks, it may be even a month ago, such a declaration would have averted hostilities; now its only effect can be to pledge us to take part in the war.

Verily, history repeats itself. There is a wonderful parallel between the commencements of the Crimean and the Danish wars. With Turkey, as with Denmark, the original question in dispute had reference to a protectorate over provinces. In both cases England advised concession, and in both cases the advice of England was taken, and the disputed territory was occupied by invading armies. In each instance it was immediately discovered, that the reason assigned for the occupation was a pretence to cover ulterior designs. In each instance the Government of England was influenced by an earnest desire to preserve peace. The Emperor Nicholas, like the German potentates, trusted by rapid movements to forestall intervention, and to secure what is called a material guarantee. Nicholas, like King William and the Emperor Joseph, believed that France and England would not act together. At the commencement of the Russian war, as at the commencement of the Danish war, Englishmen were assured by the Government organs that this country would not have to participate in the contest. Happy will it be for England and Europe if the parallel is carried no further.

Mr. Bright's Platform.

PROFESSOR MAX MULLER, in his lectures, refutes the common idea that language is always the servant and never the master of man. We are, for example, oftentimes obliged to resort to slang, under the penalty of not being understood if we confine ourselves to a more refined and fashionable vocabulary. This is especially true with regard to Mr. Bright's speeches. They are so intensely American, and so thoroughly un-English, that we have no choice in writing of them but to adopt the vernacular of United States politicians. In the ordinary sense of the word, Mr. Bright has not a policy, for no one supposes that any Government could be carried on if his principles were adopted: but he has a platform, that is, a plan for the demolition of certain institutions. It may be objected that the title of our article is neither quite English nor quite Yankee, but that is owing to the peculiar position occupied by Mr. Bright. He has no following, and is a stranger and an exile in the land of his birth. We cannot call his programme "the Birmingham platform," because he no more represents Birmingham than he does Manchester. In this country the most he can hope to achieve is to stir up here and there temporary hostility between classes: but if he lived in that country where his heart is—the United States—he might be a Cabinet Minister as well as a demagogue. We do not intend offering any criticism on Mr. Bright's utterances respecting the Confederate States. His stentorian curses will do the South no more harm than Mr. Lincoln's proclamations, and everybody knows that Mr. Bright is too shrewd to curse, save from lack of argument. When the member for Birmingham parades the sham philanthropy of the North and pretends that the Yankees are fighting for the emancipation of the negroes, it is hardly possible that any of his audience are credulous enough to be gulled by such a ridiculous fallacy, and, if so, the Federal Government takes good care to correct the erroneous impression. Mr. Seward, writing to the Federal representative at Madrid, emphatically repudiates the assumption that Northern Emancipation is anything more than a military measure. Does Spain desire to preserve her institution of slavery against all antagonists? Then, says Mr. Seward, let Spain keep on terms of cordial friendship with the United States. So far from being the enemy of slavery, the United States is the avowed protector of the system. Mr. Bright may curse the South until he is hoarse, but he cannot in the face of Mr. Seward's declaration induce any sane person to regard the Washington Government, the Government elected and sustained by the Abolitionists, as being instigated by a sincere desire to emancipate the negroes.

Mr. Bright has always been noted for coarse vituperation, and has therefore never been a general favourite, yet a few years since he was respected as well as disliked. People thought him very honest, though not patriotic. When he denounced the Crimean war in the House of Commons he was listened to attentively, and cheered when he sat down, because the members deemed him sincere, and believed that his hearty abhorrence of war made him forgetful of the honour of his country. When Mr. Bright thundered against Church Establishments it was supposed he was instigated by just and pious though mistaken motives. When his violence had put him for ever out of the pale of Government, and he sought to avenge his expulsion by clamouring against the rich, people thought him blinded by passion, and forgave his vain attempt to stir up a war of classes. But a change has taken place, and we learn that Mr. Bright's peace principles, and indeed all his principles, are subordinate to his admiration and friendship for the United States. The leader of the Peace party defends and applauds a war waged for the purpose of exterminating six millions of people, who have chosen to assert their right to be governed according to their will and to maintain their hereditary independence. Mr. Bright, who once condemned the power of the sword, now openly rejoices that the sword is invoked to aid the cause of negro emancipation. He was once professedly a religious man, but in his late speech at Birmingham he quoted from an infamous parody on the Bible, called the "New Gospel of Peace," which was published in New York, and republished in this country by Mr. Abel Heywood, of Manchester. This remarkable degeneracy is due to the development of his affection for the United States, or rather for the Republican faction. Mr. Bright's creed is, that the United States Government is the perfection of government, and that the country ruled by the Yankees is a paradise compared to England. He has never visited America, and possibly he may credit the stories told him by his veracious New England friends. Be that as it may, it is certain that Mr. Lincoln has not a more devoted adherent than the member for Birmingham. War is an accursed atrocity when waged to defend the interest or honour of England, but it is a sublime virtue when waged for the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine; to effect a moral revolution by fire and sword is diabolical, except when the Federal government is the propagandist; blasphemy is a crime, save when blasphemy is employed by Federal Republicans against the party in the North which is anxious to put an end to Bloodshed. Never was there such an instance of unreserved devotion to a cause as in the case of Mr. Bright and the Federal Government. He knows that the authorities at Washington are in pressing need of recruits, and he boldly advocates emigration to the United States. He is aware that in the North personal and political liberty is a thing of the past, that the prisons are crowded with political offenders, that a war debt is being created at a rate that will make the war debt of England small in comparison, and that emigrants are drafted into the army as soon as practicable after they land in America. Yet he proclaims the United States to be the land of freedom, plenty, and happiness, and the refuge for the oppressed peasantry of England.

But the crowning proof of Mr. Bright's love for the United States is his dislike of English institutions. He strives, though vainly, to drag down the press of this country to the level of the Yankee press. He denounces the aristocracy as a set of oppressors, and represents the landowners as the enemies of the working classes. He craves for changes in the law so that the lands of the rich may be divided amongst the poor. If this is not his object, then he is deceiving his audiences when he tells them that primogeniture and entail prevent their becoming landowners. Of course he is aware that his scheme is an impossibility, and that if all were equally rich to-morrow, in a very short time there would be rich and poor again, but to make the working classes discontented with their lot, it is necessary to resort to the demagogue's oft-repeated whine, and to persuade them that the rich keep them out of their rightful property. Mr. Bright is conversant with all that has been done of late years to improve the condition of Ireland, but he does what he can to foment illwill in that country, by condemning the government of it in the style of "Meagher of the Sword," and demanding the overthrow of the Irish Protestant Church. Then he strives to get up a reform agitation in England. He deplores the ignorance of the masses, and having shown their unfitness, asks in the same breath that they shall be entrusted with the franchise. Being quite in accord with the ultra fanatics of New England, Mr. Bright ventured to throw out a feeler about the "emancipation of women." He said:—

> I can say with greatest truth that I rejoice on this as I have on many other occasions, to see them exhibiting an interest in the progress of political questions. I venture, not diffidently, but confidently, to say, that politics, by which we understand the science of legislation, have a very direct and constant influence upon the happiness of every woman in the country where there is a government; and that therefore what is done under the name of political action can by no means be indifferent to the mothers, and wives, and sisters, and daughters of England.

To sum up, we will quote a single sentence from the same speech which very well exposes Mr. Bright's hatred of England. He said:—

> It is the most curious thing in the world that, whenever an Englishman leaves these shores, whether it be the effect of the salt air, or of sea-sickness, or of that prolonged meditation which a long voyage invites, he seems to peel off, not the rags of his body, but the venomous rags off his intellect and soul.

Could the most malicious foreign enemy of England have expressed a more malignant antipathy? How is it that Mr. Bright is not anxious for his own purification? Why does he not go abroad and so get rid of "the venomous rags off his intellect and soul"?

Our readers may wonder that we devote so much space to the subject, seeing that it is already well known that Mr. Bright loves the United States and hates England; but there is a practical and important lesson to be learnt from the conduct of the member for Birmingham. Happily he does not represent any class of Englishmen, but he does represent the dominant faction in the United States, and by his sentiments we can accurately gauge the sentiments of the Federal Republican faction. Mr. Bright loves the Union, and wishes it to rule over a continent, and consequently to overshadow every government in Europe, and so does the ruling faction in the North. Mr. Bright hates English institutions, and so does the ruling faction in the North. The Northern States long to strike a blow at the greatness and prosperity of England; but the creation of a balance of power in America by the establishment of the Confederate States destroys their hope of being able to do so. We must not, therefore, be surprised that Mr. Bright blinded by his love for the United States, curse the South, gloats over a programme of extermination, does not reprove Federal barbarities, does not breathe a word of censure against Butler, Turchin, and McNeil, and does what he can to help the North; but it would indeed be a marvel if all intelligent and patriotic Englishmen did not heartily pray for the success of the Confederate States.

LORD CAMPBELL ON THE AMERICAN WAR.

[We are indebted to our Special Correspondent at Manchester for a full report of the meeting of friends of the South, held under the auspices of the Manchester Southern Independence Association, at the Clarence Hotel, in that city, on Friday last, and of which we give elsewhere a brief account. The demands on our space render it impossible, much to our regret, to give the whole of our correspondent's report, and we have therefore selected one of the several able speeches delivered on the occasion, both on account of the conspicuous position the speaker occupies in Parliament as a champion of Confederate independence, and because he treats boldly and vigorously the only question which really divides the sympathies of Englishmen, that of emancipation and the welfare of the negro race. It is to be regretted that so many of the friends of the South should shrink from telling the whole truth on this question, and should think it necessary to make concessions to the anti-Southern prejudice which are scarcely consistent with the self-respect of the Southern people and their just consciousness of having honourably discharged their duties as men and as Christians to the negro race.]

LORD CAMPBELL, on rising to address the meeting, was greeted with loud cheers. His lordship spoke as follows:—My lord, ladies, and gentlemen. As it has happened to me two or three times in Parliament to refer to the topic now before you, it is not with a little satisfaction I observe in the numbers who have met to-night and in the spirit they evince some augury for the ultimate adoption and the final triumph of these opinions I have endeavoured to support. Mr. Spence, under whose orders and instructions I have the honour to address you, has judiciously explained to me that to-night it was not necessary to indulge in argumentative harangues, because the greater part of us were of one opinion. After the long and assiduous discussions which this topic has received in the press, in Parliament, and in public meetings, it is no wonder that nearly all men should agree on certain propositions. We do see upon certain propositions a remarkable agreement. Few deny that the cessation of the civil war in question can only take place when neutral Powers have acknowledged the insurgents. (Cheers.) Few deny that that acknowledgment ought not to be anticipated, in the present state of Europe and the world, until Great Britain has shown a certain disposition to initiate or sanction it. (Hear, hear.) Few deny that in the present state of parties and of Parliament the British Government will not show the required disposition until public opinion strongly urges and decidedly encourages it. (Hear.) This sufficiently illustrates the political and practical utility of a meeting like the present. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, if ever agitation was essential on this subject it is at the present moment, when certain dangers have arrived and certain circumstances have disclosed themselves which might, unless properly examined, tend to inspire doubt and distrust in the event of Southern independence. Those dangers and those circumstances ought not to be, nor indeed need they be, connived at. The Southern President has not set us the example of ignoring or concealing them. (Hear.) He has not hesitated to fix the attention of the world upon the fact that in the past year unforeseen reverses have been suffered. He has not scrupled to advert to the events at Vicksburg and Port Hudson. The whole world, in common with the Confederacy, deplores the loss of Stonewall Jackson. (Loud cheers.) All those who are interested in the fate of the Confederacy must have heard with regret and with anxiety that the Democratic party, which some months ago seemed to augur well for the cause of peace and separation, has grown more silent, more subdued, and less effective than it used to be. These are undoubtedly circumstances of discouragement, but, as I think, grounds for agitation and activity. (Hear.) There is this grand reason, gentlemen, why these circumstances of discouragement ought not to be considered motives of despondency amongst us—They have not shaken the Confederacy (hear); they have not quenched the spirit which upholds it; they have not chilled the hopes which it indulges; on the contrary, we have good reason to believe that in spite of the darker picture I have pointed to, there never was a moment when their discipline was of a higher character, their armies more mature, their generals more skilful, their strategy more perfect, their resolution more undaunted, or their readiness, if necessary, to take new regards more complete. (Enthusiastic cheers.) When they themselves are thus undaunted by realities it would ill become their friends in Europe to be affected by a shadow and a reflex. (Hear.) I have therefore ventured to allude to those unfavourable circumstances, and also to show why they ought not to lead to a diminished hope or a discouraged spirit upon your part. Gentlemen, if that be so, if the ends of this association are legitimate, which I have not ventured to establish, knowing that such is not a question in this room, if at the present moment those ends ought to be pursued with more zeal and more activity than ever, it is not irrelevant or idle to consider what is the most important and formidable obstacle opposing you. Gentlemen, I cannot help thinking that the most formidable obstacle, looking to the public mind, looking to all that has been said and is said daily on these questions, is summed up in the well-known term, "slavery." I cannot help thinking that if a just opinion were established on that subject—and it is your mission to establish and disseminate it—no further obstacles could very long delay the triumph of your principles. (Hear.) And if you would allow me, I would venture—having given some consideration and reflection to that point in reference to Parliamentary proceedings—to suggest a mode by which, as it appears to me, what you hold to be the truth might be brought home to the convictions of all classes in society. If it were only thoroughly explained by this organisation that the British public has to look merely to one question, namely, Whether, of the two issues in which this war must terminate—for there are but two—the separation of the belligerents or the conquest of the South by the North will tend most to the advantage of the negro race? (hear)—if that were steadily contemplated, if that issue were relieved and disembarrassed of all the rival issues that confuse it, I do not think there would remain a difference of opinion in this country. No doubt there will always be, as there has been up to this moment, both here and on the other side of the Atlantic, a difference of opinion as to how the war originated, as to the motives for which it was undertaken, as to the objects of the South in asserting independence, and of the Union in waging war against secession. These questions are more or less difficult to settle. But if we fix our minds upon the only point it is material to weigh, namely, whether the independence, or the subjugation, of the South will really tend most to that which in this country all have at heart—the amelioration of the negro—little difficulty, as it appears to me, will be found in reaching a conclusion. (Hear.) The history of the world does much to suggest one. It has generally been found that when in any country two races are brought together, of which one is vastly the superior in force, in vigour and intelligence, unless some known relation exists between those two races, the weaker is exterminated. (Hear.) Now, should the Confederacy be subdued, and should reconquest be established over all the great territory that lies between the Gulf of Mexico and the Potomac, two races would be found, so unequal, so incompatible, so bereft of the original relation by which they had been previously cemented, as at least to augur the extermination and the disappearance of the weaker one. But we are not left to speculations of this character. It happens that this very day, not many hours ago, a letter in a leading London newspaper has reached Manchester from the other side of the Atlantic, which gives the best and the latest information on this question. In that letter it is pointed out in what manner the invasion by the North has influenced the prospects and position of the negro. As far as I remember, the writer, speaking from what has fallen, and that recently, under his eyes and his experience, gives a four-fold division of that unhappy class. He points to those who are the victims of a forcible enlistment (hear) compelled to take arms—exposed to the brunt of battle in a cause which they detest and for a people who despise them. (Hear, hear.) He points to another class who have gone to the North-Western States in quest of employment, and who have not found it. He points to a third class, who, in consequence of an infectious disorder which attacks them, are miserably dying in the capital of Washington. He points to another class who are coerced to labour upon the soil which has been occupied and upon the estates which have been confiscated by Northern plunderers, and whose condition, as he points out to us, is infinitely worse than that from which they have been wrested (hear); for, of freedom they have gained nothing except the fact that they are no longer under shelter; that they are no longer cared for; that they are introduced to the double evils of responsibility and servitude. (Hear.) This is the latest eye-witness who addresses to the public of Great Britain the facts he has observed. But supposing him to be mistaken, supposing that improvement is attainable, and assuming that great measures ought not to be despaired of for the welfare of the negro — this, at least, gentlemen, I think may be hazarded with safety before any audience who look to the great principles by which human nature is controlled and by which the world is governed, viz., that those measures of improvement must be loyal, must be well intentioned, must be designed for the good of the negro, and not for the destruction of the planter. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) It has often been remarked that Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues are not men of power, genius, or capacity; but if they were men of power, genius, and capacity, they would not be able to overrule those great laws inherent in the very nature of affairs, by which the mind of a Napoleon would be limited; it would not be possible to them, any more than it was possible to him, to make right the path to wrong, philanthropy the instrument of vengeance, the liberty of one race the forge of shackles for another. (Cheers.) Such, however, is the course on which the Government of Washington have recently embarked — with what ill-success you may see vividly portrayed in the letter to which I have adverted. (Hear, hear, hear.) I therefore cannot help thinking, gentlemen, that if this question could only, by an association such as yours, addressing itself in the first place to Manchester, after that to important towns which surround it, and so gradually pervading the community—I cannot but think if this question were put by you on its proper basis, viz., Whether Southern independence is, or is not, for the ultimate advantage of the negro? a great truth would be established, and a great obstacle would be removed. (Hear.) Because, look at it in this way. Suppose the question of slavery had altogether ceased to agitate or to divide us; suppose there was no such thing as slavery in the Northern or in the Southern States; imagine a civil war such as that which rages, between two federations, in which the productions of the earth were altogether the result, as they are happily in Europe, of free and independent labour—put that case, and then would there be any difference of opinion as to whether it was right, or policy, or wisdom to re-establish the vast, the overwhelming, and the aggressive Power on the other side of the Atlantic, by which the peace of Europe must be seriously threatened, and of which the daily language is a menace to the world. Could there be two opinions on that question to which Lord Wharncliffe has referred, that it is not for the tranquillity of Europe, that it is not for the benefit of any independent State on this side of the ocean or the other, that a Power so huge, so arrogant and so avowedly rapacious—which decade by decade must go on augmenting and accumulating—should be restored to its original integrity? There would be no difference of opinion upon that point. Could a class of men be found, if the topic of slavery was altogether purged from the discussion, who would seriously maintain, before us, that it was just or proper to create a Poland in America? But to create a Poland in America is the object for which Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues are contending. (Cheers.) If his policy succeeded, if his armies triumphed, if his viceroys were established, as they hope to be, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Potomac, the gloom of Warsaw would exist, not in one city but in Mobile, Charleston, Wilmington, Savannah, in Montgomery, Richmond—in every capital of every State which Northern armies had possessed and Northern garrisons had occupied. (Hear.) And what is the gloom of Warsaw, which those armies are designed to fix on the Confederacy? I can speak of that gloom from late and personal experience. (Hear.) It is not like the gloom which sometimes may hang over this city, arising partly from the climate, partly from distress and from a temporary want in some material of industry. It is a gloom which no breeze of spring can waft away, which no rays of sunshine can disperse, which no reviving commerce, or accelerated industry, or new supply of capital, can alter. It is a gloom which must befall a population conscious of their rights, and mindful of their origin, but held down by a foreign occupation of 20,000 men; a gloom, of which no man can walk abroad without observing dark and melancholy traces; where no citizen can leave his home without meeting a patrol, entitled, according to its orders, or perhaps its caprices, to arrest him; and where, when he returns to that home, which ought to be a sanctuary, he has to look forward to the probability of midnight visitation, more destructive than the snares by which his footsteps had been haunted. (Cheers.) Such, gentlemen, is the gloom of Warsaw, and such is the gloom which Northern armies have aspired to perpetuate in a territory more wide than half-a-dozen Polands. I, therefore, come back to the position to which I have ventured to allude—that, if once you contend successfully with your adversaries upon slavery, no further question can exist; and all classes in Great Britain will unite in a common wish for Northern peace and Southern independence — a wish that, finding echoes both in Europe and the world, will tend to realise the noble objects it aspires to. (Cheers.) There is yet another observation I would make. Success cannot, on a subject so complicated and so extensive, be the object of prediction. A man would justly lose his character for moderation and for judgment if he ventured to predict with confidence the issue of the struggle. It seems to me, however, that, whatever that issue may be, this Association will not be wholly unrewarded. Should the issue be that for which you are contending, the reward is evident and ample; but should it not be the destiny of those who are assembled here to see what they desire, this reflection may console them. They will have done something to assist the Southern President in the labours and the cares by which he is encompassed; and, gentlemen, no man of reflection can, in my opinion, glance at the daily life of Mr. Davis without a sentiment which even passes admiration. (Immense cheering). If an independent and despotic power had been granted to him, such as great men are apt to claim under such circumstances—still, to keep the mind engaged upon every part of an almost interminable frontier, to divine the plans of a government whose movements it is difficult to calculate, to prepare for every possible event, to picture each imaginable difficulty, to plan campaigns upon a territory so extensive and under circumstances so unprecedented, would tax the very highest reach of military genius. But this is not the whole of the burthen that devolves upon Mr. Davis. This task he is called upon to perform, while at the same time he is accountable to a representative assembly, to a senate, and to a cabinet. (Hear.) But even that is not the limit of his trials. He has to face these difficulties, to aim at these results, with a free press to criticise, to control, to reprimand him; sometimes to be elated by success, sometimes to be depressed unduly by reverses, and sometimes to reveal to distant armies much which in his opinion it would be more judicious to conceal from them. The liberty of that press he has not once attempted to control or wished to override. (Cheers.) And yet to meet this threefold trial might well exhaust the wisdom of a ruler, the resources of a general, and the temper of an angel. (Cheers.) Come what may, gentlemen, you cannot be deprived of the reflection, that in your day, according to your power, although divided from him by the ocean, you have done something to uphold one of the bravest and the noblest minds which Providence has formed, in one of the loftiest and hardest enterprises with which the fortunes of the world have ever been identified.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, January 19.

I HAVE no accounts of military events to send you by this steamer. The Federal batteries are dropping Greek fire from time to time into Charleston. The amount of damage is not known. Some activity is said to prevail at Hilton Head, and an expedition to be in preparation for some port further South. In Tennessee it begins to be believed that Longstreet has been considerably reinforced, and that a movement for the retaking of East Tennessee will be made this winter by the Confederates. But the coldness of the weather is very much against the probability of such an enterprise. From Virginia there is nothing new.

Congress has not got through with the amended Conscription Bill. By a short law they have renewed the bounties on enlistments until March 1st, and the draft is suspended to that date. There is an idea in Congress that under this stimulus and by the terrors of a severe conscription pending, the efforts of State and local bodies by straining every source and adding largely to the Government grant, will bring in recruits so that the number required to be drafted to fill up the quota will be inconsiderable. The exertions are very great. Once more it is said that in the spring the Federal armies will take the field in such overwhelming numbers as to be irresistible and to finish the war without fail. Military correspondents at Washington for confidential journals of the Administration are indeed laying out the plan for the campaign, by which Richmond is to be reached by two separate armies, each of magnitude sufficient of itself to cope with the army of General Lee. The elaborateness with which the whole plan and all the details of this campaign are set forth is a very suspicious circumstance. Generals do not usually furnish in advance so much valuable information to an enemy.

The Senate has refused to throw out the commutation clause. A conscripted man may claim exemption from service on the payment of $300. The retention is of less moment than the line of argument by which it is supported by leading friends of the Administration in both Houses. It was advocated as a mode for raising money in order to secure soldiers, and it was said that the Treasury could not possibly meet the payments which the system of paying bounties would require without some such indirect aid. There was this dilemma before them: a peremptory draft would be cheapest in the mere first cost, but it would be seriously obstructed—might fail—and would bring popular odium on the authors. An unrestricted system of bounties would be beyond the ability of the Treasury to meet. Commutation was therefore continued as lightening immediate pressure on the Treasury, and as lessening the difficulties of the draft.

It is one sign only of the increasing terror with which the condition of the public finances of the United States are regarded at Washington. In the course of the debates plainer language was spoken on this topic than has been ventured before since the beginning of the war, in respect to any of the unpleasant aspects of public affairs. It is but six weeks since Mr. Chase published his report, in which he gave assurances that there would be a rapid improvement of the currency, and there were men found credulous enough to believe him, and to shape their business accordingly. Instead of improvement, things have been going on steadily worse, in the face of the most confident averments by all departments of the Government that the war is substantially over, and that all necessary means are ready to enter upon the enjoyment of victory and realise the blessings of peace. Men do not believe that the war is by any means over, nor that it is believed to be so by the men who prophesy that consummation most loudly. They see that the prospect has not lessened the demand for immense expenditures, and that no resources have been contrived with which to meet them which materially check the increase of paper money or the incessant swelling of the national indebtedness. Some very gloomy anticipations were uttered by several of the most zealous partisans of the war. Settling days have begun to come before they were expected, and the contingent expenses of the war, which do not make their appearance in the appropriations for regular army and navy purposes, are looming up with an unthought-of magnitude which is absolutely appalling. Judge Spalding, of Ohio, one of the leading Administration men in the House, stated the other day, that if all the demands which were coming against the United States for expenditures, advances, and losses on account of the war, other than those originated under its direct authority, were allowed, the Treasury would be bankrupt. It was not made a question of the liability of the Government or its duty to pay, but the broad ground was more than once taken, that there must be some rule adopted to shut out the consideration of these claims or limit their amount extensively, because the Government could never pay them all. There is a piece of legislation pending having this object, and so defended by its authors. An Act passed in 1861 allowed States who had claims upon the General Government for a certain class of losses and contributions to the war, to have them adjusted before the Court of Claims, and thus take the form of an admitted obligation, to be paid at the Treasury. A few of the States have come in, and made their claims in part; and at the beginning of the year about $26,000,000 had been allowed, and the calendar of cases has just commenced. As several more are known to be in preparation, and that the class of claims embraced in it is very large and indefinite, the Judiciary committee of the House has been invoked to suspend this method of settlement altogether. The Court of Claims was created a few years ago, for the express purpose of relieving Congress from the duty of examing every application for relief or payment, and to remove the reproach of delay in the payment of just debts, and of corruption in the combinations by which large claimants notoriously bought their way through Congress. A Bill is reported now to take away this power, and to make Congress, as formerly, the only resource for the recovery of these claims. The motive alleged is that of practical repudiation—that is, of delay in adjusting debts, because it is not possible to pay them. There is another result in view, which may be also called a motive, for when the question comes up in force, and creditors unite to demand a settlement, magnificent combinations and enormous subsidies will not fail to carry the question of a general assumption of their liabilities in some form, out of which senators and representatives and lobby-men will make fortunes, though the Treasury and the original creditors be impoverished. It is a bad omen of what may be done, to creditors with adjusted debts and Government securities for payment, that on the first attempt to reach a settlement special legislation is proposed by the regular Committee of Congress, avowedly and expressly to embarrass the creditor in the prosecution of his demand. The President has some ideas of this sort, and is entitled to the credit of bluntness in publishing them without disguise. Some time last summer the Federal authorities occupying Memphis made some exactions upon the property of the citizens there, which were so manifestly unjust, that President Lincoln, being appealed to, overruled them. On being asked to order restitution, the following was his answer:—

"WASHINGTON, Oct. 19, 1863.

"SIR,—Assuming the within to be a true and full statement of the facts, the claim seems to be a fair and just one. On consultation with the Secretary of War, however, he declares that to enter upon the adjustment of all claims even as meritorious as this, while the war continues in its present proportions, is more than his Department can bear. Knowing as I do how nearly overwhelmed he is, I am unwilling to force him in the matter.

"A. LINCOLN."

"HENRY T. HULBERT, Esq., Memphis, Tenn."

The citizens of Memphis must, therefore, go without even an examination of just and meritorious claims until the war is over and the department is relieved and at leisure. It is a sufficient formula for the postponement of all troublesome demands to that same convenient season—the end of the war. The effect of such suggestions in high quarters, and the growing habit of discussing the possibility and the impossibility of ever paying the enormous debt which is starting up in such gigantic proportions, will have considerable influence in affecting the faith in the public securities of the Government. There is not the smallest doubt that before long there will be a large and clamorous party for not paying the debt at all. Nothing is more clear to the understanding than that this debt will one day be repudiated, unless the form of the Government be so changed that mere popular elections will not control its policy.

That point is very nearly reached. There is a presidential election coming on, in which it will be clearly demonstrated that the power of controlling this Government has passed out of the hands of the people, and that the men in power will appoint their successors or re-appoint themselves by means of the army. The process was successfully put into operation last spring, when the Connecticut and New Hampshire elections were notoriously carried by soldiers sent there from the Army of the Potomac to vote the Administration ticket, while its adversaries were kept back, or, in a conspicuous case, punished, an officer being dismissed for having voted in opposition. The same system was practised in the Pennsylvania and New York elections; regiments being detailed to go home for the high duty of voting on a particular side. Maryland and Delaware were worse treated. The polls were taken by the commanding general of the district, State laws abrogated, new laws imposed, inspectors and judges imprisoned, and a majority of voters kept or driven away from the polls. In Delaware the whole body of the opposition, heretofore a majority in the State, were compelled to abandon the right of suffrage, and permit the minority to return their candidates under the patronage of the Federal general, whose headquarters were in Baltimore. A more flagitious scheme is going on in the South, where Federal army officers and their camp followers are encouraged to assume the authority to elect themselves and a miserably small minority of actual residents into a sovereign community, to have a voice in the presidential election, and an equality in the Senate with the oldest States. The men who do all this with insolent success, under cover of the war powers and by means of the war powers, will dispose of the next presidency, and all the mighty power which that office has gathered to itself. No power of resistance is left, for they have the control of an army of three-fourths of a million of armed men, whose chiefs that hold them in hand have been selected from among the partisans of power, or when not originally so selected have yielded to temptation and become its tools. The last days of the republic are passing away in agony. Next November it will emerge a military despotism, as completely, in fact, as that which, under the forms of the lost republic, was inaugurated in the time of the Cæsars by the election of Augustus and Tiberius.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, February 3rd.

A GREAT Confederate "demonstration," enthusiastic in its character, and politically of the most favourable augury, took place in this city, on Friday evening last, under the auspices of the Southern Independence Association. It was in some respects a heterogeneous assembly—and herein consisted some portion of its significance and power. Supporters of the honourable member for Rochdale, who differ toto cœlo from Mr. Cobden only upon American affairs; admirers of the honourable member for Bradford, who are grateful to Mr. Forster for his generous and accurate delineation of the noble qualities of the Confederates; constituents of Mr. Milner Gibson, who was deferentially listened to the other day as a Cabinet Minister, while his hearers condemned him as a representative of Ashton; out-spoken electors from Mr. Cobbett's almost unanimously "Southern" constituency of Oldham; Conservatives of Salford, who will again vote for Mr. Massey in order to keep out John Bright's Radical nominee;—all these, and as many more from towns far and near, differing not less in their religious than in their political creed, and comprising people of all social grades and professions—army officers, church dignitaries, merchants whose names are best known on 'Change, wealthy cotton-spinners and their employés, down to the over-looker and the operative mill-hand. Such was the miscellaneous assembly drawn and united together in this city, its single bond of fellowship being a common sympathy with a struggling nation that has gallantly thrown away the scabbard in the cause of liberty.

The occasion, I am glad to say, was a great triumph for the Confederacy. The speakers were the Right Honourable Lord Wharncliffe (President of the Association), Lord Campbell, Mr. James Spence, Mr. T. Birley (Chairman of the Executive Committee), &c. The addresses were received with the most unbounded applause. The closing passage in Lord Campbell's speech, in which he glanced at the daily life of President Davis, created a feeling of the greatest excitement. The saloon rang with cheers renewed again and again with an enthusiasm which showed that his lordship's words were regarded not as a formal peroration, but as expressing in the most unreserved manner the admiration, sympathy, and esteem instinctively felt by a manly and generous mind. The proceedings did not terminate until a late hour.

Oldham has well maintained its character in the cordial reception it has given to its representative, Mr. J. Morgan Cobbett. The honourable gentleman, in making his annual audit, must have been gratified to find how thoroughly his views agreed with those of his constituents. Upon the American question, Mr. Cobbett spoke as follows:—At the very outset of the war President Lincoln described it as not a war for the extinction of slavery, because, he said, under the Constitution he had no right to extinguish slavery; and in the very next breath he added he had no intention of doing so. But I go further than this. I meet those gentlemen who say it is a question on the part of the North of doing away with slavery, and on the South of upholding it, with this—which they cannot deny—that when the whole of the States, North and South, were slave states—for recollect it was only in 1810 that slavery was abolished or mitigated in any of the States—when the whole country was a slave-holding and a slave-working country. There were at that time continual attempts on the part of the South to separate from the North, alternately with attempts on the part of the North to separate from the South; and I believe if we were to examine, point by point, and year by year, the history of slavery in the American Union, we should find it had as often occurred that the North desired to separate from the South, as the South from the North. One of your earliest representatives, gentlemen, was my own father, who, as a politician, was well acquainted in his time with the condition and tendency of American affairs. He visited America shortly after the Declaration of Independence, and remained there until the year 1800. He was actively engaged in politics, and in many of his writings I find constant references to the question of separation between the two sections of the country; and, what is more to the point, I find it was as often my father's speculation that the North would separate from the South, as that the South would separate from the North. There is one remarkable passage I found in his writings the other day, and as it appears really a somewhat singular prediction, I will read it to you. "The reader will do well to observe the point on which Virginian politics turn. Virginia will have either a majority in Congress or a separation of the States. And one or the other she will have, I am afraid, ere two years are at an end. I do not love gloomy prospects better than other men, but to shut one's eyes to the light is folly. The danger to be averted, must be first perceived and acknowledged. It is very certain too that the New Englanders wish to get rid of the Southern States. Their interests are as opposite as the manners of the inhabitants. With this inclination, so mutually repulsive, they can be held together by nothing but the Federal influence of the Middle States, and particularly that of Pennsylvania. If therefore this influence should decline in any considerable degree, a separation must inevitably take place, and happy will it be if it should come unaccompanied by a civil war, long, desolating and bloody." My father, you see, was only mistaken as to time. Politicians, ever since I was a boy, were agreed that a separation of the two sections must result from the variance and clash of interests of North and South. As the Northern States became more populous by reason of immigration, they of course obtained a preponderance of power, and this, with its attendant wrongs and political injustice, gradually led the Southern States to declare fore separation and independence; and in my opinion that declaration was fully justified by the very foremost article of the United States Constitution. And, gentlemen, when I heard the violent imprecations uttered by Northern men, whether statesmen, soldiers, clergymen, lawyers, everybody, upon the South; and when I observed the temperate speeches, the able documents, the military generosity and forbearance characterising the Southerners in the council and camp, I plainly avow that my inclinations were in favour of the South struggling for its liberties and all it held dear, rather than in favour of the North, powerful as it was, struggling not merely to subjugate, but to exterminate a gallant people. I do not undervalue the necessity of getting rid of slavery, but this is an evil the remedy for which must not be looked for from the North, for I know from personal observation the feelings and the conduct of the Northern people towards the unhappy negro, whether bond or free. Such being my opinions, I hope to see the South recognised as an independent Power, and although I was unwilling to join those who insisted upon immediate recognition, because I thought the Government best qualified to decide that matter. I still hope to see the Confederacy acknowledged by Great Britain when the proper time is thought to have arrived.

A resolution was subsequently carried with acclamation, approving of Mr. Cobbett's principles and opinions, and pledging the meeting to secure the hon. gentleman's return at the next election.

But this, it may be objected by partisans of the North, was an expression of opinion by Conservatives only, and its value must therefore be discounted by one-half. This objection would appear plausible if the fact, in other constituencies as well as Oldham, did not betray its utter nullity. Mr. Barnes, M.P. for Bolton, told us the other day that upon the American question all distinctions of Whig, Tory, and Radical politics were swept to the winds—that Mr. Berkely was not a warmer advocate of the ballot than of the South. Last night the advanced "Liberals" of Oldham—the constituents of Mr. Cobbett's pro-ballot, pro-reform, and anti-church-rate colleague (Mr. J. T. Hibbert) gave an unmistakable proof of the soundness of Mr. Barnes's opinion. Mr. Hibbert found his section of electors every whit as unanimously Southern as Mr. Cobbett found his. On meeting his constituents last evening, Mr. Hibbert had scarcely touched upon the cotton question when he discovered the temper of his audience. "We had the satisfaction of thinking," said the hon. gentleman, "that although the American war was not at an end, and that therefore we were not likely to receive a large quantity of cotton from that country, yet that we should probably receive larger quantities from other countries which were preparing to enter the market; and it was consolatory to know that we had only to wait—though it would be hard to do so—for one or two years longer—(cries of "When?" and laughter)—and we should then not be dependent entirely upon one country for the supply of the raw material. The question called to mind the position in which we stood with respect to the American war. This was, he knew, a very delicate subject to touch upon in any public meeting in Lancashire. He knew that in Oldham, as well as elsewhere, there were many persons who were fully "up" to everthing connected with the subject, and were perhaps even better informed upon it than many members of Parliament were. Another year had now passed, and the war was still "dragging its slow length along." He saw no prospect of its speedy termination; but he could not witness the sad bloodshed and the distress which the war had caused in that once happy country, without feeling that Her Majesty's Government ought to have taken an early opportunity of offering a friendly mediation between the contending parties. (Cheers.) That had long been his opinion; and he was now more convinced than ever that, when we were so ready to mediate between the Germans and the Danes, it would have well become the Government, in the interests of humanity—it would have well become a great Christian nation like England—not to have stood by calmly watching this dreadful carnage and destruction, but to have offered, in concert with the French Emperor, friendly counsels to both nations,

FROM TEXAS.—The following extract from a private letter will interest many of our readers:—

HOUSTON, TEXAS, October 11, 1863.

It is Sunday night, and I am at the office, scribbling away at a lot of official letters. As I learn Major Magruder (the general's nephew, and on his staff as chief of artillery,) is going to Europe on Tuesday, I cannot let escape the opportunity of writing you a few lines.

I know how intensely anxious you must be about the current of events in this part of the Confederacy—an anxiety the greater that you are so far away, and not deadened by daily habit into a tolerable degree of calmness and moderation. We have escaped the horrors of war so far in Texas, except in a few coast fights, in which the enemy have suffered, not we. But they threaten us now with a heavy invasion, and we are looking anxiously to see where the blow will fall. Texas is almost as difficult to invade as Russia, and the spirit with which her people have turned out in response to the general's last call, after the late glorious repulse at Sabine Pass, proves what they will do when the foot of the invader shall actually press our soil. Old men, boys, exempts—all rallied to the call—and as drilling has been going on for two years everywhere, they form a very strong and reliable force. The enemy will be met everywhere with the same spirit that led our Texans at Gaines's Mill, in Virginia; at Galveston; at Sabine Pass; at Val Verde, where odds were not counted, and the determination to overcome all obstacles resulted in the most complete success. Think of forty-two men at Sabine Pass, with six old iron guns, in an open work, whipping three splendidly armed gunboats—causing two to surrender, with some fourteen big guns and 400 prisoners; and one to run away, disabled—while the fleet, close at hand, had 17,000 men aboard, ready to land. The numbers are not exaggerated. I take them from the letters captured in a Yankee mail-bag, a few days ago. Well, when the time comes—as come it will, no doubt—I've got a double-barrelled gun and a couple of pistols, and I don't want my rank to shield me from exposure. W.

THE suffering among the prisoners is represented to have been terribly severe, especially among those who had not been provided with winter clothing by their friends since their arrival at the camp. Against such fearful cold the thin boards of the barracks were but poor protection. It is impossible to keep up or maintain fire sufficient to render the temperature more than endurable by those who are clothed in the woollen dress of the Federal soldiers, and it would be unreasonable to suppose that, with the thin garb adapted to the climate of their respective Southern States that the rebel prisoners could endure the intense cold from which the entire Northwest is now suffering. And should the fearful storm and cold continue for a few days longer, their numbers must be greatly reduced by freezing. Their condition is deplorable enough to excite the pity of every man and woman not hardened by passion and prejudice; and humanity at least would demand that the authorities adopt some effective measures for their comfort.—Chicago Times.

MR. HAYT, of Kansas, who was counsel for the notorious John Brown, in a recent speech at a public meeting, said:—

I have believed, I still fondly believe, that the sin of another St. Domingo may rise upon her, and a million of Toussaint L'Ouvertures, clad in the habiliments of war, and with vengeance written on their faces, and with desperate and triumphant stroke, dash to pieces the accursed South.

On which the Boston Courier, from which we copy the above, justly remarks: "We have never doubted that the moving spirit of fanaticism is one of hatred, and that the life of Abolition fanaticism is hatred of the South and not love of the negro. It is no 'spirit of health,' but a 'goblin damned.'"

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, February 3.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

IN all the monetary circles business has been greatly restricted through the outbreak of the war in Denmark. Throughout the week the feeling has been one of despondency, but to-day there has been rather less anxiety manifested, in consequence of the nature of the telegraphic news received from the seat of war, and rumours of a more favourable character. There is, however, much anxiety to ascertain the tone of the speech from the Throne on the opening of Parliament to-morrow. The demand for discount both at the Bank of England and out of doors is good, but without any particular pressure, the brokers, however, are not transacting business under the Bank minimum. The joint stock banks are not quite so well supplied with capital, the country banks keeping their resources short to the London market. On the Stock Exchange the demand for money is steady, and rates are well supported.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market has altogether assumed a better aspect; gold is again finding its way into the Bank, and the supplies to hand have been large. The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week is £332,000, whilst the withdrawals for transmission abroad have only been £21,000. The arrivals of specie have amounted to £1,168,194, of which £755,527 is from the West Indies, £115,476 from Port Phillip, and the remainder from New York. The Pera, which sails to-morrow for the East, will take out £316,023, of which £20,500 is in gold for Alexandria, £11,000 gold for Galle, and £3,669 gold and £65,000 silver for Madras, £208,936 silver for Calcutta, and £6,918 for Hong Kong. Silver has been rather less in demand within the last few days, and the price is nominally a shade flatter. Mexican dollars have been in good demand, but the supply is rather limited, and the price steady at previous quotations.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta, 22,00,000 rupees; to Bombay, 16,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum prices was declared as before—1s. $11\frac{1}{2}$d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. $11\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 140 lacs. Tenders at 2s. $\frac{1}{8}$d. will receive on Calcutta about 65 per cent.; on Bombay about 8 per cent.; on Madras, about 75 per cent.; and all above that price in full.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this stock has been quiet this week; with other speculative descriptions, prices have rather declined, chiefly in consequence of the threatening state of politics. The quotations for the last few days were 46 to 48, and little doing. The market closes thereat to-day.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock market has been sensibly affected during the entire week by the unfavourable intelligence from what must now be called the seat of war in Denmark. The dealers have shown but very little disposition to do business under the circumstances, and what transactions have taken place have been almost entirely of a legitimate character. From day to day prices have been declining, and Consols leave off this evening at $90\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ for money, and for the March account $90\frac{3}{8}$ to $\frac{5}{8}$, which, as contrasted with this day week, is a decline of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Exchequer bills remain steady at 10s. to 4s. dis. In the foreign stock market the same degree of inanimation has prevailed, but very little of a speculative movement has taken place even in those stocks which are regarded by the dealers as most inviting for such operations. Almost every thing is declining; within the week the fall in Greek stock has been $1\frac{5}{8}$ per cent.; in Mexican, $1\frac{1}{4}$; and Spanish Passives, $1\frac{1}{2}$. The last quotations this evening were—Greek $20\frac{3}{8}$ to $20\frac{5}{8}$; Mexican, $34\frac{7}{8}$ to 35; Spanish Passives, 32 to $32\frac{1}{4}$; Do. Certificates, $13\frac{1}{4}$ to $13\frac{1}{2}$; Turkish Six per Cents (1854), 88 to $88\frac{3}{4}$, and Do. do. (1862) $66\frac{1}{2}$ to 67.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Again the dealings in American government and railway Securities have been unusually restricted, the little progress lately made by the Federal forces having caused this class of securities to be greatly neglected. On the whole, however, prices have been fairly sustained. The dealings have comprised Virginia State Six per Cents at $30\frac{1}{2}$ and 31; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvanian Section, $78\frac{1}{2}$, $77\frac{1}{2}$, and $77\frac{3}{4}$; Erie, $100 Shares, all paid, $64\frac{1}{2}$ and $62\frac{1}{2}$; Do., Fifth Mortgage, 63; Illinois Central, $100 Shares, $90 paid, $21\frac{1}{2}$, $23\frac{1}{2}$, and 23 dis.; Do. do., all paid, 71 and 69; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway Bonds, $70\frac{1}{2}$, and New York Central Six per Cents, $63\frac{3}{4}$.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

In harmony with all the other departments, the British railway share market has been comparatively inactive, and prices have been steadily declining. All the leading descriptions are uniformly lower, and the market closed with little signs of improvement. The decline in Chatham and Dover, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and Metropolitan has been about 2 per cent.; in Bristol and Exeter, Great Eastern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Midland and Forth Eastern (Leeds) about 1 per cent., and in London and North Western, London and South Western, North British, North Eastern (Berwick), South Devon and South Eastern the fall has been $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In foreign railway shares business has also been very quiet, but although lower, the decline in prices has not been very material. For shares in undertakings connected with the British possessions there has been more inquiry, a fair amount of business has been transacted in them, and prices on the whole are fairly supported.

THE SPANISH AMERICAN DEBTS.

Messrs. Baring Brothers have caused the following official notice relative to the Spanish American debts to be posted at the Stock Exchange:—"Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. have received by this mail the following remittances on account of the Granada dividends: from the custom-houses of Santa Marta £979, Cartagena £400, and Sabanilla £221, making a total of £1,600. The Mexican mail just arrived does not bring any remittance on bondholders' account. The amount in deposit in Vera Cruz is now $23,492, and a further distribution of duties which have been in course of collection some time was shortly expected. The imports at Vera Cruz are considerable, and a fair amount of export duties may be expected. Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co.'s agents in Venezuela, under date of the 8th inst., advise having collected for the English creditors for 55 per cent. of the import duties for one week from the custom-house of La Guayra $18,647 43, and Puerto Cabello, $1268 88, making a total of $19,916 31. There is a heavy amount of import duties now pending at the custom-house, which have not been liquidated, owing to the holidays attending the season."

BANK MEETINGS.

At the second half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of Ireland, the report, which was adopted, stated that after making provision for bad and doubtful debts a gross profit of £7,818 had been realised, and after payment of all current expenses the net balance was £3,303, to which was added the amount brought forward from the previous half year, making the available profit £4,126, which was carried to the new account. The chairman stated that the progress of the bank had been steady and satisfactory.—At the first general meeting of the London Financial Association, a dividend was declared equal to interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the capital paid up, with a bonus at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, being together 18s. per share free of income-tax, and leaving £10,240 to be carried to the current half-year's account. The chairman announced that the directors have decided upon issuing 20,000 new shares at £4 premium, but it was the intention to call up more than £15 on the new shares till the same amount should have been paid up all round. The report was unanimously adopted.—At the first ordinary general meeting of the General Credit and Finance Company of London, the report furnished stated that the net profit on the six months' working, after deducting rebate, expenses, income tax, &c., amounted to £33,168, being at the rate of nearly $18\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum. Out of this £4,883 was applied to writing of preliminary expenses, £9,534 was carried to the next account, and £18,750 appropriated to a dividend of 3s. per share, being a fraction above 10 per cent. The report was agreed to.—At the meeting of the London, Birmingham and South Staffordshire Bank, the report, which was adopted, stated that the result of the bank's operations to the 31st December (embracing a period of about seven months) was a gross profit of £6,903, and after payment of all the usual expenses there was a net profit of £1,211, which the directors proposed to carry forward to the profit and loss new account.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the meeting of the Scottish Australian Investment Company, a dividend was declared for the past six months at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, less income tax. The chairman stated that the position of the company was most satisfactory; there was at present a considerable demand for money in Queensland, and if the board could obtain an adequate supply at 5 per cent. there would be 5 per cent. profit on it.—At the meeting of the Westminster Palace Hotel Company, a dividend was declared at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, out of an available balance of profits of £2,172, and carrying forward £222 to the new account.—At the second half yearly meeting of the United Kingdom Railway Rolling Stock Company, the report furnished stated that the amount to the credit of the profit and loss account was equal to the payment of a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum; but in the present early stage of the Company's existence it was thought better to carry a good balance to the current half-year's account. The dividend recommended was therefore at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, free of income tax. The report was agreed to unanimously.—At the half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Llanelly Railway and Dock Company, the report, which was adopted, stated that the earnings for the half-year have been £16,909, being an advance of £522 over the corresponding period of 1862. The net profits on the half-year was £7,799, and the amount applicable to a dividend was £4,449, which was appropriated as follows:—5 per cent. to the A preference stock; 6 per cent. to the B preference stock, and £1 5s. per cent. to the ordinary shares.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce markets continue to be adversely affected by both politics and dear money, and in every department transactions are of very limited extent, whilst quotations, although not subjected to any serious depression, have in several instances shown diminished strength. Exceptionally, the grain markets have become firmer on the outbreak of hostilities between Germany and Denmark. No real advance has, however, been established. Oil-cake is in steady demand, American barrels, £9 to £9 5s. per ton. The provision trade has not undergone very material change. American bacon sides sell steadily at 42s. to 46s. New long and short middles are held at 40s. to 41s., with a moderate demand. Fine qualities of beef are more saleable at 100s. to 103s. per tierce. for India mess. American butter is 2s. per cwt. lower, quotations now range from 88s. to 105s. Petroleum has not been influenced by the New York advices, and the market continues steady at 2s. per gallon for refined. Crude remains at £17 10s. per ton. Some small American orders for linseed oil are on in the market, and sales are making at 35s. to 35s. 3d. per cwt. Sperm oil remains out of demand, and is quoted nominally £74 to £75 per ton. Some forced sales of cocoanut oil depressed prices at one time as much as 2s. to 3s. per cwt., but there has since been a partial recovery, the closing rates to day being 45s. for Cochin, and 40s. 6d. to 41s. for Ceylon. Palm, after receding to 34s., is now making 35s. per cwt. The tobacco trade is generally good, but American imports are only in moderate request, and are easier in price. The cotton market shows an increased heaviness, with a decline of $\frac{1}{2}$d. to 1d. per lb. Dyestuffs are inactive. Safflower is firm, but cochineal has declined 1d. to 2d. per lb. For chemicals, ratesare much the same as last week, but sulphate of copper has sold a trifle under the late advance. Tallow is rather lower, the continental demand being to some extent prejudiced by political troubles. Scotch pig tin has receded to £3 2s. per ton. cash, but with this exception the metal market is firm. Spelter sold at £21 to £21 5s. Pig lead at £21 10s. and best selected copper at £116. Manilla hemp is dearer, £35 10s. being paid for Sorsogan. Russian is unaltered. Jute is depressed 15s. to 20s. per ton., and the market is dull as the decline.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Feb. 3.

OUR cotton market has been materially affected this week by the hostile state of affairs in Slesvig-Holstein, and the complications to which they may probably give rise. Buyers have, under the circumstances, been extremely guarded in their operations, and more disposition has been evinced on the part of holders to sell. Prices are generally rather lower, and there appears a tendency to increased depression. The sales this week have amounted to only 22,500 bales, of which 6,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 129,800 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 153,680 bales. There have been imported this year 84,010 bales, against 101,457 bales at the same time last year. The exports this year have reached 23,199 bales, whilst in 1863 they were only 18,518 bales. Taken for consumption this year 89,010 bales, and to the same time last year 69,260 bales. Taken on speculation this year 22,290 bales; and in 1863, 63,920 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 253,950 bales, and at the same time last year 406,160 bales. The latest quotations this evening were: American, $25\frac{1}{4}$d to $27\frac{1}{4}$d.; Fair Dhollerahs, $22\frac{3}{4}$d.; Egyptians, $27\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bahia, $25\frac{1}{2}$d.; Pernams, $26\frac{1}{4}$d. to $27\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maranhams, 27d. to $27\frac{1}{4}$d.; and Surats $15\frac{1}{4}$d. to $23\frac{1}{2}$d.

MANCHESTER, February 2.

Again we have had a week of extreme dullness in our yarn and cloth market which is causing millowners to curtail their production, in many instances to close their mills entirely, till such times as some prospect of a profitable result to working again shall turn up.

Hostilities having commenced between the Austro-Prussian troops and the Danes, coupled with the unfavourable tenor of the India news, tend to keep buyers out of the market, and scarcely any business has transpired during the week. Prices for all kinds of yarn and goods are taking a downward course, and in order to check this as much as possible producers are resorting to short time and closing.

The China telegrams up to the 25th December are to hand, and report very favourably of that market; but so far their is little disposition shown here, by shippers to that country, to enter into contracts.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

THE EVANGELICAL TRACT SOCIETY

OF THE

SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY,

DESIGNED

CHIEFLY TO MINISTER TO THE SPIRITUAL NEED OF OUR NOBLE DEFENDERS,

Is the Representative of all Denominations of Christians, who, through it, lay their Offerings of Piety upon the Altar of Patriotism, and lead the Soldiers of the Country to become the Soldiers of the Cross.

ITS HEADQUARTERS ARE PETERSBURG, VA.,
With Depositories in other Cities, and a numerous Corps of Colporteurs, occupied in Distributing Tracts to our Soldiers in the Army and in the Hospitals.

Organised July 18, 1861, the Society has, from that time to the present, been supplying each Army of the Confederacy with religious reading. About Thirty Millions of pages of Tracts have been distributed amongst our brave soldiers. The seed has not been sown in vain. Numerous letters from Chaplains, Officers, and Privates testify to the great good which has been accomplished, and show that the Society has been instrumental, to a considerable extent, in producing and sustaining the wonderful Revival with which God is now blessing our armies.

THE ARMY AND NAVY MESSENGER.

The Society's organ, is the most popular Paper in the Army. It has been recommended by General Lee, and by many other eminent Officers, who have contributed to its support. It is pre-eminently, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Paper, specially designed to interest and profit them, amongst whom it is gratuitously distributed.

When it is considered that the choicest portion of the country is found in the Army, which will, of necessity, give character to the Confederacy, and control its destiny for years to come, the importance of sustaining this Institution, which seeks to consecrate to CHRIST this mighty influence, cannot be over-estimated.

The expenditure of means it involves is very great, and we respectfully solicit donations for the Society and for "The Messenger," from all, everywhere, who have at heart the religious welfare of our Soldiers, and the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please send your contributions to Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., Liverpool, who will forward them to

AMERICA.

THE Federals are getting anxious about their position at Knoxville. They report that General Longstreet has been largely reinforced, that his cavalry is within four miles of Knoxville, and that that city is in a state of panic. It is rumoured that Athens and Florence, Alabama, have been attacked by the Confederates, and that in both instances the assailants were repulsed. Another item of intelligence, ascribed to Southern sources, is that the Mississippi is blockaded at Granville and Milliken's Bend by Confederate batteries. Meanwhile, as the Confederates will not lay down their arms, "Washington despatches still assert that a mutiny has occurred in Lee's army." Moreover the Washington authorities have got hold of President Davis's "body servant for twenty years," or what is more likely, have instructed a contraband to play the part. The intelligent negro gives graphic accounts of Mr. Davis's conversation. The colloquial style of the President, according to this veracious Sambo, is anything but polished, though remarkably frank and outspoken. He says that Mr. Davis will not have the roof of his house repaired as he intends shortly to quit Richmond. Such is the twaddle that amuses and deludes the Yankee nation, and which consoles them for the forced inactivity of their armies and the determined resistance of the Confederates.

It is said that Vice-President Stephens is seriously ill. We hope his malady has been exaggerated, and that he will speedily recover his health and strength.

We have often wondered whence the Yankees—not an imaginative though an inventive people—derived the inspiration of their horrible and disgusting anti-slavery fictions. The mystery is solved by the publication of the report of the official inspectors of the prisons and reformatories of Massachusetts. For once, even the New York Herald does not exaggerate in characterising the extraordinary practices brought to light as "immoral, brutal, shameful, indecent." The details are not fitting for our columns. It appears that men and women, boys and girls, some confined for no greater crime than nonattendance to the public schools, are subjected promiscuously to the indignity of a common washing-tub, in which the prescribed ablutions are performed without the slightest regard to age or sex. It is impossible to conceive a more senseless and wanton outrage on human nature. The accounts of the punishments, of the flogging of young women, &c., read so exactly like a page of an Abolitionist fiction, that we come to think the narratives of this class less imaginary than we had supposed, and begin to suspect whose pictures the writers of that school of literature are drawing when describing the "Legrees" of the South.

General Longstreet is reported to have remonstrated with the Federal General, Foster, upon the impropriety of clandestinely circulating the proclamation of amnesty amongst his forces. General Longstreet will find it much easier to beat the Yankee troops than to inspire Yankee officers with any gentlemanly feelings. It is not from fear of the consequences that the Confederate Commander objected to the circulation of the handbills, because, by the agency of the free press of the South, Mr. Lincoln's "Amnesty" has been circulated throughout the length and breadth of the land.

We find in the correspondence of the New York papers rather a fuller account of the proceedings that took place on the 9th January before the Vice-Admiralty Court at Halifax, in reference to the steamer Chesapeake. The conduct of the Hon. Judge Stewart, C.B., seems utterly inexplicable, according to any recognised code of judicial propriety. We are, be it remembered, taking a Northern and not a Southern version as our text. As soon as the court was opened, and before the case was gone into, the judge "took the ground that the seizure of the vessel, being primâ facie an act of piracy, and the original captors having violated our neutrality laws by surreptitiously entering our ports, and disposing in an illegal manner of a portion of the cargo, their right to the vessel was necessarily forfeited, and the vessel itself ought to revert to the Federals." We have heard of hanging a man first and trying him afterwards, but this is the first time that a British judge prefaced a trial by delivering judgment. Having thus disposed of the vessel, Judge Stewart observed, "the only questions that would remain would be those touching the infraction of British law, and the outrages of the Federal gunboat officer in seizing a vessel in British waters, and in taking and putting in irons the three men found on British possessions. But for these, the learned judge felt confident that the Federals would readily make ample apology and reparation, as they had always seemed anxious to do on former occasions." Mark the one-sided neutrality of the learned and hon. judge. The Confederates had violated, in his opinion, the laws of the country, and, therefore, let them be punished by the forfeiture of the vessel; the Federals have also violated the British law, but the judge is confident the Federals will apologise, and that is enough. Mr. Ritchie, the counsel for the Confederates, was not satisfied with the judgment, and told the judge that a claim would be made for the vessel by his clients. At this the Judge became angry, and curtly replied that he would not entertain any such demand. Mr. Ritchie then stated that the vessel was, in his opinion, a lawful prize to any citizen of the Confederacy, whether he held a commission or not, and as soon as taken possession of became a Confederate ship. She could not justly be returned to the Federals, because she did not belong to them. If such a thing was permitted the neutrality of the British Government was destroyed at once. The vessel was not brought into our ports as a prize. That could not be done, being contrary to law; but she came in for necessaries, without which she could not have proceeded on a voyage in any direction. He instanced the case of the Alabama and the Confederate vessels which had coaled in British ports, and been protected by the British flag. Mr. Ritchie added that he had had a personal interview with one of the leaders in the seizure, whom he knew to be in the Confederate service. That gentleman had entered the Confederate army early in the war, and served under one of its most distinguished generals; that for meritorious acts of bravery he had received the commission of lieutenant in that army; that he had twice been made prisoner, and that soon after his return from his second captivity he engaged in this Chesapeake venture. We hear from the Northern report of the proceedings that "the Advocate-General expressed opinions quite at variance with those of the court on several points," and that "the judge subsequently modified his opinions in some degree."

The correspondence between Earl Russell and Mr. Adams in reference to the detention of the steam rams in the Mersey will we trust receive due attention from Parliament. We have not fallen so low that the peers of England and the House of Commons will without a protest see our honour trampled on by a foreign Power, and the insult tamely borne by a pusillanimous Minister. Those who read the correspondence will not charge us with using unnecessarily strong language. On the 1st September, 1863, Earl Russell wrote to Mr. Adams in answer to letters of remonstrance of the 11th, 16th, and 25th July and of the 14th August. His lordship says, inquiries had been instituted about the rams, and the result of them was, that the Government was informed that the evidence adduced by Mr. Adams was mere hearsay evidence, "and generally that it is not such as to show the intent or purpose necessary to make the building or fitting out of these vessels illegal under the Foreign Enlistment Act;" that there was no evidence to show that the alleged French ownership was not true, and that "Her Majesty's Government are advised that they cannot interfere in any way with those vessels." His lordship promised to be zealous in preventing any infraction of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and concludes that "the Government would be blamed for acting in defiance of the principles of law and justice long recognised and established in this country."

Mr. Adams replied on the 5th September. He regrets that the Government have arrived at such a conclusion, and quotes the following passage from "one of their (the Confederates) late publications":—

> In the present state of the harbour defences of New York, Boston, Portland, and smaller Northern cities, such a vessel as the Warrior would have little difficulty in entering any of these ports and inflicting a vital blow upon the enemy. The destruction of Boston alone would be worth a hundred victories in the field. It would bring such a terror to the "blue noses" as to cause them to wish eagerly for peace despite their overweening love of gain which has been so feebly administered to since the opening of this war. Vessels of the Warrior class would promptly raise the blockade of our ports, and would even in this respect confer advantages which would soon repay the cost of their construction.

Mr. Adams then threatens us with hostilities, observing, "It would be superfluous for me to point out to your lordship that this is war." He states that he will not communicate "such further portions of my instructions as are suited to the case, lest I should contribute to aggravate difficulties already far too serious," and that he waits for more specific directions from his Government.

What was Earl Russell's reply? Did he tell Mr. Adams that it was the business of the United States to protect their harbours against the possible aggression of a single steam ram? Did he tell Mr. Adams that the threat of war would not induce the British Government to act "in defiance of the principles of law and justice long recognised and established in this country?" No; he succumbed to the threat, and on the 8th September sent the following reply to Mr. Adams' letter of the 5th:—

> Lord Russell presents his compliments to Mr. Adams, and has the honour to inform him that instructions have been issued which will prevent the departure of the two ironclad vessels from Liverpool.

Mr. Adams intimates, in a despatch to Mr. Seward, that the above note was telegraphed from Scotland, and therefore it is plain that, alarmed by the menaces of the United States minister, Lord Russell sent off an immediate reply to appease the Federal wrath. This circumstance also accounts for his lordship's ultra-warm neutrality in his utterances in Scotland.

The correspondence about the dismissal of Mr. Magee, the British Consul at Mobile, is likewise worthy of notice. It will be remembered that all Mr. Magee did, was to allow the shipment of some specie for the payment of interest due to British holders on a debt contracted long before the war; and which, upon the Northern theory that Alabama is still one of the United States, the Federal Government ought to desire to see paid. For this not very grave offence, if it is an offence, Lord Lyons addressed a most humble letter of apology to Mr. Seward. His lordship wrote:—

Her Majesty's Government has learned with great surprise and regret that a large sum of money was put on board of Her Majesty's ships off Mobile by Mr. Magee, the acting British Consul, and, in compliance with a requisition made by him, conveyed in that ship to Havana, and put on shore there. It appears that the money in question was placed in Mr. Magee's hands by agents of the State of Alabama, and was destined to pay interest, due to British subjects, and payable in London, on bonds of that State. But this circumstance has not affected the view taken by Her Majesty's Government of the transaction. They consider the conduct of Mr. Magee to have been entirely at variance with the duties of an agent of a neutral Power, and they have directed me to inform you that, on becoming acquainted with his proceedings, they have, without any delay, sent orders to me to dismiss him from their service. Her Majesty's Government have instructed me to say, further, that they greatly regret that any person in their employment should have been guilty of such conduct as that which has led to the immediate dismissal of Mr. Magee.

We quite believe that the interest of the British bondholders did not influence Her Majesty's Secretary for foreign affairs. We think, however, even if the dismissal of Mr. Magee was justified, which we deny, it was not necessary for Lord Lyons to eat so much humble pie. Did his lordship ever hear of the Trent outrage? Was the conduct of Consul Magee so flagrant as that of Admiral Wilkes? Yet Admiral Wilkes was not dismissed from the public service. It seems to be the policy of Earl Russell not to protect the interests of British subjects and of British commerce, but only to consider which is pleasing to the Federal Government.

Mr. Seward wrote a very angry despatch to Mr. Adams about the "the Cotton Loan," and instructed him to "give notice to Earl Russell that this transaction necessarily brings to an end all concessions, of whatever form, that have been made by this Government for mitigating or alleviating the rigour of the blockade in regard to the shipment of cotton and tobacco." We were under the impression that the only lawful blockade was a rigid blockade, and we thought that any relaxation of that rigour put an end to the blockade. We were not aware that it was in the power of any government to institute a mitigated blockade. This despatch was written on the 10th April, and as far as we know the blockade has not been more rigorous since then than it was before.

The Northern press is delighted with the diplomatic correspondence between the United States and this country. The New York Herald remarks:—"In the great result thus achieved, of bringing the British Government to a sense of shame and danger, we are amply compensated for the mortification involved in the surrender, at the haughty requisition of England, of those arch-traitors, Mason and Slidell." Another New York paper writes:—"Imperious as England habitually is in speech, yet there is not a nation in the world who is so completely, we may almost say so helplessly, tied to the policy of peace. She will not meet us in war, nor will she back down in her diplomacy; but save both her blood and her honour, by an agreement to arbitrate."

To show how cordially we are hated in the North, we will quote two passages that have lately appeared in leading journals. In an article on the Maori war it is observed, "The guerilla system of warfare is always tedious, and, if the British cling to it, the struggle may hold for years, and our rebellion may be crushed and the Union restored ere this conflict at the antipodes between civilised cupidity and savage patriotism is brought to a close." A leader on the Danish crisis thus concludes "From this brief resumé of the situation it can no longer be doubted that matters have reached a crisis in Europe which renders a long and sanguinary struggle inevitable. It will afford us some consolation and compensation perhaps for the trials to which we have been subjected by foreign countenance and aid that we shall have ended the war here just as the European Governments are entering upon theirs." Such are the sentiments of the people whom we are to conciliate at the cost of justice and honour. But such animosity is fed, not satisfied, by concessions.

In the Federal House of Representatives, on the 26th January, Mr. Fernando Wood made a speech in favour of peace. The subject under discussion was the repeal of the explanatory resolution that was passed with the Confiscation Act. Mr. Wood contended that to repeal a resolution that was substantially a part of the Act would be wrong, and he further argued that the Confiscation Act itself was unconstitutional and unjust. If the South was within the Union the Southern people could not be deprived of the protection of the Constitution; and if the South was out of the Union then a foreign war was being carried on and the Southern people were entitled to all the immunities which the law of nations recognises. Mr. Wood said he had proposed early in the session that there should be commissioners appointed to treat with the Confederate Government as other Governments had been treated with—England in 1815 and Mexico in 1848. He was told that this was rebellion and should not be recognised by the appointment of commissioners. Well, the United States had formerly treated with rebels—in 1786 with the Shay rebellion; in 1795 with the Whisky rebellion, when Washington and Hamilton were the commissioners, and in 1857 with the Mormon rebellion. Mr. Wood observed, "This war must cease. It was commenced without cause, has been prosecuted without glory, and will end in national impoverishment, disintegration and ruin."

Our New York correspondent furnishes an account of the progress of Mr. Lincoln's canvass for the next Presidency. He points out that the election of Mr. Lincoln is tolerably sure, inasmuch as he can control, as he has controlled, elections by means of the military, and that he is making further provision for a majority by the reconstruction of States. Our correspondent gives some particulars of the manufacture of State governments by Mr. Lincoln's agents.

Mr. Foote, of the Confederate Senate, has thought it his duty on several occasions to sharply criticise the proceedings of the Confederate Government. Therefore Northern writers have charged him with having Union proclivities. On the 7th January Mr. Foote said in the Senate:—

He had denounced all attempts at reconstruction, at all times, perhaps more strongly than any other member of this body. In this he had been perfectly sincere. To reconstruction he would not submit, even if this Administration were to make a reconstruction treaty. He preferred exile, death, torture, degradation, in their most appalling forms, to any political connection with those now in power in Washington city. Whenever a responsible person should accuse him formally of a criminality so monstrous, he should feel himself to be indeed disgraced if he did not make him sorely rue his temerity.

The Federal House Committee on elections, reported adversely to the claims of applicants for seats in the House from Louisiana. The report, written by Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, condemns the interference of the military in elections.

Another dodge is being tried to keep up the credit of the Federal Government. "Spirits" are being daily invoked to prophesy good things for the country, and the immediate crushing of the rebellion. On the 24th January there was a large gathering in New York, when General Andrew Jackson, through a medium, informed the meeting that their empire "should stretch from sea to sea—from Nova Zembla to Patagonia."

The Federal Senate has passed a resolution requiring members to take the new oath of allegiance. Senator Bayard, of Delaware, against whom this resolution was carried, took the oath, and then announced his intention of retiring. The Judiciary Committee has thrown out or discharged the resolution for the expulsion of Mr. Davis of Kentucky.

Senator Hale has asked for a committee to investigate the affairs of the navy. He stated from the returns before him that the sum wanted this year for the United States' navy was forty millions more than the sums expended by England and France during the three years and five months of the Crimean war. Senator Hale should recollect that English and French patriotism is not such a costly article as Yankee patriotism. In this country, and in France, loyalty does not depend upon fat contracts.

That distinguished patriot and fiery abolitionist, Colonel Fish, late Provost-Marshal of Baltimore and head-gaoler of General Schenck, has been consigned to the Old Capitol Prison at Washington, charged with corruption and fraud upon the Government.

The price of gold in New York on the 29th of January was 57 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

THE judicial committees of the Privy Council gave judgment on Monday last in the two cases of Williams v. the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, and Wilson v. Fendall. It will be remembered that the Bishop of Salisbury and Mr. Fendall had respectively instituted proceedings in the Court of Arches against the Reverend Dr. Rowland Williams, the Vice-Principal and Professor of Hebrew in St. David's College, Lampeter, and Vicar of Broad Chalke, Wiltshire, and against the Reverend Henry Bristow Wilson, Vicar of Great Staughton, Huntingdonshire. The former of these gentlemen was the author of the essay called "Bunsen's Biblical Researches," and the latter was the author of the essay entitled "Séances Historiques de Genève: the National Church;" and these essays were, perhaps, the most learned and the most bold of those which were published together in the famous volume entitled "Essays and Reviews." Certain passages in the above-named essays formed the ground for a prosecution in the Court of Arches; and in that court the prosecution was sustained, the judge (Dr. Lushington), finding that the accused had published and maintained certain doctrines and opinions contrary to the teaching of the Church of England. Each of the accused was condemned to suspension for one year ab officio et beneficio, was monished not to offend in like manner for the future, and was condemned to pay the costs. From this judgment the accused appealed to the Privy Council, and the argument was heard seven months ago before the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Lord Chancellor of England, the Bishop of London, Lord Cranworth, Lord Chelmsford, and Lord Kingsdown. On that occasion the appellants argued their own cases. The Queen's advocate, Mr. Coleridge, Q.C., and Dr. Swabey appeared for the respondents. It may be remarked here by way of preface that the accusation took the form of articles, consisting of the extracts from the Essays on which the prosecution relied, and such passages from the Liturgy and the Thirty-nine Articles as seemed to be denied by the extracts. On Monday, then, the Lords of the Committee before whom the appeals were heard were present, with the exception of the two archbishops, who did not concur in those parts of the following judgment which related to the 7th article of charge against Dr. Williams, and to the 8th article of charge against Mr. Wilson. The Lord Chancellor gave judgment. It was no part, said he, of the duty of the tribunal to pronounce an opinion on the character, effect, or tendency of the publication known by the name of "Essays and Reviews," nor was the Court at liberty to consider the whole of the essay of Dr. Williams or of Mr. Wilson. The judgment must be confined to the matter in the extracts before the Court. The book might, therefore, be liable to condemnation as of a baneful tendency notwithstanding the judgment. The proceedings were of a criminal stamp, and therefore precision and distinctness in the accusation was necessary. The Court had not to determine matters of faith, but merely what was by law settled to be the doctrine of the Church of England. That only was matter of accusation which was advisedly taught or maintained in opposition to the doctrine of the Church. The writer was only responsible for the conclusions directly involved in the assertions made by him. The charges against Dr. Williams were all rejected or given up except those contained in the 7th and 15th articles. The 7th article was based on passages in pages 60, 61, 77, and 78 of the book, and the accusation was, that Dr. Williams had maintained that "the Bible was an expression of devout reason, and the written voice of the congregation;—not the Word of God, nor containing any special revelation of His truth or His dealings with mankind, nor the rule of faith." Dr. Williams had not stated this in terms, but that the Bible "was an expression of devout reason, and therefore to be read with reason in freedom," and that it was "the written voice of the congregation." So speaking of the teaching in the Ordination Service on the abiding influence of the "Eternal Spirit," Dr. Williams said, "if such a Spirit did not dwell in the Church, the Bible would not be inspired;" and again, "the sacred writers acknowledge themselves men of like passions with ourselves, and we are promised illuminations from the Spirit that dwelt in them." Dr. Williams might reasonably contend that these passages meant this: "The Bible was inspired by the Holy Spirit that has ever dwelt and still dwells in the Church, which dwelt also in the sacred writers of Holy Scripture, and which will aid and illuminate the minds of those who read Holy Scripture trusting to receive the guidance and assistance of that Spirit." The words that affirmed that the Holy Spirit dwelt in the writers of Scripture refuted the interpretation that Dr. Williams meant to assert that the Bible was the composition or work "of devout or pious men, and nothing more." The charge, then, that Dr. Williams has maintained the Bible not to be the word of God nor the rule of faith must fail. Now as to the 15th article of the charge. Dr. Williams was an imaginary advocate of Bunsen against the accusation of Bunsen not being a Christian. The topics of defence urged by Dr. Williams against such a general charge, could not be regarded as the advised teaching of Dr. Williams. The 11th article of religion stated that "we are accounted righteous before God only for the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings." That article was silent as to the merits of Jesus Christ being transferred to us. Therefore it was not penal in a clergyman to speak of merit by transfer as a fiction, however unseemly such an expression might be in connection with the subject. Dr. Williams had explained that by the word fiction he meant the fantasy in the mind of a person that he had enjoyed merit by transfer. Nor did Dr. Williams assert that justification by faith meant only the peace of mind or sense of Divine approval which came of trust in a righteous God. On these grounds the judgment against Dr. Williams must be reversed. Then as to the charges against Mr. Wilson, of which only the 8th and 14th article remained. The 8th article of the charge involved the proposition "that it is a contradiction of the doctrine laid down in the 6th and 20th articles of religion in the Nicene Creed and in the Ordination Service of the Priests to affirm that any part of the canonical books of the Old or New Testament upon any subject whatever, however unconnected with religious faith or moral duty, was not written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost." The proposition that every part of the Scriptures was written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost was not to be found either in the articles or in any of the formularies of the Church. The framers of the Thirty-nine Articles had not used the word "inspiration" as applied to the Holy Scriptures, nor had they laid down anything as to the nature, extent, or limits of that operation of the Holy Spirit. The Court was unable to say that the extracts from Mr. Wilson's essay, which formed the subject of the 8th article of the charge, were inconsistent with the articles of the Church or the formularies to which the charge referred. Lastly, as to the 14th article of the charge, which affirmed that Mr. Wilson had declared in effect, that after this life and at the end of the existing order of things on this earth, there would be no judgment of God awarding to those men whom He should then approve everlasting life or eternal happiness, and to those men whom he should then condemn everlasting death or eternal misery; and this position was affirmed to be contrary to the three Creeds, the Absolution, the Catechism and the Burial and Communion Services. Now there was nothing in Mr. Wilson's words denying a judgment awarding happiness; but with respect to a judgment of eternal misery a hope was encouraged by Mr. Wilson that that might not be the purpose of God. The Court thought that it was not competent to a clergyman of the Church of England to teach or suggest a hope of a state of things contrary to the teaching of the Church, but Mr. Wilson was charged with advisedly declaring that there would be no judgment awarding either eternal happiness or eternal misery—an accusation not warranted by the passage extracted. Mr. Wilson had expressed a hope that those who, at the day of judgment, were not admitted to happiness might be so dealt with as that "the perverted might be restored" and all, "both small and great, might ultimately find a refuge in the bosom of the universal Parent." The hope that the punishment of the wicked might not endure to eternity was not at variance with the teaching in the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene Creed or in the Absolution or in the Burial Service. As to the Catechism, Commination Service, and the Athanasian Creed, there was not necessarily any declaration in the first on the point, and of the expression "everlasting fire" in the two last no interpretation was given. In the 42nd article, as appearing in the articles of A.D., 1552 (King Edward VI.), it was in effect affirmed that "all men shall not be saved at the length," and there was a condemnation of those who held that all "men should be saved after suffering pains for an appointed time." That article was omitted in the year 1562, and to sustain the judgment of the Court below would perhaps be to restore the article so withdrawn. There was not in the formularies referred to any distinct declaration requiring the Court to condemn as penal the expression of a hope that the ultimate pardon of the wicked might be consistent with the will of Almighty God. On the extracts before the court the charge was not proved. The articles then would be rejected without costs, but the appellants must have the costs of the appeal.

It is very worthy of observation that the archbishops objected to that part of the judgment which referred to the question of inspiration, but concurred in the remainder.

The case of the Attorney-General v. Sillim and others (the Alexandra case) came on appeal before the Court of Exchequer Chamber on Saturday last. The judges present were the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, the Lord Chief Justice Erle, and the Justices Crompton, Blackburn, Mellor, Williams, Willis, and Keating. It will be remembered that at the trial before the jury, a verdict was given for the claimants of the ship against the Crown, and that in Michaelmas Term the Attorney-General obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection by the Lord Chief Baron. The argument on the rule was heard in the same term, and in Hilary Term judgment was given by the Barons of the Exchequer. The Chief Baron and Baron Bramwell discharged the rule, holding that the direction at the trial was right; while Barons Channell and Pigott were of the contrary opinion. In order that an appeal might be made to the Exchequer Chamber, Baron Pigott withdrew his judgment pro formâ, and consequently judgment stood for the claimants of the ship. On Saturday, then, Sir Hugh Cairns appeared to argue on the appeal, and submitted a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the appeal, stating that he had given notice of the objection to the legal advisers of the Crown. The question was, what authority existed for the bringing of an appeal by the Crown? Before the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 there could have been no such appeal, but it was contended that a rule or order had been made by the Court of Exchequer to that effect on the 4th of November last. That rule had been made on the application of the advisers of the Crown before the rule nisi for a new trial was obtained. The rule, though apparently general in its terms, was framed to meet the case, and, therefore, the making of such a rule was a course attended with danger and inconvenience. That rule proceeded on an Act regulating the office of the Queen's Remembrancer, which extended the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act to the revenue side of the Exchequer. But those provisions had reference only to the powers of the Court over its own jurisdiction, and gave an appeal to themselves for new trials, &c., but gave no power and authority to establish new courts of appeal. That was a power that could be given only by Parliament.

The Attorney-General argued that this appeal was a step in the cause in the Court of Exchequer, and that Court must ultimately issue judgment after the decision of the appeal, and the Exchequer had full power to make rules for its own process. If the Court confirmed the objection the Crown and the subject would be without a remedy. By the old law there was a writ of error on the revenue side on a bill of exceptions, but the Chief Baron had refused to sign any bill of exceptions. The Lord Chief Justice said the Act expressly gave a power of appeal in all cases but this. If it had intended it, in all probability it would have been so enacted; the Attorney-General further urged that Parliament had given the Court of Exchequer a discretionary power to say whether or not in particular cases the power of appeal should lie, but the Lord Chief Justice said he never knew of such a power being given by Parliament to a Court. Sir Hugh Cairns replied, and the Lord Chief Justice said that revenue cases peculiarly belonged to the Court of Exchequer, and as the Court ought to see their way clearly judgment would be deferred for two days. On Monday, therefore, the Court gave judgment; and while three judges held that the appeal would lie, four were of the contrary opinion. Strangely enough, the three former judges were all of the Court of Common Pleas, namely, the Lord Chief Justice Erle and Justices Williams and Willis, while the majority were of the Court of Queen's Bench, namely, the Lord Chief Justice of England and Justices Crompton, Blackburn, and Mellor. It will be sufficient for the purpose if a concise abstract of the judgments of the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench and of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas be given, although it is to be understood that all the judges gave judgment. It may, however, be advisable to state the exact question at issue. The Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, which had reference to suits between subject and subject, provided that an appeal, with its ordinary incidents, should lie from any of the three Courts at Westminster to the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords, where a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection by the judge at the trial had been discharged. After this Act, which had in itself no reference to revenue cases, came the Queen's Remembrancer Act, the 26th section of which enacts that "it shall be lawful for the Lord Chief Baron and two or more Barons of the Court of Exchequer from time to time to make all such rules and orders as to the process, practice, and mode of pleading on the revenue side of the Court, and as to the allowance of costs, and for the effectual execution of the Act and the intention and objects thereof as may seem to them necessary and proper," and from time to time, by any rule or order to extend, apply or adapt any of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, and the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and any of the rules of pleading and practice on the plea side of the said Court to the revenue side of the said Court, as may seem to them expedient for making the process, practice, and mode of pleading on the revenue side of the said Court as nearly as may be uniform with the process, practice, and pleading on the plea side of the said Court." In exercise of the powers given by this section, the Barons of the Exchequer in November last, on the application of the Attorney-General made certain rules on the authority of which the present appeal was brought, and the validity of those rules was by Sir Hugh Cairns impugned. It was admitted on all hands that the words "process, practice," &c., in the Act, must be confined to the procedure of the Court itself, properly so called. But the main feature of the difference in opinion existing was whether the appeal could be taken to be part and parcel of the procedure of the Court, out of which issuing of process arose, and which had execution of the last process on final judgment, or whether it was something beyond and above and outside of the procedure of that Court. The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas held that procedure in a suit included the whole course of practice from such first process to judgment and execution. He analysed with much care the amendments in the practice of the Courts, introduced by the Common Law Procedure Acts, and also the provisions of the Queen's Remembrancer Act, and held that the power of the Barons to make orders as to the process, practice, and mode of pleading on the revenue side was not confined to the Court of Exchequer, but extended to the Courts of Error, into which suits should be brought from the revenue side of the Exchequer. He denied the allegation that the orders would subject suits to a ground of appeal which did not not exist before. The ground of appeal, namely, misdirection, existed before the Act and the appeal, was made by a bill of exceptions from the trial immediately to the Court of Error. It was only the practice that was changed. The orders, therefore, did not create a new ground of appeal. The Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, after reviewing the section of the Act already cited, said that the question was whether the powers given by the Act enabled the Court of Exchequer to create for the first time an appellate jurisdiction in their lordship's Court in causes relating to the revenue. He thought that the words "process, practice, and mode of pleading" could not be taken without a very forced construction to apply to the creating of an appellate jurisdiction where the cause had quitted the sphere of the inferior Court and had passed to the appellate tribunal. Who on appeal in a civil suit ever thought of speaking of the practice of the Court of Exchequer Chamber as the practice of either of the three Courts from which to its superior jurisdiction appeal lay? His lordship then gave numerous illustrations of the Court having its own rules of practice and of its not being regulated by the inferior Court. Yet the Court below had taken upon itself to prescribe and settle these provisions as though they formed part of its own practice. The two Courts were distinct, and a power to order the practice of the one was not a power to order the practice of the other. Where in the history of juridical legislation was such a thing ever heard of as the legislature leaving it to a tribunal to decide whether its authority should be generally subject to revision on appeal? Was it conceivable that Parliament would in a matter of such importance have delegated its functions to a court of law? It was not enough to say that because a bill of exceptions was allowed, therefore the legislature might have given power to the Court of Exchequer to superadd the proceeding by way of appeal. The answer to that was obvious, for nothing would have been easier than for Parliament so to enact—a few short lines, and the matter would have been at rest. The proceeding by a bill and by an appeal were distinct, for the former admitted of less delay, and the position of an appellant was also peculiar in case of disagreement on the point at issue. That the expediency of the appeal was doubtful might be inferred from the fact that it was only after an interval of four years from the passing of the Act, that the Court below had made the orders in dispute. His lordship then reviewed other sections of the Act under which in certain other cases an appeal was expressly given, and according to the well-known rule held that the express enactment in the particular case negatived the intention to extend the provision generally. He regretted that he was obliged to come to such a conclusion, partly because the proceeding by bill of exceptions appeared to have been given up on the belief that this proceeding could have been adopted; still more so, because, if he were right the opportunity would be lost of settling the construction of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The Court, however, could not be influenced by such considerations. He might observe, however, that the parties would not be prejudiced or delayed thereby, because, in any case, the matter would probably have gone to the House of Lords; and now, if that tribunal held their decision wrong on the question of jurisdiction, the case would still be heard by the Lords on its merits. In his opinion the appeal must be dismissed.

The case of O'Kane v. O'Kane and Lord Palmerston came again before the Divorce Court on Thursday last. A rule nisi had been obtained by the respondent, calling upon the petitioner to show cause why the petition should not be dismissed for want of prosecution, and the want of prosecution alleged consisted in the failure of the petitioner to furnish particulars of his marriage and of the adultery. The affidavits filed by the solicitors were summarised in our columns last week. At the hearing the Queen's advocate mentioned that on the part of the co-respondent he objected to the reading of any part of the affidavits not strictly bearing on the rule for the dismissal of the prosecution. Mr. Browne, on the behalf of the petitioner, called the attention of the court to the charge made by Mr. Horsley, the respondent's solicitor, that the petition was filed for the purposes of extortion, and, in answer thereto, read an extract from the affidavit of the solicitor to the petitioner explicitly denying the charge. Mr. Browne, then proceeded to say that though the petitioner in the affidavit was made to speak of an arrangement, in consequence of which he had retired from the suit, yet that it was not meant that the arrangement was made with either the respondent or the co-respondent, but with third parties unconnected with the suit. He also offered no opposition to the dismissal of the petition. The Queen's advocate stated that he was instructed fully and emphatically to deny that there had been any compromise whatever between the co-respondent and the petitioner. The judge ordinary said that the suit must be dismissed. The petitioner came into court with his complaint, and he now retired from it without any imputation upon either of the other parties to the suit, in consequence of what he called an arrangement with his friends. It was much to be regretted that a man should be able to attack the character of a woman whom he called his wife, but the remedy was to be found in the same publicity by which the evil was aggravated. The petitioner retired from the suit with the evil words still on his lips, and would probably meet with the censure of some and the contempt of many. The court could not part with this suit without one word respecting the co-respondent. It was a matter of great satisfaction to the court that a name never mentioned in England without just pride should have passed from its annals without a stain. The judge ordered the petitioner to pay all the costs.

A ship called the Flowery Land left London on the 28th July last, bound for Singapore, with a cargo of wine and other goods. Twenty persons sailed in her. The captain was one John Smith, and his brother George Smith sailed as a passenger. The first mate, Narwell, and the second mate Taffir, were also English. The carpenter was a Norwegian, the cook, steward, and a boy, a lamp-trimmer, were Chinese. There were besides fourteen seamen. Among these were English, Sclaves, Spaniards, Greeks, Turks, and mulattos. On the morning of the 2nd September last a portion of the crew rose in mutiny, killed the captain, the captain's brother, and the first mate. They spared the second mate, whom they ordered to steer for the river Plate, which he accordingly did. The murderers of course plundered and distributed the money, boxes, and goods of the murdered men. On the 13th September they threw the ship's papers overboard. On the 2nd October they sighted land. On that day the steward was killed, and the crew took to the boats after having scuttled the ship. The cook and the wretched lamp-trimmer were left on board and sank with the vessel. On landing, the second mate and Candereau, a Frenchman, gave information, and appeared before a naval court-martial. The crew were brought to England and eight of them were tried last week before Baron Bramwell for murder on the high seas. The Solicitor-General prosecuted on behalf of the Crown. The evidence adduced was that of the second mate, a boy named James Earl, Joseph Williams, a mulatto, and one Powell, a Sclave. Seven of the prisoners, namely: Watto, a Turk, Leon, a mulatto, and Blanco, Duranno, de los Santos, Marsolino, and Lopez, all Spaniards, were found guilty and condemned to be hanged. Carlos, the Greek, was acquitted, but was afterwards tried for scuttling the ship, convicted, and condemned to penal servitude for ten years.

The Irish people are assuredly the most bellicose of men. It is not enough that they should recruit the armies of President Lincoln in a quarrel with which they certainly have nothing to do, but already they are designing an intervention in the Dano-German conflict. A gentleman of Cork, well known from his professional abilities, his social eminence, and his success in the hunting field, has written to the King of Denmark, offering the services of a hundred Irish gentlemen in the war, the corps to be called the "Alexandra Cent Guards," in honour of the Princess of Wales. These heroes are all to be men of good position, to equip and mount themselves, to wear uniform of the national colours, and to exhibit the motto "Right against Might," thus exactly reversing the watchword of their brethren in the Federal ranks. To improve the idea, the projector has written to the Prince of Wales to ask his sanction for the movement. Sixty-four gentlemen have already agreed to take part in the enterprise, but the names are at present wisely concealed. A ball is to be given the night before the troop leaves, and on the following morning at six o'clock the men will mount and ride to Queenstown, where they will embark on board of a Danish frigate. Many horses have been purchased, and the uniform been has determined. Whatever be the success of the scheme, it will at least afford another opportunity for exercising the powers of the Foreign Enlistment Act.

THE CONTINENT.

Consummatum est. Providence has fought as usual on the side of the big battalions. For the moment, injustice is triumphant, and Germany is mad with enthusiasm at the success of the most monstrous violation of international law and pledged faith which the century has

of the Government toward the Government of France has been the opposite of conciliatory. Lord Derby agreed with the policy of withdrawing from the Mexican expedition, but then that necessity ought to have been foreseen from the first, and England should have taken no part in the enterprise. In the case of Poland, our remonstrance was not identical with that of the other Powers, and before we could receive an answer from St. Petersburg Earl Russell declared in the House of Lords that he would not under any circumstances go to war for the enforcement of his remonstrance. The Government of Russia having given Earl Russell "a decided rebuff," the noble lord told the House that "the Emperor of Russia had done a beneficent act towards his subjects." This pacific declaration was not made until France and Austria had joined in the previous policy of the British Cabinet, and consequently those Powers were compelled to share in our humiliation. The Emperor Napoleon's proposal for a Congress might be impracticable, but instead of curtly refusing it our Government ought to have recognised the beneficent intention of the Emperor, and ought to have declared its willingness to accept the plan of arbitration if the scheme could be worked. Then if the Congress had failed it could not have been ascribed to the hostility of England. Besides the uncourteous one of Earl Russell's despatch, it was published in the Times before it was communicated to the Imperial Government. "Now, if you treat great Powers with this utter disregard of their feelings and interest . . . how can you expect, when you are in a position of difficulty, and when you call on them, they will give you assistance and advice in cases not affecting their personal or national interests?" Earl Derby dwelt on the Danish question, and whilst admitting the difficulties that surrounded it, was clearly of opinion that, "with a little good judgment, a little good management, and a little good temper, it ought to have been settled without a frightful appeal to arms." He should shrink from a war between England and Germany "as one of the greatest disasters that could happen to this country," and therefore he hoped Her Majesty's Government would be able to assure the House that "we are not committed by the Government, on the one hand, to a disastrous quarrel with Germany, or, on the other, to a betrayal and abandonment of an ally who has trusted to our support." After censuring the policy of the Government in reference to Greece, his lordship declared his conviction "that the vessel of our State is in a most perilous position, that it is surrounded by breakers and dangers on every side," and that he had not "the consolation of being able to repose any confidence in the competence of the hands in which its navigation is now placed."

Earl Russell taunted the Earl of Derby with taking his wit from Shakspeare, and that "he borrowed his wit from his memory and his facts from his imagination," the noble speaker not perceiving that he himself was drawing on his memory for a very hackneyed witticism. With regard to Mexico, his lordship said that from the first the Government had declared that they did not go to war for the purpose of effecting any change of Government; and, therefore, when the object of the expedition was extended the British Minister was right in retiring from it. He had avoided war for Poland, because he deemed it dangerous and inexpedient, and he declared that England would not go to war on that question in order that the Poles might not be encouraged by false hopes. Respecting the proposed Congress, he denied that there had been any discourtesy. Having ascertained what were the principal matters to be discussed at the Congress, the Russian ambassador was asked what he supposed would be the course of Russia with regard to Poland, and the reply was that the Government of St. Petersburg would only maintain its present attitude. The Austrian ambassador was also questioned about Venetia, and replied that Austria would not listen to any proposal for cession or exchange. Therefore, the Congress must have led to war or to no results, and under these circumstances the invitation was rejected, not curtly but in two long despatches, in which the beneficent intentions of the Emperor were fully acknowledged. The noble earl then reviewed the Danish affair, commencing with the Treaty of 1852. He could neither defend the conduct of Austria and Prussia in invading Slesvig nor the conduct of Denmark in reference to the Constitution of last November. The English envoy, Lord Wodehouse, pressed upon the Danish Government the revocation of the Constitution, and he was supported by Russia, and also by Sweden, to the extent of urging the policy of conciliation to Germany. At first the effort failed, because, "most unfortunately, the Minister who then had for some time ruled in Denmark under the late king, although no doubt very patriotic in his sentiments, had most violent views in favour of the Danish people." The Minister referred to by Earl Russell is M. Hall, under whose auspices Denmark became the freest monarchy on the Continent, and who resigned because he persisted in asking for nothing more than an honourable understanding, that on an official promise, that if Denmark made concessions to the advice of England this country should guarantee that in the event of such concessions being used as a means of striking a blow at the integrity of the kingdom. Earl Russell explained to the House that he asked Austria and Prussia for a delay of six weeks, and that his request had been refused, and that afterwards he had proposed a protocol, recording, in the names of France, Great Britain, Russia, and Sweden, the intention of the Danish Government to promote the revocation of the November Constitution;" but the proposal was met by a "peremptory" refusal by Austria and Prussia. These Powers decided the necessity of not keeping their forces inactive on the Eider, and intimated that the advance into Slesvig was necessary to prevent revolution in Germany. The position of Denmark is peculiar. "She is between two parties, one of which says, 'We wish to have one great united Germany, and therefore let us go and attack Denmark;' while the other says, 'We wish to stop democratic agitation in Germany and keep things in their present state, and therefore let us go and attack Denmark.'" Ultimately, when it was apparent to Earl Russell that Austria and Prussia would not listen to remonstrance, the British Ambassador at Berlin asked the Prussian Government whether it adhered to the principle of the integrity of the Danish monarchy. The answer which Earl Russell read to the House is a rare specimen of diplomatic special pleading. M. Bismarck says the act of invasion is a recognition of the integrity of the Danish monarchy as established by the treaties of 1851-2; but if the Danes persist in refusing to accomplish the provisions of 1852 (it should be borne in mind that the great Powers had already agreed to guarantee this accomplishment, and therefore that could not be the object of the war,) that the King's Government will be compelled to renounce the combinations of 1852. Earl Russell remarked that the extent of our engagements to Denmark was sympathy and not mutual assistance; but "what the future may bring forth it would be rash for him to say." His lordship, in conclusion, commented on the constitutional struggle in Prussia, and said, "There may, perhaps, before long be a wise and earnest demand for this German Parliament, and it will then be seen whether this important question can be settled in peace, reason, and moderation, or whether Germany is to continue a great plague to itself, a great terror to other countries."

Earl Grey sharply criticised the Government policy. We have, in respect to Denmark, done too much or too little, and what we have done we have done too late. We ought to have warned Denmark from the first that she could expect no assistance from us, or if we meant to assist her it would have been better to have adopted a bold policy, to have called Parliament together at an earlier date, and to have placed a British army in Slesvig, for then the German Powers would have hesitated before invading the Duchy. He quite agreed with not going to war for Poland, but our interference in the way of advice was "most illusive and most mischievous." He also agreed in the rejection of the Congress proposed by the Emperor Napoleon, but held that the mode of rejection "was needlessly offensive to France." He deplored the war in New Zealand, which threatened the destruction of the Maori race, who, under a different policy, might be made the staunch friends of this country; and also that an enormous outlay should be incurred for a dispute about £20,000 or £30,000. He could not help complaining of the way in which the Speech referred to Japan. He sympathised with those who denounced the Federals for the attempt to burn Charleston before giving notice to the inhabitants to withdraw, but he thought that "the proceedings at Charleston were absolutely merciful as compared with those at Kagosima."

Earl Granville briefly replied on behalf of the Government. He repudiated the doctrine that we were not to give good advice because we were not prepared to back up that advice by material aid; and he explained that the publication of the despatch in answer to the proposal for a Congress in the Times before it was received by the French Government, was owing to a misunderstanding between Lord Cowley and M. Drouyn de Lhuys as to the presentation of it. Their lordships then agreed to the Address.

THE COMMONS. THURSDAY.—The Address was moved by Lord R. Grosvenor and seconded by Mr. Goschen, the new member for the City of London. The hon. gentleman acquired at Oxford a considerable reputation for ability and oratory, and his début in Parliament must have satisfied the sanguine hopes of his friends, for he succeeded in making his share in a formal proceeding pleasant and attractive. We think he did so rather to the displeasure of the Government whom he represented for the occasion; and we expect the astute Premier will give his political cadet due notice that it is not discreet to utter sentiments which provoke the cheers of the Opposition. Mr. Goschen said in reference to non-intervention, that "it did not seem to him necessarily a warlike policy, which contemplated the possibility of strong measures for the coercion of disturbers of the peace; or necessarily a peaceful policy, which, by laying down beforehand the doctrine of absolute non-intervention, almost held out a temptation to aggression," and seeing how this cut at Earl Russell's proceedings it is not surprising that it was loudly applauded by those who sit on the left of the Speaker. In reference to home affairs, Mr. Goschen did not wish to limit the sense of the paragraph in the Speech which congratulated the Parliament on the internal prosperity of the country, but at the same time he was sorry that the working-classes and the pauper population were living in almost "historical misery," and to them, therefore, such congratulations "might sometimes convey more irony than truth." However, he rejected the theory of Mr. Bright, that this misery was the result of class legislation, and those who endeavoured to breed discontent "appeared to him to be sacrificing the possibility of improvement."

Mr. Disraeli, who was received with loud cheers, like Earl Derby in the Lords, unsparingly criticised the foreign policy of the Government; and although the leaders of the Opposition in the respective Houses treated the subject from somewhat different points of view, yet the sentiments and conclusions were so identical that it proved conclusively that the Conservative leaders are in unison, and also renders it superfluous for us to give a lengthened note on Mr. Disraeli's brilliant and telling speech. The right hon. gentleman found all our foreign relations in utter confusion, and he asked as to the policy of the Government, "What are our objects, and who are our allies?" We had offended Russia by encouraging the Poles for months, and then we abandoned Poland when we found that Russia did not regard our threats. We surrendered the Ionian Islands to Greece, but clogged the concession with such conditions as to alienate the friendship of the Greeks. Having encouraged the Emperor of the French in a policy which towards the close of last year placed him in a difficulty, our Foreign Secretary rejected a proposition that was perhaps intended to tide over this difficulty, not with diplomatic courtesy, but with cynical criticism and a sneer. Turning to the question of the hour, to Denmark, what has been our course in that matter? Earl Russell wrote a despatch which was regarded in Denmark and in Germany as an encouragement to the German Diet to force on a Federal execution. On the last night of the last session the subject was brought before the House of Commons, and on that occasion Lord Palmerston declared that "the independence and integrity of Denmark was of great European interest, and that when the borders of Holstein were past, Denmark would find she was not alone in the quarrel." Though the Speech says nothing about it, the borders of Holstein have been passed, and he (Mr. Disraeli) asked, "Is Denmark alone?" How was the ambiguity in the Speech to be accounted for on such a momentous topic as the war in Denmark? It was that Her Majesty's Ministers had no policy and looked to Parliament to find one for them. Mr. Disraeli urged upon the House not to do so, for it was the unquestioned prerogative of the Sovereign to declare peace or war without the interference of Parliament and under the advice of her responsible ministers. Mr. Disraeli said, referring to an article that lately appeared in the Times, "It is only recently we have been reminded, not by the noble lord, but by writers whom he recognises as great masters of the English language, that affairs are carried on in a very satisfactory way, as far as the House of Commons is concerned; that the great departments are principally represented by under-secretaries; that nobody much cares what they say or what they do; and that the relations between the Government and the House of Commons are fast drawing to that satisfactory condition which subsists between members of the French Chambers and their master. Humiliate us if you like. Degrade us, if we must submit to it. But, at any rate, do not call on us to bear responsibility." The right hon. gentleman had no doubt Lord Palmerston would ask him why he did not say at once he had no confidence in the Ministry. When the papers were produced the opinion of the House would be challenged. If the policy of the Government should then appear to be clear and well considered it will be supported; "but," said Mr. Disraeli, "if they have no policy, if they are at this critical moment without allies, looking to the vague sympathies of Parliament to guide and support them, I say that they are taking an unworthy course, and that they are unfit for the offices which they fill and the place which they occupy; and if it is proved that that is the state of affairs I believe that Parliament will not hesitate to express its opinion upon their conduct."

Lord Palmerston, who, on rising, was loudly cheered by his supporters, began by remarking the unanimity of the Opposition, saying he should like to have heard other members besides Mr. Disraeli, but it appeared that "the gentlemen on that side of the House had given him (Mr. Disraeli) an unlimited proxy." His lordship defended the omission of all mention of America, and other affairs in the Queen's Speech, by saying that the Government views were perfectly well known, and that to have inserted them in the Speech would have been a vain repetition. He altogether denied that the Emperor Napoleon's proposal for a Congress had been rudely rejected, and, continued the noble lord, "Indeed, I can give the House the assurance, because I have had recent communication to that effect, that the relations between the two Governments are as cordial as they were before the correspondence." In regard to Mexico, the Government had looked without disfavour upon the establishment of a monarchy under the protection of France, and had stated fairly and candidly that "if the French Government could establish order and regular government in Mexico, even though that might be accomplished by a French army, we thought the step would be for the benefit of the people in Mexico, and for the advantage of all the nations of Europe having commercial intercourse with that country." Mexico, then, was not an instance of coldness and distrust between the two governments, but "an instance of confidence on our part, well deserved and well merited by the Government of France." The noble lord went over the same ground as his colleague in the Lords upon the Danish question, fully endorsing the policy of the Foreign Secretary. He described the despatch of M. Bismarck as "information from the Austrians and Prussians that they are prepared to declare that they abide by the treaty of 1852, and will maintain the integrity of the Danish monarchy in accordance with the provisions of that treaty." This announcement was naturally received with loud cheers. The noble lord was possibly not aware of Earl Russell's intention to read the despatch in the other House; and when, later in the evening, at the request of Sir J. Pakington, Mr. Layard read the despatch, its vagueness caused considerable surprise.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald congratulated Lord Palmerston on the adroit way he had avoided answering the objections of Mr. Disraeli. He believed "the policy the Government had pursued was justly stigmatised as ignominious throughout Europe." Mr. G. Duff said little or nothing about the question before the House, but made a speech in favour of the Germans and against the Danes. The hon. gentleman's arguments have not the gloss of novelty, and must have been rather unintelligible to an assembly not accustomed to German political metaphysics. Sir H. Verney also defended Germany, saying that "the only reason why the Germans of Slesvig-Holstein had not experienced the sympathy to which all oppressed people were entitled in England was because the Germans themselves acted the part of oppressors in Posen." Mr. Hennessey enlivened the debate with some reminiscences of court gossip of 1851, of the Government toward the Government of France has been the opposite of conciliatory. Lord Derby agreed with the policy of withdrawing from the Mexican expedition, but then that necessity ought to have been foreseen from the first, and England should have taken no part in the enterprise. When the papers were produced the opinion of the House would be challenged. If the policy of the Government should then appear to be clear and well considered it will be supported; "but," said Mr. Disraeli, "if they have no policy, if they are at this critical moment without allies, looking to the vague sympathies of Parliament to guide and support them, I say that they are taking an unworthy course, and that they are unfit for the offices which they fill and the place which they occupy; and if it is proved that that is the state of affairs I believe that Parliament will not hesitate to express its opinion upon their conduct."

Lord Palmerston, who, on rising, was loudly cheered by his supporters, began by remarking the unanimity of the Opposition, saying he should like to have heard other members besides Mr. Disraeli, but it appeared that "the gentlemen on that side of the House had given him (Mr. Disraeli) an unlimited proxy." His lordship defended the omission of all mention of America, and other affairs in the Queen's Speech, by saying that the Government views were perfectly well known, and that to have inserted them in the Speech would have been a vain repetition. He altogether denied that the Emperor Napoleon's proposal for a Congress had been rudely rejected, and, continued the noble lord, "Indeed, I can give the House the assurance, because I have had recent communication to that effect, that the relations between the two Governments are as cordial as they were before the correspondence." In regard to Mexico, the Government had looked without disfavour upon the establishment of a monarchy under the protection of France, and had stated fairly and candidly that "if the French Government could establish order and regular government in Mexico, even though that might be accomplished by a French army, we thought the step would be for the benefit of the people in Mexico, and for the advantage of all the nations of Europe having commercial intercourse with that country." Mexico, then, was not an instance of coldness and distrust between the two governments, but "an instance of confidence on our part, well deserved and well merited by the Government of France." The noble lord went over the same ground as his colleague in the Lords upon the Danish question, fully endorsing the policy of the Foreign Secretary. He described the despatch of M. Bismarck as "information from the Austrians and Prussians that they are prepared to declare that they abide by the treaty of 1852, and will maintain the integrity of the Danish monarchy in accordance with the provisions of that treaty." This announcement was naturally received with loud cheers. The noble lord was possibly not aware of Earl Russell's intention to read the despatch in the other House; and when, later in the evening, at the request of Sir J. Pakington, Mr. Layard read the despatch, its vagueness caused considerable surprise.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald congratulated Lord Palmerston on the adroit way he had avoided answering the objections of Mr. Disraeli. He believed "the policy the Government had pursued was justly stigmatised as ignominious throughout Europe." Mr. G. Duff said little or nothing about the question before the House, but made a speech in favour of the Germans and against the Danes. The hon. gentleman's arguments have not the gloss of novelty, and must have been rather unintelligible to an assembly not accustomed to German political metaphysics. Sir H. Verney also defended Germany, saying that "the only reason why the Germans of Slesvig-Holstein had not experienced the sympathy to which all oppressed people were entitled in England was because the Germans themselves acted the part of oppressors in Posen." Mr. Hennessey enlivened the debate with some reminiscences of court gossip of 1851.

The hon. gentleman informed the House that it was in reference to the Treaty of London that Lord Palmerston, then Foreign Secretary, wrote and sent off despatches without submitting them to the Sovereign; and that the late Prince Consort strongly disapproved the Treaty of London, and "thought that the rights and honour of the people of Holstein ought not to have been set aside and signed away by people who had no business with that part of the world." In reply to this, Mr. Gladstone severely condemned Mr. Hennessy for saying "it was notorious—the whole country knew it; in fact there was no motive for concealing it—that it was Her Majesty who had prevented the Cabinet from going to war." But the right hon. gentleman was mistaken, for all that Mr. Hennessy said had an obvious reference to 1851, though it naturally had an indirect bearing on the present aspect of affairs. Mr. Gladstone thought that until now Austria and Prussia had only sought to exercise a right in an unjustifiably harsh manner; but "in the event of any violent attempt being made to overthrow her rights it would not be Denmark alone with which those who made the attempt would have to contend." The object of this remark was to cover the observation made by Lord Palmerston on the last day of last session, that if the Eider was passed Denmark would not be alone. After an amusing speech from Lord J. Manners, and some observations from Sir J. Pakington and others, the debate was concluded by Mr. Kinglake, who of course went in strongly for Germany. He said, respecting the Treaty of London, that "the transaction was very much the same as if we had undertaken to give a reigning prince to the State of New York without consulting either the legislature of New York or the Federal Government." Is the author of "Eothen" and "The War in the Crimea" friendless? Will no one give or lend him an elementary history.

THE STATE OF IRELAND.

The COMMONS, FRIDAY.—On the report of the Address being brought up, Mr. Whiteside addressed the House at length and with great effect on the condition of Ireland. He explained the depression of the distillery interest, and the loss sustained by the paper-makers in consequence of the late legislation of the Government. He said that from 1841 to 1863 the number of emigrants from Ireland was 2,718,567, for which no "parallel is to be found in the history of any other country in the world." As a proof of the comparative neglect of agriculture, and that Irishmen did not leave their native land because is was not fruitful enough to maintain them, he observed that the area of the county of Cork is 1,849,613 acres, and of that only 481,655 acres are under tillage. Much of the distress is directly traceable to a bad theory of government, by which "every gentleman of property and intellect is to be excluded from the smallest share in the political government of his native country." Sir Robert Peel declared that Mr. Whiteside had exaggerated the amount of emigration, and that as only 1,400,000 had left since 1851, so many as 1,300,000 could not have left from 1841 to 1851. He also denied that the agricultural condition of Ireland was so bad as represented, but on the contrary, when "the royal Speech refers to the prospects of the country being on the whole satisfactory, of course the agricultural condition of Ireland is included in that general reference."

THE WAR IN DENMARK.

THE COMMONS, MONDAY.—In answer to Lord Cecil, Lord Palmerston said Her Majesty's Government had remonstrated with Austria and Prussia upon their conduct. The noble lord continued, "It was alleged for some time at Berlin that if resistance were made in Slesvig to the entrance of German troops, that resistance leading to conflict, that conflict would establish war, and war put an end to treaties. Now, we said in reply that that was a most preposterous doctrine—and if that doctrine were once established, any strong Power which had an inconvenient treaty with a weaker Power would have nothing to do, for the purpose of freeing itself from its engagements, but to commence an unprovoked and unjustifiable attack, and then say, war is broken out, and war puts an end to treaties, and thereby, by its own unprovoked and unjustifiable aggression, free itself from the engagements it had entered into. That is a doctrine which I am sure no government which had any regard for itself or for the principles of good faith can seriously appeal to. It would be an utter disgrace to assent to such a doctrine."

THE LORDS. TUESDAY.—The Earl of Malmesbury, who signed the Treaty of 1852, the negotiations for which had been carried on by his predecessor in office, so that both the great parties are not only generally but officially responsible for that compact, gave some noteworthy explanations in reference to the affair. M. Bismarck, who was then a Prussian Minister, approved the Treaty, and was personally responsible for the arrangements. Moreover it was Minister Bismarck and Minister Manteuffel who persuaded the English Government not to submit the Treaty to the Diet. The Duke of Augustenburg, in consideration of receiving the sum of £350,000, agreed, for himself and his family, never to interfere in the succession as arranged by the Treaty of London. The Duke thanked the English Government for their good offices, and pledged himself publicly and privately to maintain the Government. His son, the present claimant, at the time twenty-four years old, was cognizant of the compact, but did not protest against it or in any way express dissatisfaction. The Earl Malmesbury asked, "what shall we say on the point of honour to the Duke of Augustenburg's son?" The noble lord was assured the Government had allowed the matter to stride from a European to a German question, and he wanted to know "whether Her Majesty's Government have obtained any guarantee from Austria and Prussia that they will evacuate Slesvig as soon as the November Constitution is withdrawn? Also whether, in the event of these Powers considering their treaty obligations with Denmark abrogated by acts of war, they still hold their obligations to be valid, and whether Her Majesty's Government holds them to be still so bound to Great Britain to maintain the integrity of the Danish monarchy?"

Earl Russell said he had always maintained that the question of Slesvig must be considered an international one, for Slesvig was no part of the German territory, and other European Powers had a right to take such part as they chose in any question of the relations between Denmark and that duchy. The Government had received no assurance from Austria and Prussia that Slesvig would be evacuated as soon as the November Constitution is withdrawn. He did not consider the treaty in any way abrogated by the war, and "as Austria and Prussia were now violating the engagements of the Treaty of London, they were bound to Great Britain, France, Russia, and Sweden to maintain and respect the integrity of Denmark."

The Earl of Derby regretted the Government had not obtained an assurance from Austria and Prussia, and he hoped Her Majesty's Ministers had pressed for such a guarantee. Earl Russell replied the Government had not asked expressly for a guarantee, but assumed that when the November Constitution was repealed Slesvig would be evacuated.

In answer to the Earl of Carnarvon, Earl Russell said the papers were in the hands of the printer, and could not be printed in less than three weeks. If his lordship is really anxious to produce the papers we have no doubt the Government printers, by a little effort, can turn out half a dozen blue-books in as many days, and we do not suppose the Dano-German correspondence will make more than six ordinary blue-books.

THE DANISH PAPERS.

THE COMMONS. TUESDAY.—A scene of considerable excitement took place in reference to the production of the Danish papers, and the Government had an opportunity of learning the temper of the House. In reply to Lord Cecil, Mr. Layard said he was afraid the papers would not be ready for three weeks. This announcement was received with loud cries of "Oh! oh!" Later in the evening Mr. Fitzgerald returned to the subject. He asked, "What may not have happened in three weeks, when in the space of three days we have seen Slesvig overrun, and a gallant people beaten down by an overwhelming force?" He noticed that when it suited Earl Russell, his despatches were published with wonderful promptness. He appealed to Lord Palmerston to rectify this tortuous policy of the Foreign Office. After a few words from Mr. Layard, who promised the House the papers with every possible speed, Mr. Disraeli arose and spoke against the proposed delay. "If Her Majesty's Ministers did not see fit to assemble Parliament at an earlier date, at all events, the papers ought to have been ready when Parliament met. The Under-Secretary says 'he went to the printer to-day;' but he ought to have gone to the printer long ago. He ought to have gone every day and every hour of the day. He ought to have insisted that these papers should be ready to present to Parliament." He (Mr. Disraeli) assumed, for the credit of the Foreign Office, that the MS. was ready. "Then distribute the documents amongst several printers, and you ought to be ready to produce them in forty-eight hours. The House ought to insist that the papers should be circulated in forty-eight hours, or it is relinquishing the the fulfilment of its highest duty." The honourable gentleman was loudly cheered. Lord Palmerston, in reply, joked about the forty-eight hours, and promised that there should be no delay.

THE BURNING OF KAGOSIMA.

Mr. Buxton moved a resolution, "That this House, while only imputing to Admiral Kuper a misconception of the duty imposed upon him, deeply regret the burning of Kagosima, as being contrary to those usages of war which prevail among civilised nations, and to which it is the policy and duty of this country to adhere." After a long discussion, in which all parties concurred in regretting the burning of Kagosima, the resolution passed, the words imputing any blame to Admiral Kuper being omitted. Will the regret be followed by what restitution is in the power of the country?

THE TOWNLEY CASE.

Sir George Grey introduced a Bill to amend the law in reference to lunatic prisoners. By this Bill it is provided that only the visiting justices of the prison, assisted by medical officers appointed by themselves, can sign the certificate of insanity. In the Townley case, Sir George Grey admitted there was a miscarriage of justice, but denied that he was responsible for it. Mr. Locke could not see why, unless there is one law for the rich and another for the poor, Townley should not now be executed. Mr. Bright defended the course of the Home Secretary, and argued against the right and expediency of the punishment of death. Sir J. Pakington thought Sir George Grey was right in acting on the certificate of insanity, though it had been obtained by a trick; but when the trick was exposed and the prisoner proved to be sane, he did not understand why he was reprieved.

LONDON RAILROADS.

Mr. M. Gibson proposed to appoint a Select Committee of five to inquire into the best method of dealing with the Metropolitan Railway schemes, and that the Lords should be invited to choose five peers to form a joint committee. The estimated cost of railways projected within the metropolis, on which deposits have already been paid, is £34,000,000, and one quarter of the entire area of the City was scheduled for railway purposes. Mr. Crawford said this was a momentous question to commerce and to a large mass of the community. There would soon be nine railway stations in the City, and he contended that was enough. Mr. Massey cautioned the House not to sanction too many schemes or to proceed too fast. Railways constructed ten years ago were already obsolete. The way to relieve the traffic of the City was rather by making new streets and widening old ones than by multiplying railroads.

AMERICA.

THE LORDS. THURSDAY.—The Earl of Derby, commenting on the diplomatic correspondence just published at Washington, said, "Notwithstanding the concessions which the noble earl (Russell) has made to the Federal States of America in carrying out what he calls neutrality, but what I am afraid I must call one-sided neutrality, he has received from these States not thanks, because I believe that papers which have been laid before the Senate of the United States show that we were met by demands and menaces, which I should be much astonished if any one calling himself a British Minister must not have felt a difficulty in receiving when the despatches containing them were placed in his hands." His lordship hoped Earl Russell had sent an answer to the despatch of Mr. Seward, in which this country is threatened with all kinds of punishments unless we put a stop to the sale of such vessels as the Alabama, that there would be an end of such monstrous demands for the future. But it appeared that that despatch was received about the end of August, and "early in September the noble earl took the strong step of seizing the so-called Confederate rams in the Mersey upon that very suspicion as to which, a year before, the Attorney-General informed Parliament that the Government would not be warranted in interfering."

THE COMMONS. THURSDAY.—Lord Palmerston said the Government lamented the continuance of the war, and were determined to persevere in the same policy of neutrality. Mr. H. Baillie remarked that though Ministers always professed to be neutral, they had yielded to the threats of the Federal Government, and had connived at a breach of international law which helped the North and injured the South. He alluded to the paper blockade which this country, in violation of the Treaty of Paris, had acknowledged. The Federals, finding they could not make the blockade effective, had committed outrages on British ships and commerce which, in his (Mr. Baillie's) opinion, were worse than the Trent affair. Federal officers had been instructed to capture ships sailing direct from ports in this country to Her Majesty's colony of the Bahamas, and vessels so captured have been condemned in American prize courts. "The Memorial Diplomatique had pointed out the injustice of arbitrarily assimilating articles of commerce to contraband of war, of seizing a whole cargo on account of a few insignificant articles alleged to be contraband, and of capturing a neutral vessel going from one neutral port to another, under the pretext of an improper ultimate destination. This, however, seemed to be a matter of no interest to Her Majesty's Government." The flag of England no longer protects our commerce and seamen from outrage, but the Federals did not dare to so treat the flag of France. It had been argued that it was for the future interest of England to permit the fullest latitude to the construction of the law of blockade; but this was an error. Because we permitted the violation of that law of nations, could we insist upon other governments following our example? Mr. Whiteside reminded Mr. Gladstone of his declaration that the Southern leaders had made a nation, and asked how it was the Cabinet was not unanimous on the American question.

THE COMMONS. FRIDAY.—Commenting on Irish emigration, Mr. Whiteside said, "It is computed that within the last thirteen months 100,000 fighting men have gone to the States of America. Thus, it appears, that whole armies are going out to fight the battles of America, and while subtle lawyers are fighting sham battles in the law courts, and puzzling their brains to find out why a ship, which is but a mere log upon the waters until it is manned, should not be launched, the Americans are enlisting in Ireland, and inducing to go to the States, under great promises of high pay and remuneration, whole armies of men, of that stuff which in former times, on many a bloody field, defended your empire and maintained your glory." The reply of the Irish Secretary, Sir Robert Peel, cannot be charged with exhibiting any undue sentimentality. He said, "No doubt it is a sad thing to find men induced to leave their homes under false pretences, and on arriving in America forced almost to find employment in the armies of the Federal States. But we cannot order the people not to emigrate if they so please, and I maintain that it is far better for them to leave a country where it is impossible to obtain adequate remuneration for their labour."

Mr. Bentinck thought the Government ought to have told the House whether or not they intended to continue the recognition "of the paper blockade, which had existed for some time, and which was becoming every day a more completely absurd farce." He also was of opinion that the Government should inform the House what was to be done about the outrages on British shipping, and particularly as to the recent cold-blooded murder of the mate of the Saxon by a Federal officer.

Mr. W. E. Duncombe denounced the one-sided neutrality of the Government and the straining of the laws of this country by which "the Northern States had been favoured at the expense of the South." How long would the Government let this calamitous war go on, without, in conjunction with other Powers, making some effort to restore peace? A year ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared that the South was a nation, but as yet no step had been taken towards recognising the independence of the Confederate States. He blamed the Government for refusing the proposal of the Emperor Napoleon, "that the two nations should use their good offices between the belligerents; and he regretted this the more, because the Emperor in the Trent affair supported the British Government by representations which probably averted war between England and America."

THE LORDS. TUESDAY.—The Earl of Derby asked for correspondence in addition to that already laid upon the table. Earl Russell promised an answer on Thursday, but in the meantime refused to produce the correspondence about the rams, as the matter is about to be brought before a court of law. His lordship then explained that Mr. Seward's despatch of the 11th July, 1863, in which he threatened and bullied the Government with unusual vehemence, was not delivered by Mr. Adams; and that Mr. Adams, though alluding to this despatch in his correspondence, had "informed him (Earl Russell) expressly that he had not handed it to him." The noble lord therefore had not been called upon to answer it.

What a genuine Yankee trick! Mr. Seward lays the despatch before Congress, and so gets a little popularity by showing how he can insult this country, though he knows that the despatch was not delivered. We expect the true explanation is that Mr. Adams intimated to Earl Russell that he had such a despatch, but that he would not deliver it, if his lordship conducted himself to the satisfaction of the Washington Government.

THE COMMONS, TUESDAY.—In answer to Mr. Peacocke, Mr. Layard said the Government would not produce the papers in reference to the Alexandra, as the case was under judicial inquiry. In answer to Sir Hugh Cairns, Mr. Layard stated that Mr. Seward's despatch of July 11, had not been delivered. Upon this the following conversation ensued.

Lord R. Cecil—Do I understand the Secretary to say that no despatch from Mr. Adams to the Foreign-office, conveying the demands which Mr. Seward made, has been forwarded to the Foreign-office? and if there is no despatch, is there any memorandum of any verbal application conveying the same insolent demands?

Mr. Layard.—I have stated that although that despatch appeared in the newspapers, we have no knowledge of it; it was never communicated, and we cannot produce it.

Lord R. Cecil.—And was there no verbal demand?

Mr. Layard.—No verbal communication in that sense was ever held.

It will be noticed that Mr. Layard is careful not to commit himself to the statement that Mr. Adams had not informed the Government of the existence of the despatch of July 11th.

ARTILLERY.

THE LORDS, TUESDAY.—There has for some time been waged a very sharp warfare between Sir W. Armstrong and Mr. Whitworth, each of these distinguished artilleristsclaiming that his inventions are the best; and the matter was brought under the notice of their lordships by the Earl of Hardwicke. Earl de Grey and Ripon said that in 1862 some experiments were made at Shoeburyness, at which Mr. Whitworth's shells passed through the Warrior shield. The Government then, at the request of Mr. Whitworth, appointed a committee to further investigate the merits of the gun. This committee ordered a number of guns, 12-pounders and 70-pounders. The former had been delivered, but owing to the difficulty in getting the proper materials, or steel, Mr. Whitworth had not delivered the latter, and the Government would not adopt a new gun for the navy upon imperfect experiments. In the course of the discussion the Duke of Somerset said that "he had very little doubt that in a short time they would be able to send spherical shells through iron-built ships."

"DESPAIR OF THE SOUTH."

(From the New York Daily News.)

No less than seven journals of this city, on yesterday, commented on what they choose to consider the signs of despair in the Southern Confederacy. This is not the first time that premature peans of victory have gone forth from the North, and in former cases they have been the prelude to the most stubborn and active campaigns of the war. During the present interval of comparative military repose, the press of the two sections, being somewhat stinted of the accustomed food for excitement, naturally gives more rein to imagination, and follows up the themes best calculated to fix the attention of the public. The journals of the South, with the true American characteristic, launch forth the thunders of opposition against the policy and official conduct of their rulers. The journals of the North, whose habit of fault-finding, inveterate as it is, is not quite so much a ruling trait as the propensity to boast and be oracular, begin to draw air pictures with rosy tints, and read the sealed books of the future through the medium of their most sanguine hopes. But as the Fates work on at their relentless looms, regardless of even the simultaneous prophecies of seven oracles of the metropolitan press, we shall probably in time be startled from visions of Southern submission by the roar of Southern artillery and the shouts of Southern defiance.

In place of accepting the fierce denunciations of Confederate journals against the acts of their officials as evidences of infirmity of purpose or lack of heart, let us rather consider the nature of those acts that thus excite so much open opposition. It is the energy and determined action of the Confederate authorities that have given the complaining editors their cue. Decisive and strong measures on the part of a government will always intensify the antagonism of its opponents, in the same ratio that they encourage and increase the support of its adherents. There never was an administration, not even that of the pure and patriotic Washington, that had not its assailants. So in the Confederacy, the administration of Jefferson Davis is subject to this inevitable rule. The Southern press is divided between condemnation and justification of his policy; and in proportion as that policy is vigorous and energetic it is assailed by one party and applauded by the other.

But while the columns of the Southern press teem either with laudation or abuse, they exhibit no signs of disaffection to the cause. There is nothing in their most bitter invective that can be construed into a confession of despair. On the contrary, those journals that are the most abusive are at the same time the most emphatic in their expressions of repugnance to reconstruction. The very vehemence of their remonstrances against certain measures of their rulers is a proof that they are not in the submissive vein. Men that are broken-hearted, irresolute and despairing, do not criticise their political machinery with so much manly earnestness and spirit. As the Southern people mean to stand by their Government in the field, they insist upon their privilege of railing at its administrators. Hearty abuse is a symptom of pluck, and when the Southern press is silent upon the subject of their political affairs, then the North may argue that the spirit of resistance is broken.

But, while it is folly to deduce the signs of despair from the critical temper of the Southern press, it is wisdom to note the sign of strong will and firmness in those measures that gave rise to severe criticism. It is certain that the Confederate Government is arousing its utmost energies and preparing for hard fighting in the next campaign. Its armies, in their present condition, refute those worn-out theories of speedy submission that have so often been advanced and as often contradicted by the stern logic of desperate battles; and whatever may be heard from the tone of the Southern press, it is known, from the same source, that the strength of the Confederacy is about to be concentrated upon the military operations of next spring.

The efforts of the war press to represent the South as always upon the verge of submission or despair are not at all suggestive of their confidence in the war feeling of the North. It looks very much as if they feared that popular opinion needed encouragement, and that the prospect of a very early final triumph was essential to re-create the fire of enthusiasm. If Southern journals are profuse in their professions of determination and anticipated triumph, it is attributed to the necessity of sustaining their fainting spirits. If they are silent upon that theme, and steadily analyse the difficulties that surround them, too is made the evidence of despair. The South has already been subjugated a dozen times, in theory; but it seems that when the theories are most brilliant, the facts are least able to support them. If the South despair it is that kind of despair that stimulates exertion, and calls into action all the elements of resistance. It is that kind of despair that faces the threatened danger, and endures the actual misfortune. It is that kind of despair, a better fighting material than buoyant hope.

TREATMENT OF CONFEDERATE PRISONERS IN FEDERAL PRISONS.

THE following has been sent to us from Canada for publication:—

To his Excellency, JEFFERSON DAVIS:—

Humanity and justice to your captured officers require that you have their present situation told you. In the Western Penitentiary, Alleghany City, there are 106 of Morgan's officers, principally lieutenants. Since the escape of General Morgan they have all been separated, put in the condemned cells and kept there day and night. They are allowed to cook twice a week a small allowance of beef and a few cold potatoes. In the Penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio, there are a number of Morgan's officers, many of them of high rank in the army; my belief is that there are nearly 200. As soon as it was discovered that General Morgan was gone, they were placed in the condemned cells, which are so cold and damp and dark that they cannot see to read nor write on cloudy days. I will transcribe a part of a letter that I have been allowed to read from a Confederate major to his uncle. He writes: Since the escape of our General we have been kept in the solitary cells; these being 7 by 3½ feet, very cold, damp and dark, I could not write in the day. We were allowed a light from 5 to 8 p.m. It is by its feeble glimmer that I now write to you. Our clothes, goods and chattels of all kinds are taken from us. We are not allowed any newspapers, but they furnish us with items. The latest items of the last two weeks are that Bragg is totally routed with the loss of all his artillery and 18,000 men; that Meade has captured 25,000 men from Lee, and is now within a few miles of Richmond; that Wheeler is captured with 5,000 men; that Longstreet, after heavy loss, is completely surrounded and must soon surrender his whole force. Our promenade is on a plank six feet by one-and-a-half, on which I can take three short steps, then turn, and three more, until compelled from dizziness to rest—not for a long time, however, for the cold soon stirs me to a renewal of my exercise. Colonel Duke and the brothers of Morgan are in dungeons. At Johnston Island the prisoners are not allowed to receive any money, bibles, nor clothing, except from relations. The great proportion sent from relatives is stolen. The same punishment is at Camp Chase. By a refinement of cruelty, they issued an order that there should be no intercourse, even by letter, except with parents, brothers and sisters, as if such persons were in Yankee lines. You may safely act on this information; it is true. You will soon receive a messenger and a token that will confirm all that is herein contained. I cannot give my name nor write my natural hand for fear; should this be captured, I would suffer for having written it. General Morgan will know from whom this comes. I am the lady who, on the 28th of November, fastened his shawl with a black pin. Praying God to shield and protect you and the Confederates in every clime, I write myself,

A TRUE AND SINCERE SOUTHERN.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have heard from a reliable source that Colonel Duke and General Morgan's brothers have been placed in what the Yankees call the sweet box, an instrument of torture worthy of the Inquisition. It is a close box, so small that they have to stand with their heads bowed, can neither stand upright, nor can they sit down. These brave men are kept in this infernal machine for four hours every day, and then taken to their dungeons. If they are not soon rescued they will die.

THE SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES IN AMERICA.

THE auto da fe of Santiago has caused such a thrill of horror from one end of England to the other, that for the moment it seems to cast into the shade all contemporary events. If any help from us, any strong arm of safety stretched out across the wide Atlantic and the distant continent, could, by an impossible miracle, have snatched these victims from their doom, have rescued these 2,000 unhappy women, in the morning of the sacrifice rejoicing in their strength and beauty, in the evening an undistinguishable mass of blackened corpses, is it conceivable that such help would have been withheld? If, to put an incredible case, we could imagine some half-insane fanatic, who, regarding such a holocaust as a fitting atonement for an act of superstitious worship, would have refused to interfere to prevent it, had that been in his power, would not the common voice of mankind cry out upon such barbarous inhumanity as worthy only of the fiends of hell? And yet the special application which was made by the Prophet to David touches many of us very nearly here. The American civil war is a far more stupendous calamity than even this hideous accident of the burning in Chili. Its victims are numbered by millions instead of by thousands. Not within the walls of a church, but over a vast and once smiling region as large as Europe, is the scene of this tragedy. It is not consummated in the brief agony of fifteen minutes, but extended over a length of years in which a brave and dauntless people is being gradually exterminated by a process of slow torture. It is difficult to conceive how any man professing Christian sentiments or the feelings which are generally supposed to be common to humanity can look on unmoved at such a spectacle. We must suppose that those who tell us that it is neither our duty nor our interest to deprecate such a strife, because, forsooth, America might have been a terrible foe to England had she remained unmutilated, have hardly considered the full meaning of their advice, which boils its issues, from a motive even more unworthy than that of indifference, the cold barbarity of the Levite of the parable, who "passed by on the other side."

Since that long distant day when the fathers of our race, stern and heroic warriors migrated to this island from that same Schleswig shore which is now resounding with the tramp of armed hosts, no calamity comparable to the war between North and South has ever befallen the men of Anglo-Saxon birth. Twice in our civil wars has our nobility been all but exterminated, and in the middle ages the Black Death and other plagues swept off their tenantries from among those whom the sword had spared. But we might almost count on our fingers the thousandth of our country's defenders who have perished in the most disastrous of our foreign wars. We think we speak below the mark if we say that this most gigantic and most murderous of wars which is now raging everywhere from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, has, on both armies at the rate of half a million a year. Let us bring into the calculation the countless widows and orphans who are mourning for the dead, and in reckoning into the picture the wide desolation of a once fertile and happy country, the ruined towns, the deserted villages, the blazing homesteads, let us add to it the moral plagues, the cruelty, the lust, the unquenchable hate and fury, which animate the combatants, the development of the fiendish element, and the eclipse of all that is godlike in the breasts of the combatants, and we shall obtain a faint picture of this Pandemonium which has been made of the America which under such happy auspices was colonised by our kinsmen not many years ago.

The Federal Americans must surely have lost all hope of conquering back the allegiance of the South. It was just a year ago that a New York newspaper editor put plainly before his readers the sum of the advantages which had been reaped in two years of war. Is the picture any brighter now than at the time when the following description was given of the way in which the North was "avenging Sumter?" The sum total of the Federal loss being set at 460,000, that of the Confederates at 223,000, a comparison infinitely unsatisfactory to begin with, the writer continues—"But this is not all. We have spent almost two thousand millions more of money than they have spent. We have made 200,000 of our women widows, 1,000,000 of our children fatherless. We have destroyed the constitution of our country. We have brought the ferocious savagery of war into every corner of society. We have demoralised our pulpits, so that our very religion is a source of immorality and blood. Instead of being servants of Christ, our ministers are servants of Satan. The land is full of contractors, thieves, provost-marshals, and a thousand other tools of illegal and despotic power, as Egypt was of vermin in the days of the Pharaohs. We are rapidly degenerating in every that exalts a nation. Our civilisation is perishing. We are drifting into inevitable civil war here in the North. We are turning our homes into charnel-houses. There is a corpse in every family. The Angel of Death sits at every door. The Devil has removed from Tartarus to Washington." With the exception of the last statement, for the strict veracity of which we cannot vouch, this graphic description, when penned, was as true as it is terrible. If after another year of slaughter and misery we cannot add to it, it is because such darkness does not admit of a deeper shade.

Are we, then, tamely to stand by without so much as lifting up our voice against the continuance of this horror? While America is rushing to her suicide, are there none in England who will even call out, Hold! It cannot, we trust, be laid to the charge of this journal that its writers have been two unmindful of the sacred duty of recommending peaceful counsels, even when such advice becomes wearisome for its very sameness. We rejoice, too, to think that there are many in England who are heartily disposed to work in the same good cause. There are different ways in which they may aim at this end. There are those who, like ourselves, heartily sympathise with the Confederates in their struggle for independence—of such men has been formed the Southern Independence Association, which endeavours to put an end to the war by urging upon the European Governments the duty of recognising the South. It is possible, however, that there are many sincere friends of the North who desire a pacification as earnestly as those who confess to a contrary bias. To include all these there has been lately set on foot a "Society for Promoting the Cessation of Hostilities in America." Its object is by wide association, by petition, by the publication of papers, by enlisting in its cause the great mass of the clergy and ministers of the Gospel, to put all the moral pressure possible on the people and Government of England, the peoples and Governments of America, so as by some means or other to restore the blessings of peace to that distracted country. It is a good work, in which no man should wish to be backward. These societies are prepared to co-operate without jealousy. The only difference is, that the one is on a more enlarged and catholic basis than the other. Every man who deprecates the continuance of this miserable slaughter and havoc among those who speak our language, and are more or less related to us by ties of blood and kindred, must feel that it is not his duty to stand aloof any longer. We recommend every man of any position or influence to join one or other of these societies without delay, and to give at least his mite towards the furtherance of a humane movement.—Standard.

THE financial advices from America to-day show that the specie in the banks continues uninterruptedly to decline. The Government deposits have recently been kept up by the subscriptions to the last loan of £100,000,000, but these have now terminated. The weekly return of the New York banks presents another reduction of £161,000, and the total held being only £4,970,000, the question as to the possibility of the Government finding means to pay future dividends in gold is beginning to perplex a few persons among the financial classes, although the general public seem still to entertain perfect confidence with regard to it.—Times City Article.

ENGLAND has hitherto been regarded as a powerful State, and as possessing no inconsiderable moral weight in the councils of nations. That reputation has not, however, been gained by pursuing, irrespective of all circumstances, a policy of non-intervention. If England proclaims to the world that, notwithstanding her vast fleets and her well-appointed armies, no considerations will induce her to employ them unless she is personally attacked, it is plain that she will exercise no more influence in staving off a European war than if she were Madagascar. Is she prepared to make this extraordinary confession of narrow-minded selfishness?—Morning Post.

Movements in Tennessee.

AFTER a few weeks of repose during the inclement weather the armies of the South are once more in motion, and we may in all probability expect, before many days are over, the news of the commencement of operations on a grand scale for the expulsion of the Federals from Tennessee. The position of the Northern armies in the eastern portion of that State, though it possesses numerous advantages, if it can be securely held, is, in the present relative proportions of the strength of the two Powers, a source of undeniable weakness to the North. General Grant cannot afford to yield an inch of ground. Retreat from Chattanooga would be almost equivalent to giving up the contest; the abandonment of Knoxville would render Chattanooga untenable. The Federals therefore must hold on, trusting for supplies and support to their very lengthened line of communication; whilst the Confederates, perfectly safe from a blow, their communications open, and their supplies at hand, can gather their strength at any part of the enemy's line for a dash at his trains or even for a serious flank movement imperilling the safety of the invading army. It was very hastily assumed by the Federal organs in this city when Longstreet retired from before Knoxville, that the possession of Eastern Tennessee was fully secured to the Federals—that no new attack was to be apprehended from his army, and that the new base for operations in the spring against Eastern Virginia and North Carolina was thoroughly secured. Nothing could have been farther from the truth. Longstreet, after defeating the Federal army sent in pursuit of him, faced about, advanced, and took up a strong position within twenty miles of Knoxville, his cavalry scouring the country many miles in front, and on more than one occasion cutting off Federal detachments and outposts. Within the last two months this force has been considerably reinforced, and has now resumed the offensive. The latest telegrams from New York announce that a forward movement has commenced, that Longstreet's cavalry are within four miles of Knoxville, and that something like a panic is prevailing. But Longstreet's advance will not be unsupported. We hear from Federal sources that Morgan, the celebrated cavalry leader, is preparing an expedition on a grand scale, which is to pass through the Gaps on the eastern frontier of Kentucky, and operate, simultaneously with Longstreet's advance, upon the Federal line of communication with Knoxville. We are ignorant of the strength of Longstreet's command, but it is sufficiently strong to excite considerable uneasiness at Washington, and if it has reached the numbers ascribed to it by the New York press, it musters very little short of 40,000 men. The Federal army is at this moment at its worst. Many of its regiments have left the seat of war on furlough. It has been found necessary to grant the Northern army this indulgence. Many others are about to be broken up by the withdrawal of the three years' service men. The time, therefore, seems well chosen for a bold stroke, and this, we believe, will not long be delayed. The retrograde movement of General Johnson inspires this belief. The Confederate army under his command, whether forty miles or twenty miles from Chattanooga, is equally incapable of attacking Grant's superior force. Moreover, it has so long "subsisted" in the neighbourhood of Dalton, that its supplies of forage must have been obtained with great difficulty. A forward movement from Chattanooga cannot be attempted while Longstreet is menacing Knoxville, and even the flank of Grant's army. It is quite possible, therefore, that General Johnson has also supplemented the forces under Longstreet, and that the attack, whenever made, will be delivered with an overwhelming force. The retrograde movement of Johnson's army is in this way easily explained. Nor is the Federal army at Chattanooga left in perfect repose. The Confederate cavalry, under Generals Forrest and Stephen Lee—both able leaders of cavalry—are at work all along the Federal line of communication with the West. We hear of them at Florence and Athens in Alabama, and although the Federals in both places report their repulse, there can be no doubt that they did considerable mischief, and that when the Confederate accounts turn up large captures of supplies will be notified.

The chairman of the Military Committee of the Northern Senate, in a recent report, estimates the effective force of the South at 260,000 men, that of the North at 400,000. We will take his estimate as a fair one, and ask the English public if such odds warrant the presumptuous tone of confidence taken by the Federal press in this country. 400,000 men to defeat 260,000 men in the field, and subjugate half a continent, to hold the line of the Mississippi, to overrun Texas, to take Charleston, Mobile, and Wilmington, to beat Lee's army in the field and storm the defences of Richmond, to dispose of Longstreet and Johnson, and march through and over a population as bitterly hostile to them as were the Spaniards to the French when Massena retreated, or the Germans to the first Napoleon's troops after Leipsic. Can any one wonder that the Federal press in New York more prudent than the overzealous organs of the United States published in this country warn the Northern people against indulging in too sanguine dreams of early triumph, and point out to them the strength and the threatening attitude of the Southern armies. As an answer to the jubilant prophecies of the Daily News we will quote a few lines from the New York Times, a paper which has never before expressed a doubt as to the early termination of the struggle. "There is little doubt," says the New York Times, "that the spring will find the rebel armies heavily reinforced as the result of the present active measures. . . . . The military operations that will mark the spring campaign in the West are destined to assume a character of vastness and intensity that will outstrip all we have yet seen. . . . . General Grant's force should be doubled this winter, and if it is not materially increased, we may as well contemplate the possibility, at least, of our being compelled to give up even the region we now hold." And yet the English public is treated about once a week to long disquisitions on the demoralisation and starvation of the Southern armies; on the impossibility of retaining the soldiers in the ranks; on the certainty that Longstreet's and Johnson's and Lee's armies will collapse when threatened by the point of a Federal bayonet. The truth is on the side of the New York paper. This year's struggle will surpass those that have preceded it, in "vastness and intensity of character." Throughout the South President Lincoln's coldblooded message has had its effect, and there is but one resolve in every Southern State—to fight to the end. It is significant of the deferred hopes of the Washington Administration, that even Mr. Seward has given up fixing a day for the final triumph. He still threatens Earl Russell, and would seem by his insulting language almost to desire to stir the gentle temper of that nobleman into patriotic fury. Even he is no longer confident. Events in Tennessee have taught him a useful lesson. He postpones the crushing of the rebellion until the end of Mr. Lincoln's second presidency. With the Mississippi once more blockaded, with Louisiana, three or four strongholds excepted, at the mercy of the Confederates, with Tennessee still unconquered, and Lee's, Longstreet's and Johnston's forces co-operating for a great plan of campaign in the spring, he may well look abroad for a new deus ex machinâ to extricate him from his difficulties. For the position of the North is still so hazardous, that one great decisive defeat may awaken her citizens to their perils, their sufferings, and their humiliation, and close amidst the indignation of two great peoples the career of the worst and most incompetent Government the nineteenth century has seen.

Prospects of Parties.

THE personal popularity of Lord Palmerston is a phenomenon which perplexes foreign understandings and baffles English explanations. Indeed, if we were to put any faith in the latter, the bewilderment of the former would be extremely natural. Some of our political theorists seriously tell us that England, the most practical and common-sense nation in the world, trusts her destinies implicitly to the guidance of a single minister, merely because that minister is a vigorous, genial, agreeable veteran of nearly eighty. This is too absurd to be maintained for an instant, when we once begin to question the assertion. In the first place, it supposes a degree of imbecility or indifference in regard to their highest interests, which does not appear in any other manifestation of the opinions and feelings of Englishmen. It supposes that a people keenly alive to political interests, and not generally weakminded or enthusiastic, are willing to sink all political differences, and abandon themselves in confidence to the care of a single statesman, out of more admiration for qualities and merits which, after all, prove nothing more than the vigour of his constitution and the soundness of his digestion. In the next place, it reminds us of the very opposite fate of another octogenarian statesman, a man of far higher intellectual calibre than Lord Palmerston, who nevertheless held but one office, and that only for a short time, and who never exercised any real influence on the course of national policy. Lord Lyndhurst was an older man than the present Premier; he was as vigorous, hearty, and energetic; he was a great orator, while Lord Palmerston is actually a bad speaker; he possessed one of the finest intellects of his generation, while Lord Palmerston never displayed any higher talents than are implied in a sound practical judgment, a remarkable administrative efficiency, and an unrivalled skill in parliamentary strategy. Yet, outside of the circle of politicians by profession, no one knew or cared much for Lord Lyndhurst, while all England likes, respects, and trusts Lord Palmerston. It is plain, therefore, that Lord Palmerston does not owe his authority and influence merely to the accidents of age, good health, and good temper. Nor can we agree with those who think that he represents the real character and feeling of the nation, on any subject whatever. So far as the vigilant maintenance of our honour abroad is concerned, he was once held to be more thoroughly English in his policy than any of his rivals; but this has ceased to be the case since the Foreign-office has been filled by Lord Russell. In regard to domestic policy, he is a far less true representative of the temper of the nation than the late Sir G. C. Lewis on the one side—who fairly embodied the views of the Liberal section of the educated class—or Lord Derby on the other, who is the natural leader of the Conservative gentlemen of England, and of their powerful following among the commercial and agricultural classes.

But Lord Palmerston is the only man who unites the three great qualities necessary to the composition of a statesmanlike character. He is a man of great practical sagacity; he knows what the policy of England is and ought to be better than any man living. He is a man of quick tact; he catches the tone of public feeling, and understands what the country wants and will have, and, since the death of Sir Robert Peel, he has almost a monopoly of this valuable endowment. And what is of still more importance, he is the only man on either side of the House who is capable of forming a foreign policy, instead of waiting to have it formed for him by the press and by Parliament. Sagacity, tact, and independent judgment are qualities which, in combination, will always give a man weight and influence in public life; and Lord Palmerston owes much to his possession, and still more to his rivals' lack, of these qualifications. He owes, also, a good deal to accident. He was trained in the old school of statesmen, which existed before the Reform Bill, when the Government really governed, originated, and controlled the course of national policy in a manner that has been impossible since 1832. Whatever its faults, that system certainly tended to produce men of stronger will and clearer views than can arise under the present régime, in which the Cabinet waits on the House of Commons; and Lord Palmerston is the last of the statesmen whom it produced. Again, he has the advantage of a long official experience in the most important of all administrative posts, and in that which it is most essential for a premier to understand. Parliament can repair the errors of domestic administration, but the blunders of the Foreign-office are irretrievable. And, finally, Lord Palmerston has this personal advantage: that, while only one man of distinguished ability among the statesmen who are comparatively unattached to party refuses to serve under him, there are several who would refuse to serve under any other premier whatsoever.

Thus, Lord Palmerston has two advantages which no rival or successor can possess. He is trusted by the country, which believes him capable of dealing with any emergency in foreign politics, and knows itself competent to deal with any other. And he is able to form a stronger administration, in point of Parliamentary talent, than any other statesman could form. And therefore, while Lord Palmerston leads them, the Liberals are masters of the field. They may be ejected from office over and over again, but so long as their chief is the man to whom the country looks in any serious peril, so long they will always tend towards Downing-street, and no mere blunder in legislation or in government can long exclude them thence.

But it is plain that this influence with the country—this gravitation towards office—is personal to Lord Palmerston. It is not the inheritance of the Liberal party. On the contrary, they have recently shown a strong tendency in the opposite direction. They are disposed to revive questions which the country would like to be left at rest; they are a party of movement in a country which desires stability; they have, moreover, taken up certain crotchets about finance and foreign policy which the country does not approve, and which, in the event of any serious excitement, it will angrily repudiate. Their two ablest men, moreover, both have personal defects which render their tenure of office precarious. Lord Russell has a talent for blundering and quarrelling which, if he were not continually overruled and protected by Lord Palmerston, would send him, ere a month was out, into the cold shade of opposition. Mr. Gladstone has a passion for logical completeness and correctness which fits him rather for aggressive criticism than for financial administration. For, in the first place, the commercial community, which is very illogical, lives in constant uncertainty as to his future intentions; and uncertainty is the one thing which commerce cannot endure or forgive. In the second place, he has too frequently shown himself ready rather to make an enemy than to mar the symmetry of a budget. These are not faults of that kind which debar a politician from office; but they require that he should be supported in office by a power and popularity greater than his own. Except Lord Palmerston, no Liberal premier could sustain the weight of Mr. Gladstone's willfulness and Lord Russell's incapacity; while a Liberal ministry would hardly dare to exclude Lord Russell, and could not stand for a week against the attacks of Mr. Gladstone, if he were left at liberty to criticise its policy.

It is sometimes said that the country would be uneasy at seeing Lord Malmesbury at the Foreign-office and Mr. Disraeli at the Exchequer; and there may be some truth in this. But the country would be still more frightened if Lord Russell were left in the Foreign-office without the superintendence of Lord Palmerston; and there is a large number of influential men to whom any chancellor of the exchequer in the place of Mr. Gladstone would be welcome. The country would be very uneasy at the loss of Lord Palmerston; but it would bear the loss of all his colleagues with amazing equanimity. Apart from him, they have no influence with the nation. While he leads them, they remain in or gravitate towards office; when he leaves them, all parties will be left to stand of their own intrinsic strength or fall by their own weakness.

The Liberal party has no doubt certain elements of strength. It has the prestige of a virtual monopoly of office for seventeen years. It has the traditional influence of Lord Palmerston's name. It has another advantage, derived from the authorship of the Reform Bill—a number of close boroughs, which it contrived to spare in 1832. It has the most brilliant orator and the most scientific financier in the House of Commons. But it has in it elements of terrible weakness. In the first place, its present cohesion is artificial. Sixty or seventy of its members are not Liberals in a practical and party sense—that is, are not men on whose votes a Liberal Government could confidently reckon—but Radicals, with objects of their own to carry, and indifferent, save as the feasibility of these objects is thereby affected, which party may be in power. A hundred and more are Liberals only by accident, and agree in reality with nearly every article of the Conservative creed. They were born Liberals, or they wanted to get into Parliament, and found the Liberal party—then the Palmerstonian party—predominant in the place where their influence lay; or for some similar reason they professed Liberalism when to be a Liberal merely meant to follow Lord Palmerston, and not by any means to hate the Church or to desire the ballot. These men gravitate towards Conservatism, and when they resign or die their seats will be filled by Conservatives. Even now, Liberalism gains no recruits; and in Lewis and Lord Herbert it has lost the only two chiefs who could ever have commanded a national following.

We should have added, had we written this article last week, that the Liberal party had no young men of talent or promise. We cannot say so now. The new member for the City of London, cannot be five-and-thirty, and is therefore, as politicians go, a very young man. His speech on the Address was one of the best speeches of its kind we ever heard, and gave proof of qualities which must command for Mr. Goschen a very high place indeed among the rising generation of English statesmen. It was not only a good speech—many men may make good speeches who will never do anything else—it was a speech which displayed precisely those talents and endowments which make a statesman. There was the power of clear, dignified, graceful and definite expression; every one can understand exactly what Mr. Goschen thinks and why he thinks it. There was a tact in hitting the taste of the audience which was marvellous in a maiden speech. There were spirit, energy, and decision, as might be expected from a young and ambitious man; but there was also a maturity of thought, a range of commercial knowledge, and a measured calmness of expression on exciting topics, which few men learn until youth has long been passed. Nothing could have been better directed to hide the fatal blot of the ministerial programme than the spirited language of Mr. Goschen about Slesvig; nothing more suggestive or more terse than his remarks on the commercial prosperity of England could have been uttered by Mr. Cobden or Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Goschen is a godsend to the Liberals, for he brings them precisely what was wanting to give them a hold on life—a possible future. They have now one man who may reasonably expect to be alive and working fifteen years hence who is capable of becoming, with experience, a real and first-rate statesman. Nevertheless, there are few even among themselves who doubt that the party is doomed speedily to suffer a long and dark eclipse.

The Radicals are strong only for obstruction. It is not merely that they entertain views opposed to those of the country; for if that were all, a change in public opinion, or even a deadlock in Parliament, might bring them, at least for a time, into power. Nor is it that they want men of parliamentary capacity; for Forster, Cobden, Bright, and Stansfeld will bear comparison in that respect with any four Liberals or Conservatives. It is that they are chained to the policy of two men whose transcendent abilities make it impossible to do without them, while their political insanity—for it is no less—makes it impossible to place them in office. The Radicals are nothing without Bright and Cobden; and neither Bright nor Cobden can, under any conceivable circumstances, be tolerated as leading ministers. No one, even among the staunchest Radicals, dreams of putting either of them in the Foreign-office, the Colonial-office, or the War Department; much less could either of them be tolerated as premier.

The practical contest, therefore—though liable to be confused and perplexed by the intrusion of this abnormal faction, which, having no hope of office, has no responsibility in action and no scruples in Opposition—must lie between Liberals and Conservatives. We have shown what are the advantages and weaknesses of the former party. Their opponents, also, have many elements of strength, combined with one or two elements of perilous weakness, cropping out here and there at most inconvenient moments, and making their course in opposition uncertain, and their tenure of power unreliable. They are the party whose principles are now ascendant, and are likely to be so for years to come. They are pretty sure to have, before long, a decided majority in the House of Commons. They have an overwhelming preponderance of rising talent, in Parliament, at the bar, and nearly everywhere else. Against the solitary hope of the Whigs in Mr. Goschen they have to set Lord Carnarvon, Lord Stanley, Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, Sir Stafford Northcote, and Lord R. Cecil; the last two of whom are likely ere long to hold a position in Parliament second only to that of the respective leaders of the Liberals and Conservatives. On the other hand, they want unanimity and mutual reliance. Except Lord Derby, there is no chief whom they could cordially acknowledge; and yet Lord Derby failed to keep order in his own Cabinet, and two of its most conscientious and respected members went out on a question on which the country, only a few weeks afterwards, almost unanimously decided against them. Except Mr. Disraeli, they have no man who could lead the House of Commons; but nearly a third of their number distrust and dislike Mr. Disraeli, and cannot be depended upon to follow him, unless when he has on his side the prestige and authority of office. And what is worse still, the Conservative feeling in the country is not a feeling in favour of the Conservative chiefs. Lord Derby awakens respect, esteem, admiration, but not enthusiasm; Mr. Disraeli, though he is not regarded with that suspicion and mistrust which liberal newspapers pretend to discern in the public judgment of his character, is yet not the chief whom the nation would have chosen. He puzzles them much as Mr. Gladstone puzzles them, and for much the same reason. Both these remarkable statesmen are destitute of political instincts; both of them form their judgment of political right and expediency by a purely intellectual process; and consequently both of them are apt to come to conclusions in which the nation does not agree, and each of them always reaches his conclusions in a way in which the sympathy of the nation does not go with him. We think that Mr. Gladstone suffers more from the former disadvantage and Mr. Disraeli from the latter. Mr. Gladstone, besides being at variance with the people in his conclusions, is often at variance with himself; Mr. Disraeli is always consistent, and very often in accord with the country. On the other hand, Mr. Gladstone sometimes contrives to chime in with the feelings and awaken the sympathy of the nation; Mr. Disraeli is rarely, if ever, able to do this. This is his defect, and the misfortune of his party. It is not that he is dishonest, or vindictive, or selfish, or insulting, or a mere "intellectual gladiator." He is the reverse of all this. He is a man eminently sincere, as he proves by his most unpopular crotchets about the Jews. He is most loyal as a party leader; most conciliatory as a leader of the House; most courteous to, and consequently most beloved by, the young men of his party. He has never, in his whole political career, begun a personal quarrel; he has never deserted a friend or betrayed a principle that he understood. But he does not feel as his party feels, nor think in their manner of thinking, and therefore their sympathies fail to follow him. He is an Englishman because he was born in England, and a Conservative because he believes Liberalism to be a mistake; but he is not an English Conservative by nature and temper, and therefore, though the acknowledged leader of the Conservative party, he is not the natural chief of Conservative England.

If he were, he would be in office now, and for his lifetime. As it is, he must come into office ere long; and it is probable that in office he will be much more popular than in opposition. The personal spite displayed by his adversaries, his own good temper and courtesy, and the quiet good government which distinguishes the reign of a Conservative administration, cannot but tend to raise his credit with the country, as well as to confirm and secure his authority with his party. If this should be the case, and we expect that it will, the possession of office will tend to repair the worst defect in the structure of the Conservative party, and may secure its ascendancy until, as must happen in the course of time, Liberal principles shall again resume their hold upon the mind of the English people.

Entail and Primogeniture.

ANY attempt to make the mysteries of a science intelligible to the popular mind, usually results in increased obscurity. If the science has a history in which it loves to bury the secrets of its origin, growth, and nature, the study of it becomes an act of devotion. If to a tradition and a mystery a practical character is attached, so that there is a close relation of the science with the men and things of modern life, the complication is more embarrassing. Yet when violent attacks are made on systems sprung from political and social peculiarities, moulded by unexpected exigencies, and entangled with the specious claims of natural right, and when wild misrepresentation is the offensive instrument, risk of obscurity must be encountered in the endeavour to exhibit a system and refute a fallacy.

Mr. Bright has headed a furious onslaught on primogeniture and on entails. Of the objects of an amendment of the law, as professed, and of the results as anticipated by him, we will speak presently, but our course will be made clearer if at the outset a brief explanation be afforded of the meaning of these words.

What then is an entail? Undoubtedly it is possible in England to discover estates which answer to the popular idea of an entail: that is to say, estates which follow a particular line of descent, from which they cannot by any conceivable process, except failure of issue, be diverted. Such is the case with the Shrewsbury estates, which, by an Act of the legislature, follow the earldom. Examples are, however, excessively rare, and the effects of them on the general condition of real property in this country are utterly inappreciable. Let us suppose, now, that an estate is given or bequeathed to A. and the heirs of his body, then in the eye of the law A. is said to be seised of an estate in fee tail, or in ordinary phrase, the estate is entailed on A. and the heirs of his body. If, then, A. have sons, grandsons, and issue following them in unbroken order, all these persons, in the absence of any Act designed to destroy their succession, will be seised of a like estate. Now the notion is, for we speak of the ideas of the uninitiated, that a break in the continuous entail is either impossible, or, at least, a a matter of enormous difficulty. Perhaps to such persons the assertion may seem strange, that in the time of Henry III. the heir was completely in the power of his ancestor. Such a result of the struggle against feudalism roused, indeed, the barons to a sense of their position; for it was plain enough that if a complete right of alienation were acquired, not only was the interest of the lord in the rent and services of the holder of the estate compromised, but he was cut off from the possibility of again obtaining the land on failure of heirs. To remedy this peril, a law was passed in the reign of Edward I., restraining all alienation of estates held in fee tail, and for two hundred years the ingenuity of lawyers was vainly taxed to evade these restrictions.

At length, in the twelfth year of the reign of Edward IV., an artifice, which was a mere solemn piece of judicial jugglery, was invented, and by means of a process called a "common recovery," the tenant in tail was once more enabled to dispose of his lands as if he had held them in fee simple. Finally, in the year 1833, this cumbrous machinery was swept away; and now, by a simple deed, executed by the tenant in tail and enrolled in the Court of Chancery, entailed estates may be disposed of with as much facility as estates held in fee simple.

Such, then, are the powers of alienation possessed by the owner of an entailed estate, but it would be an error to imagine that the regular descent of such estates without any intervening change is, as a rule, maintained. On the contrary, by a custom which is little less than a law, these entails are broken up after an existence of about twenty-five years, and a fresh entail is substituted. This system is carried into effect by the machinery of "settlements," and it must be most carefully remembered that nearly all the landed property of the noble and gentle families of England is held in strict settlement. Indeed, no great error would be committed if the land so held were estimated at two-thirds of all the land in England. Now the object of a settlement is simply this: to give to every living person who is to take under the settlement a life interest in the property, and to give an estate in fee tail to the eldest son of the last tenant for life, in the order of succession. Thus, supposing that the estates of the Stanley family were put in strict settlement. Then the Earl of Derby would be made first tenant for life, his eldest son, Lord Stanley, second tenant for life, and the eldest son of Lord Stanley, as yet unborn, would be made tenant in tail. Now supposing that a son is born to Lord Stanley, when that son is of age, he, with the consent of the tenants for life before him, can destroy the entail. This will be done as a matter of course, and thereupon the Stanley estates will once more be put in settlement; the son of Lord Stanley will become the third tenant for life, and his eldest son as yet unborn will be made tenant in tail. The operation will be repeated at the manhood of each eldest son of the house in succession, the estate thus being tied up during the lives of all the beneficiaries in existence, and twenty-one years afterwards. As a matter of fact, then, it will result that the entail will never endure for twenty-five years, for the law absolutely forbids the giving of any estate to the child of an unborn child. Thus, then, it is abundantly clear that so far as concerns a very large portion of the landed property of this country, primogeniture is a custom consecrated by the determined resolution, or rather the general consent, of English families, and not a law. But it must not be supposed that a settlement is content with the bare declaration of the descent of the inheritance. It does not throw all the landed property into the hands of the heir, freed from every encumbrance; on the contrary, it effects charges of capital sums on the estate for existing younger sons, and it grants powers to charge for the benefit of future offspring, and powers to jointure wives. It goes even further. The enormous inconvenience of rendering land inalienable, so that the property cannot be dealt with by sale or exchange, can readily be imagined. The spread of wealth and the increase of population demand building ground, commercial enterprises seek in the market for lands teeming with mineral products, and to prevent the sale of land is to cut off the estates from all adventitious aids to the wealth of the family and the improvement of the land. Consequently trustees are appointed by the settlement, and to them the power is given, with the consent of the person in possession to sell any part of the lands, and to lease on long terms, and with the purchase money to buy other lands to be included in the old settlement. The result, therefore, of the present system is, that, as a rule, the entail does not endure for more than twenty-five years, and that all parts of the estate are at all times saleable. Moreover, the power of the tenant for life receives a check, calculated, on the one hand, to preserve the integrity of the property, and on the other to facilitate sales of it. He cannot mortgage more than his life interest, therefore he cannot permanently injure the estate. On the other hand, nothing makes property so unmarketable as a bad title, and a bad title is merely the result of a complication of mortgages. This complication cannot exist in settled estates, for the encumbrance ceases with the life of the encumbrancer. Therefore, in reality, lands held in strict settlement are more marketable than lands held under any other tenure.

Primogeniture exists, however, under another condition. If the owner of an estate held in fee simple dies intestate, the land will, of course, go to the eldest son. The justice of this descent is matter of contest. But in point of fact the quantity of land which descends to the eldest son by intestacy is ludicrously small compared with that which passes under a will or a settlement. However, the origin and the idea involved in the law of descent to the heir are not unworthy of attention. If we are contented to accept the solution of this question offered us by Mr. Bright, we shall admit that feudalism is the foundation and the mainspring of our present law, and that "the destruction of that law would be the abolition of feudalism with regard to the land of England, and the redemption of the agricultural labourer throughout the United Kingdom from that poverty and serfdom which, up to this time has been his lot;" we shall say with him again, that "this state of things is maintained for the very reason for which it was established, 800 years ago; that there may be in this country a handful of persons, twice as many, perhaps, as there are in this room, who are the owners of nearly all the land in the country, and in whose hands is concentrated all the power," &c. The theory bears on the face of it a strong semblance of truth; and we may observe that it was on it that the French regenerators of 1793 founded the total abolition of their ancient law of inheritance—a precipitate act, which modern France will shortly endeavour to remedy. Unfortunately for the world the fiery regenerators of France were not at the same time very logical; and we—at least in England—have grown to a suspicious habit of examining with some scepticism all general theories advanced by that party; we may, perhaps, fight for an idea, and we may, under certain crises, amputate a limb on a theory; but to fight for a wrong idea is ridiculous, and to amputate on a mistaken theory is insanity. Now, if we examine the matter impartially, we cannot help noticing that it is at least very remarkable that a custom which has thriven in a single spot of earth for 800 years, according to Mr. Bright, which in its very essence requires stability and continuance of tenure, which requires the objects of its privileges to be well-nigh as much attached to the soil as the ancient adscripti glebæ or more modern villains, should have been part and parcel of a purely military system; in fact we suspect that a modern Hindoo would be less startled on being told that the law of primogeniture was an inherent part of our military system in India than would an early Saxon, Franconian, or Swabian, on hearing the same asserted of their original feudal system. In times unencumbered by nepotism and red tape, and keenly alive to the value of warlike ability, it would surely have appeared monstrous that the destinies of a nation should run the risk of depending on the success of some young hair-brain, some coward, or some cripple. And it is a relief to find that the history of the earlier part of the dark ages by no means requires us to make so mean an estimate of our ancestors' mental capacity. Thus, in Germany we find an elected chief (as was also, either in fact or in form, the head of every European kingdom then existing); a continuous change of owners in the margraviates and counties, or, as we should say, now in the commandants of frontiers and of inland fortresses; and even, in some of the more remote parts of the empire, where the pressure from without was most severely felt, an elective knighthood. In France we find a remarkable state of confusion: younger brothers contending, often successfully, with their elders, and great feudatories suddenly sinking into insignificance on the desertion of their followers to a stronger and more capable leader; while in England, in spite of the precautionary oath of allegiance exacted by the Conqueror, we may observe that even that great chieftain was succeeded by three kings, all of whom took their crown by their own strength or astuteness in direct opposition to any such law as is suggested.

Theory and history, then, alike forbid us to suppose that the custom of primogeniture was a part or even a consequence of feudalism. The origin which we would suggest for it in the place of Mr. Bright's is one which we submit to be more attractive and more suitable to the genius of the Anglo-Saxon race. It rests on the fact that the leading idea in the early Teutonic mind (and among Teutons we may fairly include the Franks, who certainly crossed the Rhine but few years before, A.D. 500,) was the preponderance of family ties over every other species of association. This, although so abundantly proved by the statements of classical historians and the researches of modern archæologists as to require no confirmation from us, has scarcely been allowed to proceed to its legitimate consequence, as affording us the first principles on which the modern English system of inheritance is founded. For it is evident, that just as we cannot conceive the idea of the circumference of a circle without a mental reference to the centre, so it is impossible to appreciate the idea of family without referring it at once to its head or centre. There is nothing in modern times that can illustrate this peculiar position unless, perhaps, it be the now fast expiring clanship in the Scotch Highlands, among a race differing in origin, but with some striking similarities of custom to those of our Teutonic ancestors. Differing from the feudal chief on the one hand and from the member of a Roman house on the other, the head of the Teutonic family was alike an abstraction and a personification of the unity of his family, of its influence, importance, and strength. The family being the "social unit" of that system, he was the legitimate representative of it in the councils of the people. The several minor influences that all conduced to make up this feeling have each of them impressed upon it their peculiar mark. Thus we find in it the natural affection between father and children, the reverence for blood-relationship, involving the pride in the chastity of their women so peculiar to the Teutonic family, and the pride of race, which identified the humblest clansman (if we may here use the word) with his ancestral chief. Now, where every man chose to make his influence felt rather as a member of a family than as an individual, where family rights were regarded with peculiar indulgence and even reverence, and where the circumstances of the case had modified and limited the personal functions of the head so as to make his actual capabilities a matter of minor importance, no method could have been imagined for perpetuating a state of things so satisfactory both to chief and to clansman, or so congenial to their tempers and wishes, as the system of inheritance by primogeniture.

But the chief of the family had another function. Besides being the representative of it to all outside, he was also what we might call the trustee for all its property, which he might apportion out according to the needs of his dependants, and receive back at their hands for the purpose of similar grants to others. Now, there is only one species of property which is compatible with this object: precious metal (of which there was little) must be expended, flocks and herds and other provisions would be consumed, land alone can be taken, made use of, and returned without any diminution of its value. For these reasons it was highly necessary that the chief of every family should be the owner of all land belonging to it, and that the sole power of temporarily disposing of such land should descend with the dignity of chief. It must be observed how distinct this power was from that in a feudal lord of granting fiefs; the difference (and it is important) lying in this: that whereas the feudal inferior received his land as a favour, for which he made a certain return by military service, the clansman took his as a right accruing to him as a younger brother of the family.

We suppose, then, that the social system of the Teuton races was based on the principle that the eldest son should succeed to the place and privileges of his father, and also to his landed property. We may next observe how the military system of feudalism arose by the side and independent of such a social system. Feudalism was evidently an arbitrary invention, the work of some skilful brain, by which a conquering people were enabled to maintain their grasp. The principle of it was simply this: the chief of a conquering army committed to some one of his lieutenants the care of a certain fortress or district, assigning to him as his salary the life-ownership of the surrounding lands. The lieutenant collected a garrison of the best soldiers he could find, to whom, in his turn, he assigned as salary such portion of his lands as their respective merits warranted, reserving to his own use so much as he thought fit. Each of these soldiers might again, if he chose—or more probably as a condition of his tenure—divide his portion among bowmen or others, to attend him on garrison duty. We have already remarked that in this system there is not only no need for, but an absolute exclusion of, any idea of inheritance, which might put a stripling in the place of the veteran commander, a coward in the place of the soldier or knight, or a cripple in the stead of a sturdy man-at-arms. But it cannot surprise us that during the times of comparative peace that followed on the subjugation of a country, the garrisons, with their commanders, should have forgotten the peculiar conditions on which they held their lands, and reverting to the principle of inheritance innate in their minds, have desired to establish these as the laws of their new acquisitions. We have thus a satisfactory clue to the various disturbances above mentioned to have taken place in the feudal times, and which were, in fact, merely the struggles between the natural principles of inheritance and the arbitrary system of feudalism. They ended, like most struggles, in a compromise, whereby the feudal conditions were retained; but the principle of inheritance admitted subject to those conditions. But the contest was long, and the compromise very gradually effected. In England, for instance, it was never fairly and legally admitted until the 13th century.

The remaining history may be briefly expressed, as it is ground that we have already travelled in examining the power of alienation of property. The two principles bound together in the compromise above spoken of, like a healthy man chained to a corpse, had an existence neither comfortable to themselves nor satisfactory to their neighbours. The dying remains of feudalism stank in the nostrils of many Englishmen who were ready enough to accept the other principle as of their own nation and spirit. One by one, chains that bound the two together have been broken; one by one the rags of feudalism have been stripped off; so that here, in the nineteenth century, we are able to recognise that the principle on which our earliest ancestors founded their social policy, which has come down to us through so many ages and so many vicissitudes, is in fact the very same idea of family affection and pride which we hope we have retained in all its early brightness, while we have also enlarged and developed until it includes well nigh half of this globe as members of the English family.

But Mr. Bright detests and abhors such ideas, and, in his eyes, the consecration of antiquity becomes their curse. He proposes two reforms: first, that in case of intestacy the land shall be divided equally among all the children; and second, that a devise of land to an unborn child shall be void. As to the proposition for the distribution of land on intestacy, we are inclined to believe that Mr. Bright could carry a bill through Parliament to that effect for the simple reason that the consequences would be inappreciable. Mr. Bright confesses that intestacy is very rare, but he thinks that the sanction by the law of the principle of distribution would induce testators to distribute. He is wrong, just as he invariably is wrong whenever he gives an opinion on that which is to him an unexplored country, namely, the English character. Chattels, money, and the like have no durability, and cannot in themselves be ensigns of dignity. The possession of land in England is the highest mark of rank, and, as a fact, the ambition of every successful merchant is to buy an estate and found a family. The permanency of the family, its name, influence, and position, are maintained by the preservation of the integrity of its estate. But Mr. Bright can be refuted by a wonderful illustration. Lands in the county of Kent, being subject to the custom of gavelkind, are distributed on intestacy among all the children of the owner. Yet it is a fact, and we speak on good authority, that neither in the size of the estates, nor in the use of settlements, nor in a determination to preserve the descent to the eldest son, does the county of Kent vary from the remainder of England. Consequently it may be taken that the sanction of the law will not avail to break down the love of the English nation for the family tie, for the representation of the family by the head, and for the dignity of landed property. To effectuate Mr. Bright's wishes, land must be distributed by compulsion; the fatal error of France must be transplanted into England; and the testamentary power of devising lands, which our ancestors won after protracted struggles, and the complete enjoyment of which was not gained till the reign of Charles II., must be destroyed. It is remarkable how liberty is the constant object of attack by that school of politics which ever prates of freedom.

But Mr. Bright lays great stress on the principle that lands should not be given to an unborn person. Here, too, the reform is discovered to be a reaction; for it was only in Lord Coke's time that unborn or unascertained persons could be the objects of the bounty of the grantor. Moreover, Mr. Bright does not see that his proposition would prejudice distribution. Suppose the case of a grandfather desiring to make his son tenant for life, and then to divide the estate equally among all the children of that son. Then, if at the death of the grandfather only one grandson was born, that one would inherit the estate, and all the children born after the death of the testator would be cut off from his bounty. Mr. Bright, however, has a purpose, and a great one, and the sacrifices necessary for its realisation are to him of as little moment as to the Abolitionist are the sacrifices which his wild theories demand. Mr. Bright cares not for the condition of those classes whom he commiserates so profusely; his object is purely political. He seeks to destroy the power of the landowners: for while that exists the ascent of his party to power is simply impossible.

Mr. Bright doubtless has ulterior schemes in view for the distribution of land, but he wisely does not develope his plans. At present our concern is with his known propositions, and we think it will be admitted that they will not effect the object in view. Between the great landowners and that peasantry whom Mr. Bright hates to see divorced from the land, and whom he would convert from workmen at hire to owners or occupiers of a paltry two acres of land, there stands the vast multitude of the middle class of England, enormously rich and eager beyond all things to purchase land. Their wants must be satisfied before the peasant can obtain his share. In England land is the greatest of luxuries and the least productive of all investments. It seldom pays 3 per cent., and it is saddled with necessary legal expenditure. It is bought as a matter of pride and of enjoyment, and not as a speculation. Mr. Bright is deceived if he imagines that the English people will believe that this is a property which the peasant can acquire and retain, or from which he can derive benefit. Experience tells us that a poor man with a landed estate is the most miserable of beings. If Mr. Bright desires to achieve the immortal glory of the regenerator of the English peasantry he must devise some scheme a little less absurd than that which he has propounded at Birmingham.

THE BASIS AND STRENGTH OF CONFEDERATE CREDIT.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The financial difficulties of the Confederate States appear to me to arise all from one cardinal error, that of having too modestly underrated their own credit. People, indeed, talked vaguely and somewhat foolishly about King Cotton and his ability to bring the recalcitrant powers of the political world to terms. But, apart from these delusive expectations, the South was not conscious of her real financial strength. The North had so long, "for a consideration," relieved her of all trouble about her business affairs, that she had come to believe, though no one confessed it, that she could not attend to them unaided. She was as one who recovers his eyes after years of blindness, and who has at first but very confused notions of perspective; or one who, bedridden for the better part of life, scarce trusts the strength of his new-found limbs.

When this war surprised it, the Confederacy lacked everything, literally everything, save stout hearts and willing hands. Armies were to be equipped, a navy to be improvised; and where to get powder, shoes, blankets, muskets, medicines, tools, machinery, was the question which hauntedthe Southern authorities like some evil presence. No wonder, then, that every proposal for relieving them of this anxiety found willing and even grateful ears; that hopeful promises were believed without too close a scrutiny of the probabilities of performance: no wonder that even the more calm and collected should think no risk or sacrifice too great in view of the pressing emergency. It, therefore, often happened that contracts were given to persons who had no other capital than the credit of the Government, which, under such circumstances, was damaged instead of improved; and no other chance of success than the temptation of enormous profits held out to foreign merchants.

I say the "credit of the Government" advisedly, for there has not been a single transaction on a large scale with the blockaded ports into which that credit did not enter as the principal and indispensable consideration. Owing to the previous relations with the North there were few merchants in the South who, from their own previous standing and connections, could have established an independent credit in Europe, and these few were rarely found in the first list of Government contractors. Instead, therefore, of the contractors economising and sustaining the Government's credit, it was that credit which exclusively sustained them. There has not been a single period since the beginning of the war when the manufacturers and wholesale dealers of the Old World did not prefer to sell, and on better terms, to the Confederate Government direct than through intermediary parties. To-day an officer of any department of the Confederate Government can purchase in any European markets at lower rates and on longer credit than a contractor. A costly experience must by this time have fully demonstrated to the Southern authorities that the purchases directly on their own account have been both cheaper and better in quality. There can be only two considerations inducing a Government to make purchases indirectly. One is to supplement its own credit and resources by those of private commerce. The other is to avail itself of the practical knowledge and fertility of expedients of private enterprise. The first of these advantages did not apply, as a rule, to the contracts which the Confederate Government gave in its anxiety to procure supplies; the latter could still have been amply secured by a system of direct purchase. There are certain maxims of political economy which in great crises as often mislead men as guide them. These maxims are like formulas of arithmetic, infallible in a certain sense, but the correctness or incorrectness of the result depends on the use made of them in computation. Among these maxims are those which led the Southern statesmen to apply the principles of free trade, in which they had been educated as a creed, to a state of blockade. As you have well expressed it, a blockade is in the nature of an enormous bounty in favour of those who are fortunate enough to elude it; but this bounty is paid from the coffers of the blockaded country. To pay this bounty, when it might have been saved, or to pay it to private enterprise gratuitously, without any adequate return, is clearly a waste of the public resources. And such a waste the present commercial system of the Confederacy must be pronounced, unless it can be demonstrated that the Government could not have purchased the same supplies on at least equally favourable terms without the intervention of contractors, or could not have as successfully run the blockade on its own account. I need not explain to you that neither of these propositions could be reconciled with ascertained facts.

It is unnecessary to trace in detail the slippery steps by which this anomaly of free trade in theory and blockade in practice has reduced Confederate finances to their present low level. We have seen that the chief cause of the evil has been, not that the Government has exaggerated its necessities, but that it has undervalued its own unaided ability to meet them. It is a striking, but, rightly considered, a consoling fact, that the financial credit of the Confederacy abroad, despite some rude shocks, is essentially unimpaired. Its foreign promises to pay are actually rising, while its domestic promises to pay are still falling. May we not in this fact see the suggestion of a remedy? The credit abroad rests upon solid foundations; the discredit at home is due to an unnatural inflation, and the absence of any fixed standard of values. The credit abroad rests primarily upon the confidence inspired by the character of the Southern people, and the capacity of their leaders, but it rests also, and chiefly, upon the known ability to pay; in other words, upon cotton. Confidence in themselves the Southern people have, but their domestic currency lacks unfortunately that material basis which keeps their foreign bonds in so secure a position. I have in a former letter roughly sketched a scheme by which such a basis might be given. I now proceed, with your permission, to add in some of its explanatory details.

According to your calculation, which I consider largely within the limits, the Confederate Government, after prohibiting private exportation of cotton, is able to export some 150,000 bales per annum on its own account, worth in the European market, say, at least £6,000,000. Whether this exportation is made in vessels owned by the Government and commanded by its officers, or not, is of no consequence, so long as the exportation is strictly on Government account. I do not think so favourably as you do of the employment of naval officers for this purpose, for many reasons, one of which is alone sufficient, viz., that vessels so commanded might be regarded in neutral ports as transports, and therefore subjected to the same restrictions as other national vessels. Here is one of the cases where private enterprise could be made far more available, and without vitiating the plan which it is your object as well as mine to recommend. This exportation of 150,000 bales the Government would make without purchasing a single bale during the year, and yet have more than sufficient of its present stock left to redeem the Erlanger Loan bonds. It is scarcely conceivable that one-half of the sum thus realised could be spent in purchases, freights, &c., and the Treasury might safely rely on a surplus at the end of the year of some £3,000,000. If on the basis of this surplus it issued specie certificates, payable say, at ninety days' sight in Liverpool or Havre, and of convenient denominations, as low as £10, it would at one stroke redeem a very large portion of its present home indebtedness, on terms fair to itself and to the individual creditor. Offered to the highest bidder, it is not an extravagant estimate that £3,000,000 of such certificates would to-day buy up all the Treasury notes in circulation and a good amount of the funded domestic debt. Of course I do not contemplate such a sudden flooding of the market, and I am not blind to the fact that the currency requires an immediate remedy, and not a prospective one a year hence. It is in view of these facts that in my former letter I have spoken of a graduated issue of such certificates, and with such precautions as to prevent their immediate tender for payment. In proportion as the old currency was absorbed, a vacuum would be created which the specie notes would fill up as circulating medium, and the Treasury would soon be able to estimate with tolerable correctness what reserve of specie it required on hand at the places of payment. The normal demand for foreign exchange in a country of which the Government has the monopoly of importation and exportation must naturally be inappreciably small, and even after the necessity for such a monopoly had ceased to exist, the requirements of the home trade would greatly preponderate over the demand for exchange. Gold would be wanted at home, not in France or England. At first, however, and until the doubts of the timid had been appeased, and the specie promises of the Government had acquired an unquestioned credit, the demand would be abnormal, and the first two or three millions of certificates issued would be presented for payment as rapidly as they could find their way to Europe.

To the best of my calculations, the Confederacy could float as circulating medium, were there no other in the way, at least £30,000,000 of such specie certificates as I describe. This should remain the unalterable ultimate limit of their issue, representing about the value of the stock of cotton now on hand at prices before the war. It is indispensable, also, to the success of this scheme that the Government should declare itself ready to purchase the whole of this stock at a fixed price, but without either coercing the owner, or without offering an irresistible temptation to self-interest. The price should be so low as to relieve only the needy, but not to tempt the speculative. A large, perhaps the largest, part of the stock is now the property of foreign owners. The price fixed upon as payable here should, therefore, not be so great as to induce these to accept it here in lieu of their expected profits on the cotton being released by peace. Any danger, however, which may be apprehended from this cause, is modified by the risk of transporting the new notes through the blockade, and which the Government should not be over anxious to diminish.

To return, then, to the outlines of the plan, as sketched in my former letter. Congress should prohibit all exportation of cotton, except on Government account or in redemption of obligations already incurred. It should instruct the Secretary of the Treasury, with the assistance of the other departments, to take steps for the exportation of cotton on Government account, estimated, under careful management, to place 150,000 bales into European ports. It should further authorise the Secretary, on the credit of the proceeds of this exportation, to buy all cotton offered to him at a price not exceeding 5d. per pound, requiring such notice from the owner as the Secretary may deem necessary to arrange for the certainty of payment, and to pay therefor in specie certificates, payable at ninety days' sight, at designated places in Europe, bearing no interest, and being of a denomination of not more than £200 nor less than £10. It should further authorise, subject to restriction as to time, the issue of £30,000,000 of such certificates, or sufficient to purchase the whole stock of cotton, if, what is extremely improbable, the whole should be offered. So soon as £3,000,000 worth of these certificates have been paid out for purchases of cotton, the issue of any other Treasury notes, not already in circulation, shall cease, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer to the highest bidder £15,000,000 of the new issue; the bonâ fide average of such bids shall decide the rate at which the new issue will be exchanged to the public at large for the old notes. If at any time prior to the fulfilment of this condition the Secretary of the Treasury shall have a surplus in specie in Europe, derived from the proceeds of cotton, of not less than £200,000, he may at his discretion sell to the highest bidder specie certificates to that amount. So soon as he may deem it consistent with the requirements of the Treasury, the re-issue of old notes of other denominations shall also cease, and public notice being given of the fact, such notes, when returned to the Treasury in payment of taxes or other dues, shall be forthwith destroyed, with the exception of those of a lower denomination than £10 or $50.

I believe that the above contains the essential features of a plan for substituting gradually, and without financial revulsion, a circulating medium nearly, if not quite, equal to specie, for the almost worthless currency of the Confederacy. I am quite aware that the plan is not perfect, nor even sufficiently elaborated. For this a larger space would be needed than you can afford to give me, and more patience on the part of your readers than I have a right to expect. I am also aware that the plan will shock the prejudices and conflict with the theories of those who forget that in the possession of their wealth of cotton, the Confederates are in a position unprecedented by any other belligerent nation. If these bales of cotton were ingots of gold, would there be any absurdity in the proposition to coin them?—and this is virtually, almost without a figure of speech, what my plan proposes. In the few calculations preceding I have, for convenience' sake, assumed the £ sterling to be equivalent to $5. It would certainly much facilitate the operations I suggest if this were so, and I cordially concur in the recommendation long since made in your columns, that the Confederate five-dollar gold piece should be made of the value of the English sovereign, and the silver dollar reduced correspondingly.

SUGGESTION.

In the introduction to his Commentaries, Blackstone argues that it is the duty of every man who professes to have a liberal education to study the laws of his country. We are afraid that this sound and sensible advice has not been very generally followed, and that physicians, as a rule, are lamentably ignorant of medical jurisprudence; that nobles who sit in the Painted Chamber, and a host of gentlemen who write M.P. after their names, are as ignorant of the laws of England as they were when they entered and when they left Harrow or Eton; that very few of the clergy know anything of ecclesiastical law; and that the great middle class gathers all its legal knowledge from attendance at the Courts as jurymen or witnesses, or from reading the law reports in the daily papers. Whether cheap law is advantageous to a community may be an open question; but undoubtedly ignorance of the law is a misfortune to individuals and to communities; for in the one case the client is totally at the mercy of his professional adviser, and in the other, a nation has no check over the proceedings of a Government. The observant student of the history of England will say that, so far from English people being ignorant of the laws of their country, that it is to their knowledge of and their determination to uphold them as they apply to the rights of the citizen, that we owe our present constitutional liberty. This observation, as far as it goes, is well founded, and, as it seems to us, justifies the suggestion that he who makes popular a knowledge of the law performs a very useful work. We are confident that if the handy book on international law before us was extensively read, there would be a general conviction that the British Government have been consciously endeavouring to strain the law for the purpose of pleasing the Federals.

* The Foreign Enlistment Acts of England and America. The "Alexandra" and the Rams. By Vigilans. London: Saunders, Otley, and Co.

Vigilans gives the history of the English and Foreign Enlistment Acts, and a very fair and able summary of the proceedings in the Alexandra case. It occurs to us the very titles of the Acts in question are of some value in elucidating their objects. We are aware that too frequently neither the title nor the preamble of a legislative enactment is indicative of its purport; but on the other hand, when an object is clearly defined by the title, we may be tolerably sure that the object thus set forth is the main one of the Act. Now there is nothing in the word "enlistment" which is associated with the manufacture and sale of cannon, or with the mere building and selling of ships of war, but has reference to the engagement of persons in a warlike enterprise. We find that the title, "The Foreign Enlistment Act," exactly describes the purpose for which such an Act was passed both in England and America; viz., to prevent the citizens of the respective countries from engaging in warlike enterprises on behalf of foreign governments. In the United States the Act was passed in consequence of M. Genet, the Minister of the French Republic, "fitting out and arming vessels in the port of Charleston, enlisting men, foreigners as well as citizens, and giving them commissions to cruise and commit hostilities against England, a State then at peace with America." The English Act was passed for the purpose of restraining His Majesty's subjects from making war against Spain, and Lord Castlereagh thus described the condition of affairs that rendered the measure necessary: "Not only officers in small numbers went out to join the insurgents' corps, but there was a regular organisation of troops; regiments regularly formed left the country, ships of war were prepared in our ports, and transports were chartered to carry out arms and ammunition." Both these Acts are municipal, and the jurisdiction of the seventh section of the English Act is expressly limited to operations carried on "within any part of the United Kingdom, or in any part of His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas."

The violation or not of the Act depends upon the intent. It is not the equipping, &c., of a ship, that is punishable, but the intent that the vessel so equipped shall be employed in foreign service. Well, but all war vessels built in this country for foreigners are equipped for foreign service. That is so, but this Act contemplates British subjects being connected with, preparing, and taking part in a warlike enterprise. The Attorney-General tried to prove that as soon as a keel was laid down it could be seized, but we read in the Act, "and every such ship or vessel, with the tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all the materials, arms, ammunition, and stores, which may belong to or be on board of any such ship or vessel, shall be forfeited," thus contemplating, not an unfinished ship, but a ship completed, furnished with guns, ammunition, and all stores necessary for a cruise. It is the Federal Government that has instigated the British Government to endeavour to put such a construction on this Act as would forbid the building and sale of ships of war to the Confederates, and it is therefore of importance to know what construction the United States courts have put on the American Act. The Santissima Trinidad, formerly a privateer, was in 1816 armed and equipped at the port of Baltimore by American citizens, and sent to Buenos Ayres under the protection of the United States flag, and was there sold to the Buenos Ayres Government, then at war with Spain. Moreover, the captain declared he had become a citizen of Buenos Ayres, was in command of the vessel, and invited his crew to enlist in the service. Vigilans observes:—

"Here, then, was a ship built and equipped and armed in the United States jurisdiction, manned and commanded by American subjects, and with a cargo of arms and munitions despatched from a United States port, with an ostensible destination to the North-West. She changes her course, however, to Buenos Ayres, then a belligerent State, where she is sold to a belligerent Government, and where her commander and great portion of her crew enlist and are commissioned in the service of that State, with the intent of their taking personal part in the hostilities then prevailing between the colony of Buenos Ayres and the parent country. Compare this case with that of the Alexandra, a ship in an incomplete state, without guns or any proof of the intention to mount guns, and without crew or commander. Then let us ask ourselves which offence corresponds in the intent and equipment to those cases of personal engagement in hostilities which, as we have seen, led to the passing of the English and American Foreign Enlistment Acts? If the equipment of the Alexandra merited the term warlike and its consequent penalties, what description will apply to that of the Santissima Trinidad? If the intent of the Messrs. Sidlin, the claimants of the Alexandra, was one of a practically hostile nature, what legal epithet or penalty can fitly apply to the American owner, Captain Chaytor, and the crew of the Santissima Trinidad? If the owners of the unarmed and unequipped Alexandra, in selling her clean-handed to the belligerent, are guilty of misdemeanour, are the owners in the American case quoted guilty of no greater crime in actually transferring to a belligerent service a fully-armed and American-manned ship-of-war?"

Judge Story, in this case, in declaring the judgment of the Supreme Court, said, "It is apparent that although equipped as a vessel of war, she was sent to Buenos Ayres on a commercial adventure, contraband indeed, but in no shape violating our laws or our national neutrality. If captured by a Spanish ship of war during the voyage, she would have been justly condemned as a good prize for being engaged in a traffic punishable by the law of nations. But there is nothing in our laws, or in the law of nations, which forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale." In the case of the Bolivar the judge held that "the law does not prohibit armed vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States from sailing from out of our ports; it only requires the owners to give security that such vessels shall not be employed by them to commit hostilities against foreign Powers at peace with the United States." And he further declared that vessels, though manifestly built for warlike purposes, are not to be detained unless it is probable "that such vessels are intended to be employed by the owners to commit hostilities," &c. Thus, according to American precedents, the conduct of the British Government in detaining vessels alleged to be in course of construction for the Confederate Government is utterly unjustifiable. We repeat, that no one can read this brief but clear exposition of the law by Vigilans, without arriving at the conclusion that to please the Federals the Government has been straining the law to injure the Confederates.

A CORRESPONDENT from Lincolnshire writes to invite, through our columns, the Rev. H. W. Beecher to preach his next political sermon on Isaiah xliii. 6: "I will say to the North, give up: and to the South, keep not back."

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, January 26.

THERE is a vitality in the Southern "rebellion" which astonishes the people of the North. Periodically it is told to them that its back-bone is broken and it must immediately die; but before they have done considering what to do with its remains, it is up again and confronting them with unshaken courage, and striking powerful blows. For weeks past, under the stimulus of a series of reports from the South, partly fabricated, all exaggerated, and many totally perverted, the Northern people have settled down into a comfortable faith that the Confederacy is dissolving of itself, its armies are disbanding themselves, and the leaders either seeking the means to escape from the country, or devising some way to save their own lives by abandoning the cause and betraying one another. Wherever you went you would hear but one current of speculation—that the war is about over, and the South about to submit within some brief period. Mr. Seward's old lease of ninety days, renewed so often, was too long for the popular impatience. Sixty days, thirty days, even twenty days, were favourite terms. And I have actually heard a man, not without good sense on general subjects, affirm that there would be a dispersion of all armed resistance to the Union within ten days.

Let me note, in passing, as an ominous sign of what success in this nefarious war is sure to bring about, that this sanguine expectation of peace did not produce that universal buoyancy of feeling which might have been anticipated from the furious zeal with which the war has been supported. In the glow of the triumph, misgivings of what is to come after seemed to weigh heavily on the thoughts of those who allow themselves to consider what comes with the end of the war—the day of settlement for its cost, and the counting up of what they have gained and what they have lost by it; how they are to provide for the burden it leaves, and to recover for themselves the liberties they have lost in the enslaving of others. There is an undefined sense of terror in the most unreflecting minds of the impending ruin of fortunes, the derangement of business, and the paralysis of industrious occupations, in the inevitable collapse of the huge system of paper credits, with which the Government has unsettled all the values of property and intoxicated the people with visions of unreal wealth; and a fearful looking forward by the thinking to enormous debt, grinding taxation, and popular discontent, the dishonour of threatened repudiation, and combinations of factions and intrigues of demagogues to effect it, to resist which will bring up the need of a stronger and costlier government, and the end of constitutional liberty even in form. The amari aliquid is tasted in the bubbles of the first froth of imaginary triumph.

Within two or three days there has been a marked change in the tone of Federal despatches about Southern affairs. There are reports by telegraph and letter from East Tennessee, which have evidently alarmed the Administration for the security of their position in that State. The reports are by no means precise; we have nothing to show the Southern view of their own situation in that important region. But the accounts here go to create the belief that General Longstreet has been receiving reinforcements to a large amount, and there is a fear that he is advancing upon Knoxville, pushing the troops of General Granger before him; and apprehensions are felt that he may be able to cut off the communications with Chattanooga, and by a concerted advance from Dalton with General Johnston's army recover the lost ground in Tennessee. This is the latest military rumour, and it has suddenly checked the romantic faith in a speedy close of hostilities. The "rebellion" is held to be alive again, and dangerous; and as General Grant is hurrying back to his post as though he were wanted there for an emergency, there is a turn in the popular feeling; and for a day or two, at least, the huge stories of dissension, demoralisation, and despair among the people of the South will be taken at much nearer their true value.

There is disappointment, and the natural impulse is to find fault with the management of public affairs under which great disasters have happened, that, it is imagined, after the event, could have been averted by different counsels, and would have been averted if rulers had been prescient and infallible. Freedom of remonstrance there is, and license of complaint, which are taken by the North as proofs of disaffection to the Southern cause, for the reason that here to find fault with anything which the Government does is held by the Government and its partisans to be proof of traitorous sympathy with the enemy.

Military affairs in the South-west are confined to the occupying and holding of the coast towns of Texas by General Banks, but without any present purpose of making his way into the interior; and the fitting out of an expedition which is thought to be intended for the Red River country of Louisiana, where there is a good deal of sugar and cotton to be seized, and some signs, although faint ones, of a demonstration against Mobile.

Congress has been engaged in revising the revenue law, and the House of Representatives has passed an Act increasing the taxes considerably. It has yet to pass the Senate, and therefore all estimates of its productiveness and speculations on its character as a financial measure are premature. There is, however, a piece of political scandal current respecting one of the features of the Bill which is worth repeating, as generally believed, and as illustrating the morals of public men here. It was known for some time among the particular friends of the Administration that an additional duty on whisky of at least fifty cents a gallon, and thence to one dollar a gallon, would be recommended, and must pass. Leading senators, members of the house, and outside politicians, went into the market, and bought extensively thousands and tens of thousands of barrels of whisky for the rise. The proposition was introduced, and the rate fixed at sixty cents; but another set in Congress caught wind of the transaction, and have defeated the speculators in the House by enacting that the increased duty shall be chargeable also on whisky in hand and for sale since a past date, which takes in the stock of these speculators. The cliques on both sides were rival speculators, but the House was instructed that the new provision is necessary for a revenue measure and thus could not be talked out of it. The rumour goes that some of the men engaged will lose largely, unless the Senate can be persuaded to come to their relief by striking out the clause. As they are great political favourites it may be done for them. Jobbery for the profit of individuals is one of the normal functions of legislation at Washington. Corruption festers everywhere, and the public have got to be so accustomed to the universal odour that no disgust is expressed except when some huge heap is unexpectedly turned over, as lately in the New York Custom-house. There is then great haste made to cover it out of sight.

If the sense of public decency had not been thoroughly corrupted the recent act of the President and Senate in the making of a United States judge for Alabama of a notorious member of the New York bar, would have roused a universal outcry. As it is, it was assailed by the Opposition press in a few bitter paragraphs, and the subject then faded out of view. The place of United States judge has been hitherto reserved by all administrations for men of eminence in personal and political character. Partisans they may have been; the public tolerated that; but they must, at least, be men of unblemished lives and respectable standing at the bar and in society. President Lincoln has just conferred the appointment of judge of a district in Alabama upon Richard Busteed of this city—a low grog-shop politician, without standing at the bar or respectable practice, and of such filthy habits and profane and obscene conversation that decent people shun his company; and they who consort with him know him familiarly as "Dick Busteed," and sometimes more familiarly as Drunken Dick." These qualities made him a useful man among the populace for the Democratic party, to which he belonged; and when Mr. Lincoln was managing to bring over that mob influence at the time volunteering was the rage, he made "Dick Busteed" a brigadier, at which the people laughed "consumedly." I believe the time of his commission expired before the Senate reached his nomination, at any rate he was not confirmed, but went swaggering about with the title. He transferred his party allegiance to the President, and now "Dick Busteed" becomes United States district judge, with a salary for life—but, happily for suitors, with nothing to do. The greatest part of the district to which he is appointed is in the possession of the Confederates, and it will be a long time, at the shortest, before he will preside there. The only extenuation for the appointment is in the conclusion that the President does not expect the new judge to do any duty, and that the appointment was simply a dirty job, giving a sinecure life office to a useful tool.

The schemes for continuing Mr. Lincoln in the Presidency for another term are going on swimmingly. In addition to the legislative and other nominations heretofore reported, he has been recommended for re-election by the Legislatures of California and Maryland. The "Loyal Leagues," got up throughout the country in his interest under the fever of the war-passion last year, are engineering extensive movements to make up a popular cry for his re-election by public meetings and through nominating conventions, and I have no doubt they will be successful in having him brought forward as the candidate of the war.

There is, nevertheless, a serious struggle going on within the war party to displace Mr. Lincoln, in favour of some other Republican. The power of the executive office and the plunder to be distributed are too vast to be conceded as a monopoly to one set of men, and there is a great desire and a great effort, not the less violent because the external manifestations are studiously repressed, to defeat Mr. Lincoln's renomination, and substitute a new man for a new distribution. There is, besides, especially in the Western States, a large element of German Radicals, bitterly hostile to Mr. Lincoln for his treatment of their favourite, Fremont, who threaten loudly not to vote for Mr. Lincoln, under any circumstances.

But Mr. Lincoln is strong enough in his command of the military vote, and the unscrupulous use he has shown himself capable of making of it, and in his control of other powers conceded to him by his party on the ground of military necessity, to baffle all such opposition, to secure a renomination, and make himself President. The whole of these tremendous powers are consistently conceded, with the purpose of securing a renomination and of appointing himself President, in spite of a possible failure to obtain a majority of the electoral votes. The State elections in Connecticut, New Hampshire, Delaware, and Maryland, were notoriously, and in at least the last two examples, confessedly, carried by the direct use of the army, by force of which those States are Lincoln States in the Congress, and will vote for Mr. Lincoln if the choice comes there.

But it is in the South that Mr. Lincoln has provided a reserved fund, which makes the struggle to oust him utterly hopeless.

The late annual message, and the amnesty proclamation and plan of reconstruction accompanying it, develope a scheme, of which the direct effect is to create out of the districts of Southern territory occupied by the Federal armies, new States to any required number, so organised as to make their vote secure for Mr. Lincoln at the next election.

The process is now in operation in the State of Louisiana, or rather in that small part of the State where the Federal army and its followers hold military possession, and "martial law" is proclaimed by General Banks as the basis of all rights that are permitted to the inhabitants.

By the authority of the President, General Banks has authorised one-tenth in number of the voting population of the old State, registered and qualified according to his rules, to organise a new government and become a State, on condition that the voters shall previously take an oath, which the people there have grimly described as the "ironclad oath," not merely to bear allegiance to the Union, but to approve and maintain all the acts and proclamations of Mr. Lincoln. This oath-bound minority becomes thus the legitimate State of Louisiana, and will vote for the next President in the Electoral College, and in the House of Representatives, if the choice comes there—of course, all the time six votes for Abraham Lincoln. The same means are in preparation for the "reconstruction" of Arkansas and Tennessee. One-tenth of the voting population, first qualified by Mr. Lincoln's agents, on swearing to support the President in all things, are to be recognised as the political community and be allowed to vote: seventeen votes more for Abraham Lincoln in the colleges; two more States in Congress.

It must be remembered that, in the event of the failure of the Electoral Colleges to make a choice of President next November, the election will be made in the February succeeding by this present House of Representatives, voting by States, with the addition of such States as may be hereafter admitted. There is a clear majority of the partisans of Mr. Lincoln per capita, but not by States, in the House as now constituted. The majority, by numbers, can, however, admit as many new members and new States as they may think needful for any purpose. The southern districts will be so reconstructed; and there is another field which is available in the western Territories. Three of these, Idaho, Nevada, and Nebraska—possibly Utah—are ready to be brought into the Union as States, whenever needed; and the power of the Federal authority and patronage there is ample to secure them for the Executive in an election contest.

With all this mass of concentrated power within his hands, and the possession of an immense patronage, which includes the raising and expending of nearly $1,000,000,000 a year, how is it possible to imagine that Mr. Lincoln can be defeated if he wishes the nomination—which it is plain that he desires passionately—and is disposed to employ for himself the means he has been using without compunction or hesitation for others?

It is the common talk of Mr. Lincoln's adversaries, and the ill-concealed boast of his friends, that his nomination and election are in his own hands, and that the military power can thus perpetuate itself; and what is most probable, considering the jealousy in regard to the elective franchise, which used to be the predominant trait in the character of the people, the result is looked upon with a sort of despondent resignation by one side, and the glee of complacent satisfaction on the other, as something which is to come, by a fatality not to be resisted, before which opposition, being useless, must prudently be dumb.

SOUTHERN SYMPATHY IN ITALY.

(From our Turin Correspondent.)

TURIN, February 2, 1864.

There was a time when it was considered highly improper for any of our papers to discredit Northern statements put forward in justification of the war against the South. The Washington Government was regarded as almost infallible. But I am happy to say that the time of this credulity has gone by, and such a change has taken place in our press with regard to America that only those who have attentively watched the course of events can realise. To give you some idea of the progress of the Southern cause, I append extracts from some of our city papers.

The Commercio, the organ of the political economists, commenting upon Mr. Lincoln's amnesty, says:—

"Scylla, the terrible Roman dictator, and living a thousand years before Christianity and the Gospel had given a code of peace, brotherhood, and love to mankind—Scylla called things by their proper names, and had not the courage to lie in the face of history, the world, and his country; so that, whenever he wished to get rid of thousands of his conquered but still powerful enemies, he banished them without many ceremonies, and openly called his acts by the name of proscription.

"It belonged to Abraham Lincoln, by religion a Christian, and living towards the close of the nineteenth century, to out-Herod Herod, and to style his cruel edict an amnesty."

The Discussione, the organ of the Conservative party, in its number of yesterday, passing in review the recent publication of Dr. Girard on the casualties of the American war, shows, in a very clear way, that the Northern, compared with the Southern losses, have been two and a-half to one, and says:—

"It appears evident that the North has come to the determination of exterminating the South, rather than see the immense American continent—twice as large as Europe—divided into two republics. Now, we know that the white population of the South amounted, before the war, to 8,000,000, and that of the North to 20,000,000.

"Supposing, then, the war should be protracted until the total destruction of the Southern people is accomplished, and the casualties should continue in the same proportion—and there is no reason to the contrary—it becomes a matter of fact that the whole affair would end exactly like the famous duel of the two Kilkenny cats.

"We have employed so burlesque a similitude in so tragical an argument to show the more clearly the madness of the Federal undertaking, and because we think the time has come for Europe to address an energetic note, in the name of outraged humanity, to the Washington Government, to the effect that 8,000,000 of people, as unanimous in their resistance as the South, and, as the South, capable of such a resistance, cannot be conquered, and much less exterminated.

"As for the rest, we know that the North has, up to this time, drawn most of its fighting element from the population of Ireland. It is fair to presume that the Federals may be so blinded as to consider feasible their horrid scheme of destruction by carrying on their Irish enlistments for the future. But could England allow the continuation of the Irish exodus, if she was convinced of the criminal intention of the North? Will there be no one to warn Lord Russell that, by so doing, he renders himself the accomplice of two monstrous attempts—the annihilation of an heroic people, and the depletion of Ireland."

The Stampa, the semi-official organ of the Home Minister has in its number of the 23rd ult. an article headed, Is the Southern blockade effective? in which, quoting from THE INDEX the returns of arrivals into the ports of Charleston and Wilmington of 133 vessels from January to October, 1863, in spite of the blockading squadron it assumes, very reasonably, that the inefficiency of the Federal blockade ought to be recognised by Europe, inasmuch as it violates the Treaty of Paris; and adds:—

"Now, what is the meaning of a really sufficient force? Either this expression signifies nothing, and the Treaty of Paris is a delusion, or we must interpret it according to the strictest sense for which it was framed, and then the statistics above mentioned offer us the most luminous proof that the North has been unable to fulfil the conditions of the Treaty of Paris, and we must say that England and France have lacked the courage either to compel her to observe the treaty, or to refuse the acknowledgment of an ineffective blockade."

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, February 9.

IT is the last day of Carnival, the dullest I ever remember in Paris. Your English readers should know that Carnival extends from Christmas to Lent, and is in general the season of balls and all noisy gaiety. The masking only becomes common in the last days, to be resumed on the Sunday of mid-Lent. There have been very gay costume balls at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, at the Duc de Bassanos, and at M. Rouher's, and to-night, the gayest of all, at M. de Morny's. This is understood to be by command, as etiquette forbids Her Majesty to appear at a subject's ball except in domino and she wished to pay the President of the Assembly the compliment of her presence. The last of the state balls took place on Wednesday. Among the strangers present, Mrs.

Greenhow, lately Mr. Lincoln's prisoner, was remarked. The death of the Duchess of Parma, mentioned in my last, shut up the saloons of the old aristocracy, and every sort of amusement has been banished from the Faubourg St. Germain and the houses which claim connection with it. To conclude my account of gaieties, with which I have thought it proper to begin a letter dated on Shrove Tuesday, I may mention the concert at M. Pereire's, at which the Patti sung. His house is next to the English Embassy, and my friend, who knows Latin, says it is of good augury for the English. He repeated something about proximus ardet, which he tells me signifies that Lord Cowley will give an evening party in Lent. What it is to know the classics!

While indulging in gossip, I may mention a rumour with which the papers, not political men, have been amusing their readers during the last week. It is nothing less than the Queen's abdication, which, distasteful as it would be to her subjects under any circumstances, would be doubly so as entirely without a precedent—Richard II.'s cannot count—in English history. There is a story afloat that the Emperor took occasion, last Wednesday, at the ball, to remark to some of the marshals that the Danish war does not concern France; while the Empress, in reply to Lord Cowley's assurances that England is doing all she can to preserve the peace of Europe, said, with her sweetest smile, "the result of which is, that blood flows on the banks of the Eider." A characteristic relic of the French Revolution, which I recommend to the attention of bibliomaniacs, is to be sold next week. It is a copy of the "Constitution of '93," bound in human skin. During the last few days the different papers have reproduced the story which your American friends would do well to take a lesson by, if true. It is alleged that, in a bale of cotton opened at Rouen, there were found four conical cannon balls, the weight of which represented cotton to the value of £10. I had fancied the Southerners made a better use of their shot, and I mention, without guaranteeing, the story.

An imperial decree has been published, naming Prince Napoleon president of a new commission for editing the remainder of the great Napoleon's correspondence. Fifteen volumes have been already published, and they bear the evidence of their completeness. The commission charged with this laborious task was, however, dissolved, not for any remissness on the part of its members, but, it is understood, that having reached the epoch when the brothers of the hero were raised to thrones, the correspondence with them becomes so delicate that a certain sifting has been thought prudent. M. Cousin has occasioned some amusement by the terms of the letter in which he declines to be put on the commission, on the score of his health, and then launches into a political dissertation, in which he declares his opinions to be nearer those of M. Jules Favre than of M. Thiers.

The ordinary session of the legislative body is limited to three mouths, during which, as the Emperor told them, there was but little business done. There is a long list of laws to be examined, as well as the budget to be passed, and it is not certain that even the extra session of two months will suffice to get through all the business. The law on sugar, which is the first in order of discussion, is expected to lead to long debates, as it affects both public and private interests of great magnitude. An Act will be proposed to confer an annuity of 6,000 francs on the inventor of beet-root sugar, now a man of seventy-five, who, after enriching France with a branch of industry, which is the wealth of thousands, finds himself, in extreme old age, reduced to poverty. The budget, which has been distributed to the members of the Assembly, differs in little from that of the present year. The Minister of Finance shows an increased demand on the public purse for 18,000,000, the greater part of which will be absorbed by the interest on the recent loan. There are slight augmentations, also, in the Home Ministry, and those of worship and the household, but as yet, at least, no calls for the war department or the navy.

Friday was expected to have been a field-day in the Senate on the discussion of a petition from a member of the Opposition, M. Darimon, on the liberty of the press. Prince Napoleon and M. Laguerronière had put down their names to speak, but with a disregard of vain popularity worthy of imperial praise, the senators passed to the previous question. Prince Napoleon's silence was ascribed to his having lost or mislaid his voice at a shooting party with the Emperor a few days ago.

The Dano-German war continues to absorb public attention, and although there is but one opinion on the scandalous bloodshed and robbery perpetrated by the great German Powers, there is no attempt made to conceal the pleasure with which this check to English diplomacy is regarded. Lord Derby's speech was inserted in extenso in the Moniteur, and the official press is again busied with the Congress. There has been for the last few days a very general rumour that England has at last consented to the Emperor's proposal, in return for active co-operation in saving the integrity of Denmark. But it is far from certain that there is still time for this. The Diet seems on the point of recognising Duke Frederick as sovereign of Slesvig, as well as of Holstein, and the two Powers have not accustomed the world to the idea of disinterestedness on their part. Last night the Patrie announced a report of a revolution at Copenhagen in favour of the union of all the Scandinavian kingdoms, and this, apart from all questions of individual rights, would perhaps be the best solution the present complications offer. Sweden would be strengthened against Russia, and the Germans would find they had not gained much in the Baltic by their unjust aggression.

In the Moniteur Financier of this week, M. Aucaigne terminates his able series of papers on the Confederate cotton loan. After remarking on the extreme dearness of this now-a-days first article of necessity for clothing the most savage as well as the most civilized nations of mankind, he shows how much dearer it must still become, when the last bales of the last cotton crop of the South have been worked up. "The Yankees have just taken the best means to increase still more the dearness of cotton. The Federal Congress, faithful to the selfish spirit which rules the Northern States in matters of political economy, passed a law last month laying a tax of a penny a pound on cotton. At the same time they aimed a blow at our wine growers by adding a supplemental tax of 20d. a gallon on wines and spirits. Fotrunately they are not powerful enough to starve out our workmen in Alsace, Rouen, Lille, &c. They cannot blockade the innumerable ports which nature has given the South and by which the 330,000 bales, belonging exclusively to the Confederate Government, will find their way to Europe to cover the cotton loan and give a handsome profit to the holders. Assuming these 330,000 bales to be at present prices worth £40 a bale, there is a sum of more than £13,000,000 to cover a loan of £3,000,000, thus giving more than margin enough for possible losses and expenses." M. Aucaigne, as I before remarked, views the cotton loan simply as a first-rate commercial speculation, and entirely neglects in his calculations the guarantee of the Confederate States as an element of value.

I shall conclude in mentioning what may be regarded as the first sign of returning life in the cleverest financier of the day, a man who has shown that he will die neither with hanging nor drowning. M. Mirès has at last made a public appearance in a meeting of the shareholders of his old establishment, the Caisse des Chemins de Fer, and his explanations were received with general satisfaction by his fellow victims. He has still so many friends that if he could resolve to let by-gones be by-gones, there is no doubt that he might again take a high place in the world of finance. On his release from prison he proposed a subscription of eight millions sterling, without indicating the employment he proposed for it, and there seemed a certainty of its being subscribed at once, when the Bank of France, by rescinding its authorisation for his opening an account, put a stop to the enterprise. It is understood that this veto on his re-entering the financial world has at length been removed.

The France of this evening, in an article on public opinion in England, after recapitulating the reasons which it supposes to weigh with the Queen and Parliament in favour of neutrality in the Dano-German conflict, says: "The people of England has more positive tendencies, and what it fears—for fear is the word—in a possible war with Prussia and Austria, is from America, that is, from the United States. It is not doubted that if such a war broke out, there is little for England to fear from the powerful armies of the Continent, but everything from the countless privateers who would swarm out of the American harbours under the German flag, with letters of marque easily obtained in such a case. It is certain that in a month the German Powers would have a fleet at their disposal, a fleet paid by American adventurers, eager to enrich themselves with the spoils of English commerce. The example of the Alabama and her consorts, proves the immense damage which quick steamers can inflict on merchant shipping. Therefore the English merchants will have war at no price, and the plethora of wealth in Great Britain imposes on it an inaction, the tendencies of which it is needless to judge." There is, perhaps, some truth in this appreciation, but the writer seems to forget that Prussia and Austria renounced the use of privateers by the Declaration of Paris, and that the North has already more to do than it is equal to in the blockade of the Confederate ports.

Commander M. F. Maury, of the Confederate Navy has addressed the following letter to the editor of the Herald on the subject of the purported Report of Secretary Mallory, which was copied from the Northern papers into some of our contemporaries:—

"'YANKEE TRICKS.'

"To the Editor.

"Sir,—Soon after the commencement of the American war the Yankees resorted to the trick of getting up facsimiles of Richmond papers, in type, paper, and size; of copying their advertisements, and then filling up with reading matter of Northern manufacture. These papers were then put into the mails, received, copied from, and circulated without suspicion as Southern 'utterances.'

"The English press is now the victim of another 'trick' of the same sort. A document, copied from the Northern papers, is now going the rounds of the continental and English press which purports to be the official report of Mr. Mallory, the Confederate Secretary of the Navy to the Congress in Richmond.

"It is a take in, it bears internal evidence of a hoax, and I know many of its statements to be false. Please, therefore, assure your readers that no such document has ever been uttered by the Secretary of the Confederate navy, and so help me to 'nail to the counter' the spurious thing also.

"Yours truly,

"January 29. M. F. MAURY."

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening, February 10.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

Although the rates of money have latterly been well supported, there has been a very good supply; indeed it has, within the last forty-eight hours, increased, and there is the expectation that if we do not have lower rates at the Bank the terms in Lombard-street will somewhat diminish. It is important to recognise this fact, because if hostilities continue abroad there will be a contraction of credit which will have the effect of accumulating resources here. Already remittances to Germany and the North of Europe are stayed, and balances will be collected as speedily as possible, for the simple reason that in a state of things such as prevails there, very general alarm is excited. The Bank has been buying bullion, and since the late advices from India, are favourable for this country, the orders for silver have decreased, and consequently the price has also gone down. Trade is generally sound, but while politics continue in an unsettled position, there will be no desire to enlarge consignments abroad. Out of evil there cometh good, and though apprehensions may be occasioned in some quarters, the late perturbation will eventually produce a healthier position of affairs. The Bank rate is 8 per cent. The bankers and brokers work ⅛ to ¼ per cent. under that quotation.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The arrivals of specie this week have been on a very limited scale indeed, but the bullion movements at the Bank may be regarded on the whole as satisfactory, the amount sent in being £232,000, but against which there have been withdrawals to the extent of £150,000 for transmission abroad. The silver market continues dull, there is now less demand, and a further important decline has taken place in the price, owing to the considerable fall in exchange at Bombay of about 5 per cent. For the mail to sail on Friday, the orders are very limited. The bar silver brought by the last West India Packet, has been sold at 61⅛d. per oz., being a decline of 1⅛d from that realised by the previous arrival. Mexican dollars have been in less demand, but those which recently arrived have been sold at 63d. per oz., being an advance of 1d. on previous rates. Advices from Melbourne announced that the shipments of gold since the last mail represent 60,500 oz., valued at £242,000. The ships previously known to be on their way, will bring £127,000, making a total of £369,000.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has been subjected to considerable and frequent fluctuations during the week, the rise and fall being chiefly influenced by the telegrams received with regard to the progress of the Germano-Danish war. The tone of the debates in Parliament, with the assurance on the part of the Government that there is no intention on their part of entering into the war, and the report that an armistice has been concluded between Austria and Denmark, have had a beneficial effect upon prices, and, as contrasted with last week, there has been a considerable improvement, and the tendency of the market is good. Consols closed this evening at 90½ to ⅝ for money, and 91 to ⅛ for the account, being an improvement of ⅜ per cent.; Exchequer Bills are also rather better, being 9s. to 3s. dis. A fair amount of business has been transacted in Foreign Stocks, and almost all classes show an improvement; Greek has advanced ⅜ per cent., and are now quoted 21 to 21½; Mexican are up to 36 to 36½, being a rise of 1¼ per cent.; Spanish Passives are better by ⅜ per cent.; but the Certificates have declined ⅛; the price of the former being 32⅜ to 32⅞, and the latter 13¼ to 13¾; Turkish Six per Cents (1854) have advanced to 88½ to 89½, and those of 1862 to 66⅛ to 67⅜.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and railway securities is getting less animated week by week. The dealers appear to have entirely discarded this class of securities, the operations being strictly confined to small purchases for investments. But although there is no material alteration in values the general tendency is towards continued weakness. The only dealings recorded have been in Maryland, at 70. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvannia section, 77½. Erie, $100 Shares, all paid, 62 and 61. Illinois Central $100 Shares, all paid, 68 and 67⅜. New York Central $100 Shares, 76 and 75; and Panama railroad, second mortgage, 108.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There has not been so much fluctuation in the railway share market as in the other departments, but a good business has nevertheless been transacted, and, for the most part, prices have had an improving tendency. To-day the market has been good, and closed firm. The great feature, however, has been a rise of no less than 5 per cent. in Metropolitan. With reference to other shares, as compared with last week, there has been a rise of 2 per cent. in North Staffordshire; of 1 per cent. in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Brighton, Midland, and South-Eastern. On the other hand there has been a fall in Edinburgh and Glasgow of 1 per cent.; of ½ per cent. in Great Northern, and ¼ per cent. in North British. In foreign railway shares, business has not been so brisk, and prices show slightly less firmness. A better business has been done in the shares of British possessions; the inquiry for them has been more animated, and prices remain steady and firm.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been firm throughout the week, at 49 to 51, occasionally higher; we close very firm at 50 to 51.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the first ordinary meeting of the proprietors of the London and Northern Bank just held, it was shown that the net profit, after payment of all current expenses and making provision for bad and doubtful debts, was £3,172. This sum showed a profit equal to 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital, but the directors recommend that £2,000 should be carried to the reserve fund, and £1,172 should be devoted to the preliminary expense account. The report was unanimously adopted.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the National Discount Company a special resolution was passed for the increase of the capital by the issue of 40,000 new shares. The chairman stated that the applications already received from the existing shareholders were for more than 51,000 shares.—At the annual general meeting of the London and Joint Stock Banking Company the accounts showed that the net profits for the past six months amounted, after payment of all expenses, to £84,325, which, added to £14,313 brought from the previous account, made a total of £98,608, out of which it was proposed to declare a dividend of 6 per cent., together with a bonus of 6 per cent., for the half-year, making, with the dividend paid in August, 18 per cent. for the year. £10,000 was carried to the reserve fund, making that fund now £100,000, and leaving £16,658 to be carried to the current account. The report was unanimously adopted.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the ordinary general meeting of the City of London Brewery Company the accounts showed that the gross profit upon the year's working, amounted to £59,817. A dividend was declared, making with the interim dividend, paid in August last, 9 per cent. per annum. The sum of £4,000 was carried to the depreciation of leasehold; £5,584 to the reserved fund, and £500 voted, as usual to Mr. C. Richardson. At the ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the Mediterranean Extension Telegraph Company, a report of a very favourable character was read and adopted, and a dividend of 8 per cent. per annum, on the preference shares, and 4s. per share, equal to 4 per cent. per annum, on the original capital. Ten per cent. on the gross earnings, amounting to £108, was carried to the reserved fund. The Oriental and General Marine Insurance Company have issued their report this afternoon, preparatory to the general meeting on the 25th inst. The accounts show that after having paid all claims and expenses to the 31st December, there remains a balance of £67,274 on insurance and interest accounts. The two years, however, over which the company's operations have extended, not being sufficient to afford a safe basis for the calculation of profits, the directors recommend that £3,339 only be applied in payment of interest or capital, being at the rate of 5 per cent., and the remainder £63,935 carried forward in usual course.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued to-day of the Ottoman Financial Association (Limited), with a proposed capital of £1,000,000, in 20,000 shares of £50 each. First issue, 10,000 shares, with a deposit of £1 on application and £4 on allotment. The object of the company is to supply the necessary means in the Ottoman Empire for the formation of public works, such as railways and horse tram-roads from the interior to the coast; the cultivation of silk and cotton; the development of mining operations; the draining of marshy grounds, and the improvement of inland navigation and the means of land transport. For the accomplishment of the foregoing objects, the capital of the country itself is wholly inadequate, as there is no efficient machinery available by which undertakings on a large and collective scale can be accomplished.—The particulars of the Credit Foncier of Mauritius (Limited), which is brought out under the auspices of the Land Mortgage Bank of India, have also been issued. The board of directors, which is influential, call attention to the great scope which is presented in Mauritius for the useful outlay of capital in improvements on estates, and it is estimated that a sum of £2,000,000 might be safely invested in the colony, at a rate equal to 10 per cent. per annum. The capital sought to be raised is £500,000, in 10,000 shares of £50 each, and it is proposed to call up by instalments £10 per share, and then to issue bonds, the whole of the company's profit being thus applicable as dividend on the comparatively limited amount of £100,000 of paid-up capital. The prospectus of the City Mercantile Club and Dining Hall Company (Limited) is in circulation. The capital is to be £80,000, in 8,000 shares of £10 each, the object being to establish a new club in the City of London, and also public dining and refreshment halls of a high class. A suitable range of buildings has been obtained in the centre of Cheapside. The Credit Foncier Company (Limited) is another undertaking just brought out by the Mercantile Credit Association. The company will receive money on deposits at fixed rates, and will issue debentures for long or short periods. Advances will be made on all kinds of interests in lands, buildings, and also upon approved securities, to be repaid as may be arranged. The proposed capital is £1,000,000, in 10,000 shares, of £100 each; deposit on application, £1 per share, and on allotment £2.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE AND NEW COMPANIES.

The committee of the Stock Exchange have this day passed an important resolution with regard to new joint-stock companies. It is to the effect that they will not recognise transactions in the shares of any new company, unless one-half of the nominal capital be issued, and at least 10 per cent. paid thereon. It is understood that the rule will apply to companies whose shares have not yet been allotted.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In most descriptions of produce transactions are restricted, purchases by the home trade being confined to the mere provision for immediate requirements; whilst the Continental demand is checked perceptibly by the uncertainty in which political affairs are involved. During the last day or two there has, however, been a better inquiry in some few articles, encouraged principally by indications of easier money. Cotton has sold more freely both in London and Liverpool, prices moving up ½d. to ¾d. per lb. American provisions move off steadily. Beef is more firmly held, in consequence of the New York advices, which mention small shipments. Recent sales make 40s. to 45s. for prime eastern, and middles [illegible] to [illegible] per cwt. American butter continues to arrive freely, and middling qualities are [illegible] at lower prices, but fine [illegible] [illegible] owing to the small supplies [illegible] [illegible] meets only a retail demand. COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

Liverpool, W[illegible], [illegible]

There has not been a [illegible] trade doing in our cotton market during the past week, [illegible] [illegible] extreme caution, and the actual business done has been entirely of a retail character, though within the last day or two slightly increased sales have been effected. Prices have been very irregular, with generally a drooping [illegible], particularly in the lower grades of American. [illegible] has been in rather better demand. Surats have been irregular, and lower, particularly for the [illegible] [illegible]. The sales this week have reached [illegible] bales, of which 14,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The [illegible] sales this year have been [illegible] bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 1[illegible],3[illegible] bales. The imports, so far this year, have reached 119,180 bales, and to the same period last year, 115,954 bales. This year there have been exported 27,624 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1863 the exports were [illegible] bales. [illegible] have been taken for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

WM. H. TRAPMAN, Esq.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

MR. LINCOLN has ordered a draft for 500,000 men, to serve for three years or during the war. From this are to be deducted the enlistments made under the last call for 300,000 men, and is in fact an order for an additional 200,000 recruits. This gives a total of 2,039,748 men called for since the beginning of the war.

This order has caused considerable surprise in the North. For the last two months the Washington officials have been persistently declaring that the "rebellion" was crushed; the Confederates were starving; the Confederate Government was about to evacuate Richmond and give up Virginia; Tennessee had been finally wrested from the Confederates; North Carolina, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas were coming back into the Union; the Confederate armies were depleted by desertion; the troops under General Lee were in open mutiny; Charleston was about to fall; the Mississippi was open to commerce; and the Southern people were ready to accept gratefully the terrible and merciless amnesty of their conqueror. What need, then, of another half million of soldiers? A reference to the military situation, as presented by their own journals, will satisfy the Federals that the amnesty, except so far as it is an electioneering dodge, was a farce; that the reports of Confederate exhaustion were utterly unfounded; and that if the war is to be continued, and even if the Federals are to hold for a time the ground they have gained at such a ruinous expenditure of life and treasure, the Government will require the additional half-million of troops.

Anticipating the usual season, the Confederates have attacked the invading forces at various points with equal vigour and success. In Western Virginia the Federals have been assaulted by General Early, who has captured a large quantity of stores, forced the enemy to temporarily evacuate two important towns, and is now reported to be slowly returning to the Shenandoah Valley laden with spoils. A small expedition sent up the James River has been defeated, and the gunboat Smith, which supported the Federals, captured and destroyed. The Confederates have burnt the steamer Levi, running between Ohio and Western Virginia, capturing General Scammon, who was on board. In North Carolina the Federal troops in the neighbourhood of Newbern have been driven into that city, after destroying their camp and stores and allowing the Confederates to capture the gunboat Underwriter and a battery of artillery. In East Tennessee General Longstreet has been pressing the enemy. General Martin attacked and routed the Federals between Morristown and Louisville; the Federals have evacuated Tazewell and the town has been occupied by the Confederates; enormous captures of stores have been effected; and the Federals admit their retreat into Knoxville was attended with much confusion and heavy loss. Fort Pillow has been evacuated by the Federals, who have also hastily abandoned Corinth, Mississippi, leaving to the Confederates a valuable store of arms. The Mississippi has been temporarily blockaded by the Confederates, and stores of arms passed from east to west; and so effective is the flying artillery, that a battery lately tried its strength against three gunboats, and for a long time maintained the struggle. The Mississippi is, as far as commerce is concerned, as effectually blockaded now as it was when the Confederates held Vicksburg and Port Hudson. In Kentucky the Confederates have entered Scottsville and captured the Federal garrison. Such is the list of Confederate successes according to Northern accounts, and we may be sure it is not a perfect list, and that every item is toned down so as not to alarm Mr. Lincoln's loyal subjects. Against these triumphs of the Confederates all the Washington authorities can claim is, that General Roddy (whose command must be a very small one) has been driven to the South of the Tennessee river, with the loss of his trains; a "reported" capture of a company of Confederate cavalry in Georgia; and that Charleston has been again bombarded vigorously and without effect. Whether Mr. Lincoln can get 500,000 more troops may be uncertain, but that he wants them is unquestionable.

The news from Charleston must delight the loyal citizens who supply the Government with guns and ammunition. On the 23rd January the Federal fire had been reduced to about nine shots per day, and on the 24th the firing was at the rate of one shot per hour. On the 28th the bombardment was renewed in earnest, and 123 shells were fired at Fort Sumter in the course of the night. Loyal contractors will be glad to learn (as they can do from the loyal newspapers) that neither Sumter nor Charleston are in the least affected by the shelling. So far from Fort Sumter being hors de combat, new guns have been mounted.

The Federal House of Representatives have passed a resolution that lands of the Confederates may be confiscated in fee, and not merely for life. This, we need hardly observe, is a violation of the United States Constitution; but it is not on the ground of its being unconstitutional that we find any fault with the resolution. The Federal Legislature is justified in holding that the Confederate States have no claim under the Constitution of the United States, and that if subjugated, they are merely entitled to the treatment of a conquered country. But we believe this is the only instance in history in which it has been contemplated to despoil, a great people of the whole of their property.

In the Confederate Senate, Mr. Maxwell, of Florida submitted a series of resolutions respecting the exchange of prisoners. The first resolution approved the action of the Government in refusing to treat with General Butler, "who is held in odium, not more by the people of these States than by the people of all civilised countries," and who was appointed by the Federal authorities "to embarrass and avoid the further exchange of prisoners on any reasonable terms." The second resolution avows the willingness of the Confederate Government to make a fair exchange according to the cartel when the United States appoint a proper agent. The third resolution repudiates any exchange of negro soldiers, on the ground that the law of nations gives every nation a right to the service of all her people, of every class, against a public enemy, and the right to punish any such as may be caught in the act of war against her; and that to admit such a claim would be to give a sanction to insurrection. The fourth resolution declares that the Federal prisoners have been treated as well as the Confederate soldiers, and if there has been any scantiness of provisions and clothing it "is due to the indiscriminate and malicious devastation and destruction of private property by the armies of the United States, such as for ages past has been denounced by the civilised world as only fit to be practised by barbarians and savages." The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and on the motion of Mr. Orr were transferred to the secret calender.

Mr. Lincoln's call for another half-million of men induces the New York World to glance at what the war has cost the North up to the present time, so far as the cost is known. Mr. Lincoln has made the following calls for troops:—

May 4, 1861	64,748
From July to December, 1861	500,000
July 1, 1862	300,000

Draft, summer of 1863	300,000
February 1, 1864	500,000
Total	2,039,748

This is for one part of the service and does not include the cost of the navy, the estimates for which for the current year exceed the whole naval expenditure of England and France during the continuance of the Crimean war. In 1860 the total amount of loans authorised by Congress was not more than $50,000,000; the account now stands as follows:—

Loan of 1842	$242,621
Loan of 1847	9,415,250
Loan of 1848	8,908,341
Texas indemnity loan of 1850	3,461,000

Interest-bearing Treasury notes	500,000,000
Total	$2,774,912,818

Can any of those who think the time has not yet come to recognise the independence of the Confederate States point to any other nation which has resisted such vast and costly efforts for its subjugation? Never were the patriotism and determination of a people more thoroughly tested.

In 1863, according to the report of the Register of the Confederate treasury, the amount of duties collected on imports by the Confederate Government was $1,000,000. Of this $58,000 was received on articles brought across the Potomac.

Not caring for the displeasure of Earl Russell and Mr Seward, Alabama is determined to spare no efforts to regularly pay the interest owing to British bondholders. The dividends due on the 1st of January were duly provided for, and to meet the interest for another year the State treasury has $70,000 in coin, and recommends a loan in coin from one or more of the banks to cover the deficiency. The interest annually accruing in London, with 8 per cent. exchange added, amounts to $80,000.

The Confederate Commissioner of Patents reports that in the past year there were 114 applications. Thirty-one patents were issued for improvements in fire-arms, projectiles, and in machinery for their manufacture. Many of these improvements have been adopted by the Government, and have proved of practical value in military operations and in the preparation of ordnance supplies.

The Confederate Congress has unanimously passed a vote of thanks to General Beauregard and the officers and men of his command, for their gallant and successful defence of Charleston—"a defence which, for the skill, heroism, and tenacity displayed by the defenders during an attack scarcely paralleled in warfare, whether we consider the persistent efforts of the enemy, or his boundless resources in the most improved and formidable artillery and the most powerful engines of war hitherto known, is justly entitled to be pronounced glorious by impartial history and an admiring country."

The conduct of the enemy in North Alabama has been extremely barbarous. A few weeks since a party of twenty-five Yankees crossed the Tennessee river into Beech Island, where they captured James Radeu, aged sixty-three years, his son, two of his nephews, and another man. Of these private citizens, four were immediately murdered and thrown into the river. The fifth clung to some bushes. The leader ordered his men to cut off the head of their prisoner, but not being able to get at him easily, they fired two guns. The man dropped as if killed, and the Yankees, supposing him to be dead, went away. The same band proceeded to the house of Mr. Ritchie, took him out of his bed, drove him for about two miles, then made him wade in the Paint Rock river, and when he was about midway in the stream shot him, putting seven balls through his body. They hanged an overseer for helping his employer to carry his stock across the river. They also went to the house of Captain Rollin, robbed him of several thousand dollars, gave him ten minutes to cross the Tennessee river, and threatened to hang him if ever he returned.

It is asserted in the Southern papers that General Bragg is about to take the command in the State of Mississippi; that General Sibley, now in Texas, has been ordered to report at Richmond and that his place will be filled by General Herbert.

The health of Vice-President Stevens was, at the latest dates, improving, and no further anxiety was felt by his friends as to a speedy recovery.

According to law, the session of the Confederate Congress expired on the 18th of February, and the Legislature does not meet again until December. The Senate, deeming the recess too long under present circumstances, passed a resolution that Congress should re-assemble the first Monday in May. A bill was introduced into the House of Representatives ordering the meeting of Congress on the first Monday in April, and was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The rule of Butler in Norfolk promises to exceed in atrocity his rule in New Orleans. On the 10th January, Miss Emma Blunt, of Washington county, North Carolina, was found dead near the picket stand. A post mortem examination showed that she had been foully used, and then killed by a blow on the head. A free negro named Moore, living near the place, was suspected and arrested. On his premises an axe was found stained with blood, and according to the medical testimony it was with such an instrument that the murder was committed. It was proved that Moore had been out on the night of the murder, that he returned home with a bloody axe, and hid it under some fodder. The print of an axe was discovered in the road near the body, which corresponded with the axe in Moore's possession. The negro told several stories, and amongst them that he had met a party of Confederates, who offered him $20 to tell them where Miss Blunt lived, as they were going to kill her. Butler's judge thought proper to believe this, and told Moore he should be acquitted if he would volunteer in the Federal service. The condition was accepted, the prisoner was released, and forthwith enlisted as a United States soldier.

The letter of our New Orleans correspondent gives an account of the preparations for the reported attack on Mobile, and of the Federal military situation in Louisiana. It also presents a graphic and sickening account of the condition of the "free" negroes under Yankee rule.

☞ The Chesapeake case was resumed on the 30th ult. The counsel for the Confederates produced the "letter of marque," or rather commission to Captain Parker, of the Retribution, and Dr. Blackburn, of Mississippi, testified to the signature of President Davis. Captain Davis, of Virginia, who was taken prisoner at Gettysburg, and escaped from Johnson's Island on the 1st January, was sworn, and stated that according to the practice of the Confederate service, officers authorised to do a particular duty had power to delegate authority to others, and that persons acting under such delegated authority have heretofore been treated by the Federals as prisoners of war. This was confirmed by the evidence of Messrs. Coleman and Osborn, privates of the Confederate service, who escaped from camp Douglas on the 2nd of January. Mr. Lock, of Nova Scotia, said he met Captain Parker at Nassau in May last, when he (Captain Parker) was in command of the Retribution, and that he then saw his commission from President Davis, and it was the same document that had been produced in court. After hearing this evidence, the object of which was to show that the seizure of the Chesapeake was not an act of piracy, the Court adjourned.

Mr. Vallandigham has applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of certiorari, for the purpose of annulling the sentence passed on him by the Military Commission. The brief of his counsel, Mr. C. E. Pugh, sets forth that Mr. Vallandigham, a citizen of Ohio, and not enlisted or commissioned in the military service of the United States, nor called into actual service as a militia-man, was arrested by a party of soldiers, and arraigned before a military commission, convened by order of General Burnside. The charge brought brought against Mr. Vallandigham was that of expressing sympathy with the South, and with declaring disloyal sentiments and opinions, in order to hinder the Government in its efforts to suppress an unlawful rebellion. The specification of the charge sets forth that Mr. Vallandigham, at a public meeting, declared that the war was wicked, cruel, and unnecessary; that it was not waged for the preservation of the Union, but for crushing out liberty and erecting a despotism; that the Federal Administration could have honourably terminated the war months ago; that peace might have been honourably obtained by listening to the French proposal of mediation; that propositions "by which the Northern States could be won back and the South guaranteed her rights under the Constitution" had been rejected by Mr. Lincoln and his "minions" before the battle of Fredericksburg; that the Government was attempting to establish a military despotism in all the States; that the General Order, No. 38 (relating to Ohio) was a base usurpation of arbitrary authority, and that it was the duty of the citizens to resist the same. At the trial, Mr. Vallandigham denied the jurisdiction of the Court, and the commissioner found him guilty of the charge (portions of the specification excepted), and sentenced him to be imprisoned during the continuance of the war.

Mr. Vallandigham claims the annulment of the sentence on the grounds that the jurisdiction of a military commission is limited, and only extends to cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service; that the sentence of the commission was in excess of jurisdiction, because neither the charge nor the specification imputes any crime known to the law of the land; that General Burnside had no authority to enlarge the jurisdiction of the commission; that the Supreme Court has the power to grant a writ of certiorari, and that certiorari is a writ of right, not of discretion, and cannot be refused, except by the plain words of a statute. Mr. Pugh observes that the judgment upon certiorari is final, because either the suit must be dismissed or the proceedings of the inferior court must be quashed ab initio, for want of jurisdiction. Hence, whilst a writ of error is addressed to the judges of the inferior court, a writ of certiorari is generally addressed to the officer having the custody of the proceedings, and is in fact, an order to annul the same. All the points suggested by Mr. Pugh are supported by long lists of precedents. He told the Supreme Court that the question now is, whether, like the writ of habeas corpus, the writ of certiorari has also been abolished or its privilege suspended.

General Banks has issued a general order announcing the speedy publication of regulations "for the government of persons employed in plantation labour during the present year." It thus appears that the "free labour" is to be carried on under military rule. General Banks orders "the suspension of all unnecessary communication of travel by plantation labourers between the parishes of the State, or between plantations of the same parish. Such communication or travel, therefore, is forbidden, except under regulations established by the provost-marshals of the several parishes, and upon passes issued in accordance therewith. Public officers and managers of estates are requested to assist in the execution of this order." The excuse for this is "consideration of public health," but another reason is the dissatisfaction amongst the negroes and the desire to prevent an organised rising against Federal rule.

General Banks also notifies that all estates not immediately occupied will be seized by the Government.

General Wilde, commanding the coloured brigade at Norfolk, and who is the zealous executor of Butler's decrees, lately hanged a private of the Confederate service, named Daniel Bright, under the pretext that he was a guerilla, and compelled the Southern ladies and gentlemen whom he had arrested to witness the execution. Colonel Griffin informed General Wilde that he was about to hang a Federal soldier in retaliation, and that he was keeping other soldiers in irons as hostages for the ladies imprisoned by the Federals. In his letter to General Wilde the colonel says, "Probably no expedition during the progress of this war has been attended with more utter disregard for the long established usages of civilisation or the dictates of humanity, than was your late raid into the country bordering the Albemarle. Your stay, though short, was marked by crimes and enormities. You burned houses over the heads of defenceless women and children, carried off private property of every description, arrested non-combatants, and carried off ladies in irons, whom you confined with negro men."

The Federal authorities and their agents in this country are still harping upon the well-worn story of the "disaffection of North Carolina," and that that State is desirous of returning to the Union. On this subject a New York paper observes:—

We have before us Wilmington and Raleigh (North Carolina) papers, with dates to the 13th. The Raleigh Standard has been regarded as a Union paper, and North Carolina as a Union State, ready at a moment's warning to come back and join the North in battling for the old Union and the old flag, but we have been unable to see any of the signs which, like coming events, cast their shadows before. The Standard opposes many of the measures of the Confederate President, but beyond this it denies the soft impeachment; and we have its own denial of the charges now being made in Northern Abolition papers, in the words: "We have made no proposition to go out of the Confederacy." Upon its opposition to some of the acts of the Confederate Congress the charge is based; and if the war is not to end until North Carolina is prepared willingly to submit to the schemes of Mr. Lincoln, then will the war be an eternal one.

It is also significant of "Union sentiment" in North Carolina, that Governor Vance has offered to supply the army of General Lee with clothing, the State having a superabundant store.

The Hon. James B. Clay, the son of Henry Clay, died at Montreal, on the 26th January. In 1849 he was United States minister to Portugal, in 1857 he was elected member of Congress for Ashland district, Kentucky; he was a member of the "Peace Conference," held at Washington in February, 1861; the same year he was imprisoned by Mr. Lincoln, and subsequently released. In 1862 he commenced organising a brigade for the Confederate service in Eastern Kentucky, and on General Bragg's retreat accompanied his army southwards. He declined a command, but ran the blockade and went to Canada, where he remained until his death. It is not without its significance that the son of Henry Clay should die in exile. It is just we should observe that the Federal military authorities in Kentucky, knowing that his mortal disease—consumption—was aggravated by the climate of Canada, offered to permit him to return to his home, but Mr. Clay thought the conditions inconsistent with his honour, and declined the offer.

The New York Senate has authorised a loan of $2,000,000, and the issue of bonds for $4,000,000, for the payment of bounties to volunteers enlisted under Mr. Lincoln's call of the 1st instant. This is one among many proofs that the Federal expenditure does not nearly cover the total cost of the war to the United States.

Marshal Kane and a number of Confederate officers, who are said to have escaped from Johnson's Island, have arrived at Nova Scotia.

The Richmond Sentinel of the 1st inst. states that the steamers Pet and Hercules have run the Wilmington blockade.

The price of gold at New York on the 6th inst. was 58⅛ per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

A REPORT upon the projects of the railway and other companies applying to Parliament for powers to construct works within the City of London, has been presented by the Engineer to the Commissioners of Sewers of the Corporation. The sums of the areas scheduled for the various projects amount to about 211 acres, but inasmuch as many parts are under notice by three or four companies, it may be taken that 160 acres, or about one quarter of the whole City, are required. The length of the proposed railways is about 20 miles, and 30 roads are doomed to a greater or less interference. The sewage works are to suffer annihilation and reconstruction, about eight bridges are to be thrown across the Thames, and one of these aims at spans of 820 feet with a height of 100 feet above high-water mark. The Monument, Temple Bar, Finsbury Circus, Apothecaries Hall, and the Admiralty are to be consigned to an untimely end. The Thames Embankment, which is scarcely commenced, is considered a fit prey for several lines, while one company coolly proposes to seize the centre of the Thames itself. Some railways will soar high above the houses on viaducts, while more will penetrate the foundations of London. The Thames Tunnel, the unproductive effort of the genius of Brunel, is claimed by two companies. The Pneumatic Despatch Company desires to transmit the letters and parcels of London by a radiation of innumerable pipes. A viaduct is to be formed across the famous Holborn valley, with new streets diverging therefrom. Among all the public buildings the churches alone are respected, not one being touched by the designs.

The return of the gross public income and expenditure for the year ending the 31st December 1863, has been published. The total revenue was £70,133,620 5s. 9d., and the expenditure was £66,910,987 11s. 10d. There was also an additional outlay of £900,000 for fortifications. The surplus therefore amounts to £2,622,632 13s. 11d. The balances in the Exchequer amounted to £7,491,813 3s. 9d.

We have by the last Cape mail the news that the Confederate ship of war Tuscaloosa, formerly the Federal bark Conrad, put in to Simon's Bay (Cape of Good Hope) on the 26th of December last. She had on her former visit to the Bay, rather more than three months before that date, been received as a duly commissioned ship of war, and her commander, Lieutenant Lowe, therefore supposed that he could safely enter the port, obtain supplies and other necessaries, and get the bottom of his vessel recoppered. He had put into a Brazilian port for water and supplies, but had been denied both. He had also encountered one hundred vessels on the cruise, but only one was a Federal ship, the Living Age, and she having on board an English cargo was released on bond. On the day after the arrival of the Tuscaloosa in the Bay, Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker despatched from his flagship a lieutenant and a boarding party of twenty-five men to seize the Tuscaloosa in the Queen's name. The order was promptly carried into execution. Lieutenant Lowe lodged a formal protest against the seizure; but in answer to a claim by the United States Consul on behalf of the former owners, the Government has detained the ship till she can be handed over to them. The theory on which the seizure is justified is that Captain Semmes could not legally constitute a prize court on board the Alabama for the condemnation of captured vessels. The Colonial Government acted on direct instructions from the Home Government.

The case of Her Majesty's Advocate against John Fleming and others claiming the vessel Pampero, was called on Thursday last at Edinburgh, before Lord Ormidale, in the Exchequer Court. It will be remembered that the ship was seized in the Clyde on 10th December last. The information contained ninety-eight counts, framed in accordance with the precedent given in the Alexandra case. After some discussion on a point of procedure, the case stood over to Monday last. On that day his lordship said that as they were in the beginning of a new class of Crown cases, they must consider whether it would be better to take the case at once to the jury or to follow the ordinary Scotch practice of of disposing of all questions of relevancy before trial. The Lord Advocate said if the whole case went to trial the Crown would propose the 10th March or the first week in April. The case was, however, again adjourned.

It was reported at Manchester last week that a vessel was about to leave a British port on a cruise after the Alabama. The new steamer, purchased and equipped at the sole expense of two English mercantile houses, will, it is expected, steam three or four knots faster than the Alabama, being also much stronger and carrying heavier guns than the Confederate ship. Her commander will be a man of high reputation, and, it is said, a foe worthy of the steel of Captain Semmes. After this new ship has caught and destroyed the great Confederate cruiser, she is to direct her power against the Georgia, the Florida, and Rappahannock. Two barks have already left England with coals for the avenging vessel. Such are the rumours which find credence at Manchester. If they are true, they form a striking comment on the prowess of that navy which according to Mr. Welles, has attained historical renown. Moreover they suggest a new and promising field for the application of the powers of the Foreign Enlistment Act.

A Danish frigate arrived in Plymouth on Sunday evening with a Prussian bark as prize, which had been captured off Lowestoft on the previous Tuesday. The Danish ship was the Nils Juel, forty-six guns, commanded by Captain Gotlieb, who was under orders to take ships belonging to Prussia, Austria, Bremen, Lubeck, and Hanover. It is said, that the Norwegian merchant ships lying at Plymouth decline charters for belligerent ports, from fear of a termination of the present neutrality. A French gunboat had arrived at Plymouth to look after the French fishing-smacks.

The Mayor of Manchester, on a requisition from a thousand citizens, called a meeting on Thursday last "to consider the propriety of memorialising the Government, and of petitioning the Houses of Parliament to maintain the principles of non-intervention in the war between Denmark and Germany." The illustrious Mr. T. B. Potter was the leading spirit of the evening, and demonstrated to his own satisfaction, and to that of his enlightened hearers, that the honour of England was in no way concerned in upholding the treaty of 1852, but that our interests were all in the direction of peace. Trade would be paralysed by war. The precedent of the Alabama would be followed, not by the American Government, which, according to Mr. T. B. Potter, would be loyal and honest in its dealings, but by private individuals in America, and there would speedily be a dozen or twenty Alabamas in pursuit of English commerce all over the world. Then would ensue panic in our commerce, starvation and insubordination among our people. Mr. T. B. Potter also spoke of all these horrors being the result of a refusal to listen to fair and just claims in the matter of the Alabama. Evidently, the two ideas in Mr. Potter's mind were, that Mr. W. Seward was the most loyal, honest, fair, and just man in the world, and that the effectual way to influence the English people was to frighten them. Mr. T. B. Potter next gave his version of the history of the Treaty of 1852, the off-shoot, in his view, of secret diplomacy; and then argued that because the Treaty of 1815 excluded the Bonapartes from the throne of France, and because, in spite thereof, Lord Palmerston had recognised the Prince President in 1851, therefore the faith of treaties, the honour of the nation, and the balance of power were absurdities. The House of Commons was then attacked, because it held debates on foreign affairs, forgetting that four-fifths of the people were without the pale of the Constitution, and that the agricultural population was acknowledged to be a disgrace to civilisation. Mr. R. N. Phillips followed suit, and commenced by stating that upon the whole he always admired the conduct of Earl Russell in public matters. He acknowledged that he was much perplexed by the Danish question, and so endeavoured to clear up the general obscurity by a slight sketch of the History of England from the reign of William III. to the present time. Finally, he wanted Lord Russell to preface all his remarks to foreign Powers in this style: "Now we, the English people, don't intend to go to war upon this question; but if we can mediate it for you," &c., a method by the way which hitherto has been supposed to ensure the gravest insults, and consequent war. After a short speech from Mr. Bazley, M.P., the well-known Ernest Jones explained that the Treaty of 1852 was hatched at Warsaw in 1851, between Count Nesselrode and the Danish Minister, and was signed in London without the consent of the English people or Parliament. It was the result of a system which struck at the root of English liberty, and which had for its object to lead the people from attending to those reforms which were so much needed at home. Eventually, the meeting voted a resolution in accordance with the sentiments of Mr. T. B. Potter, together with a memorial to Lord Palmerston and petitions to Parliament based on the resolution.

The case of Kahnweiler v. Dobson put in a final appearance in the Court of Queen's Bench on Friday last. Kahnweiler was a merchant at Frankfort and a member of the firm of Paisley and Co., at Wilmington, C. S.A., and Dobson was a merchant of Hull. The two had chartered the Peterhoff and Latona to run the blockade in May, 1862. Both vessels were to carry saltpetre, and the plaintiff swore that it was agreed that if the vessels "could not run the blockade the saltpetre should be taken out and the vessels should go to one of the 'open' ports in the Confederate States." At that time New Orleans, Beaufort and Port Royal were "open" ports. However, in June the plaintiff wrote to the defendant to say that from information received at Wilmington he doubted whether a cargo could be obtained in the Confederate ports unless saltpetre was imported, and it would also be useless to go to an "open" port. The saltpetre was taken out of the Latona, sent to New York, and sold by a firm of "Smith and Jones" for the defendant. The Latona was captured, the Peterhoff was successful. The defendant gave Smith and Jones instructions to sell the saltpetre and invest the money in bacon and clover-seed, which was done. The bacon had been received and sold, and the defendant had the proceeds. The clover-seed was burnt. No accounts had been rendered to the plaintiff. At the trial the judge told the jury to find for the plaintiff if they thought that the defendant had adopted the sale at New York and the conversion of the proceeds into the goods. The jury found for the plaintiff for £930. On Friday, then, the argument was held on the motion for a new trial, and Sir George Honeyman argued the case for the defendant. The court, however, refused to grant a new trial, holding that the defendant had directed the proceeds of the goods to be turned into merchandise, and as that was not authorised by the plaintiff it made the defendant liable for the value received by him for the plaintiff.

The man who has never seen an election in an English borough has no conception of the turbulence, combativeness, and audacity of an English mob. In the latter half of the nineteenth century, in the most liberal of all constituencies, in the most fashionable town in the United Kingdom, scenes were witnessed on Saturday and Monday last, compared with which an Indian war-dance is a trifle, and which an Irish faction-fight can alone excel. Five persons laid claim to the honour of representing Brighton in the House of Commons. These were, first, Mr. Moor, who has made himself well known to the electors by a residence among them, and who came forward on Conservative principles; second, Mr. Fawcett, the Professor of Political Economy in the University of Cambridge, and a man of considerable talent and eloquence; third, Mr. Goldsmid, a young gentleman, whose principal qualification is his wealth and the possession of Sir F. Goldsmid for a parent; and, fourth, a Mr. Dumas, all of the Liberal or Radical school; and last, a Mr. Harper, who came forward as a Protestant, and nothing but a Protestant, and who protested against spending £300,000 a year in support of Roman Catholic institutions, contrary to the coronation oath of the Queen.

On Saturday the nomination was held. On the hustings in front of the Town-hall stood the worthy Mayor, in a large red gown and a big gold chain, supported by the candidates and their supporters. The idea, of course, was that the candidates should be duly proposed and seconded, that they should address the meeting, and that the show of hands should be awarded. However, the whole space of time occupied in this interesting ceremony, during which no less than seventeen speeches were made, was but one hour and fifteen minutes. The area in front of the hustings was crammed with all the ruffians, longshoremen, and "loafers" of Brighton, who, for the space of the said one hour and fifteen minutes, amused themselves by bonneting every respectable individual within reach, by shouting frantically, and by fighting each other. Moreover, they smothered the red gown and gold chain of the Mayor with mud, and they pelted every person on the hustings with orange-peel, eggs, pork, greens, melons, and parsnips. Each candidate, while he spoke a few hurried words, held his hat before him as a shield against the missiles. All were inaudible except Mr. Fawcett, who, being blind and yet boldly facing the storm, excited respect even in that mob. Mr. Moor was not unequal to the occasion, but told the roughs that as they had nothing to do with the election he certainly should not trouble himself to propitiate their wishes. Such was the scene on Saturday. The poll was held on Monday, and the mob, refreshed by a day's rest, returned to their work with renewed vigour. As far as the election was concerned, it is enough to say that the Conservative candidate, amid the dissensions of the Liberal party, gained a complete victory. Mr. Fawcett's friends and Mr. Goldsmid's friends seemed to be animated with an internecine fury, and the latter, in the course of the day, issued a manifesto defying Mr. Fawcett to the last. But the feature of the day was the conduct of the independent unenfranchised multitude. All the worthies who had distinguished themselves on Saturday again collected in front of the Town-hall, and insulted every respectable person who passed by. The shopkeepers put up their shutters in terror. The cab-drivers on their way with voters to the poll, sustained volleys of mud, offal, and seaweed. Conservative voters were in peril of their lives. Private carriages were attacked, the servants were bonneted, liveries were spoiled, stinking fish and dirty cabbages were hurled in at the windows. Many vehicles were upset in wanton sport. But the chief delight was to roll gentlemen in the mud—a process to which a clergyman and a son of a duke were subjected with much success. At length municipal patience was exhausted, and two bodies of police, each thirty strong, were marched down. At once sticks and stones saluted the champions of order. There was a halt, a facing outwards, a drawing of staves, and finally a brilliant charge, in which, no doubt, many a ruffian paid dearly for his day's sport. Till early dawn the streets were in a most disorderly and unsafe condition.

THE CONTINENT.

THERE has been a lull in the war during the past few days. Sharply as the Danes were pursued by the enemy they succeeded in gaining their strong position at Duppel, and the Germans have not yet ventured to attack them there. Duppel is situated on the mainland of Slesvig, immediately opposite to strongly fortified works on the island of Alsen. The strait which separates the island from the mainland is not more than 150 yards broad, and the attacking force will therefore be exposed to the fire from batteries on the island as well as from the works at Duppel. It will have the further disadvantage to contend with, that the fire of Danish gunboats can be brought to bear upon it. The position is one far better suited to a small army like that of the Danes than the Danneixrke, the lines of which are so extended as to require at the very least 60,000 or 70,000 men for their defence, and General de Meza and his council of war must be considered to have acted with wisdom in resolving to retire to Duppel, and with skill in effecting their retreat. Even the Danes are beginning, in spite of their mortification to admit the prudence of the step of the general, if indeed the insinuations against his capacity or courage were ever entertained by any other class than the Copenhagen mob, which created the disturbances magnified into a revolution, but really consisting of a street riot, which has not been repeated. Strong, however as the Danish position is, determined as the Danes are to defend it, the Austro-Prussian army will at any cost attack it. So long as the Danes hold Alsen and Duppel, the position of the invader is not secure, and an immense force is being brought to the scene of action with a view of carrying the position and wresting Alsen —the home, we may observe, of the Augustenburgs, who, however, after 1851, sold their possessions to the Danish king from the Danes.

The Danish navy has commenced operations, and already several Prussian vessels have been captured. We may expect soon, if an armistice is not concluded, to hear that the principal German ports have been blockaded; and after the admission which the English Government—the one most interested in the question—has made of the efficiency of the American blockade, it will be impossible for it to deny the validity of the Danish blockade, even if it should be extended along the whole German coasts of the Baltic and North Sea. At present there is not much hope of an armistice; neither side is disposed to accept it. England made a proposal to that effect, which was coldly supported by France, and which the Austrian Government, which begins to get anxious, was rather disposed to accept, but Prussia refused at once, and now declares she will have the whole of Slesvig islands, and all, before she leaves off fighting. The Danes on the other hand, believe that, by means of their navy, they can inflict serious injuries upon their oppressors. The occupation of Alsen is the utmost mischief their enemies can do them. The Danish fleet can prevent the disembarkation of an army on Funen or Zealand.

Meanwhile the two great Powers have not succeeded in winning the confidence of their colleagues in the Diet, the meetings of which body resound with complaints of the conduct of Austria and Prussia. Prussian troops passed through the principality of Lubeck, a possession of the Grand Duke of Oldenburg, which is situated in Holstein, and completely surrounded by Danish territory. The grand duke has laid his grievances before the Diet. Marshal Wrangel has deemed it necessary to occupy Altona, Neumunster, and Kiel with Prussian troops. The Federal commander and the Federal commissioners protested against this most vigourously, as a violation of the declaration of the two Powers, that Holstein should continue to be occupied solely by Federal troops. Saxony, indignant beyond measure, has moved the Diet. Its representative made a tremendous fuss, and the Diet, as usual with it, referred the whole matter to its committees.

Bavaria has called a meeting of the representatives of the smaller States to decide upon the means to be taken to enforce their views. The conferences open at Wurzburg (the place at which the smaller Powers have already met several times to concoct schemes which have come to nothing) this day. It is announced that Saxony, Hanover, Wurtemberg, Baden, Hesse-Darmstadt, Nassau, and Saxe-Weimar have accepted the invitation, and that the points to be resolved are, how to proceed if the reception of the Pretender's representative at the Diet, as proposed by the Holstein committee, should meet with obstacles, and if the occupation of Slesvig by Austria and Prussia should not effect the separation of that duchy from Denmark.

It is announced that the King of Prussia, whom a strange canard lodged at Hamburgh on Sunday morning, has received two Kiel professors, who of course went to plead the cause of the Pretender.

The language of the German press is jubilant and violent in the extreme. Even official organs pretend that the Treaty of London is at an end, and announce that no attention will be paid to any protests of England.

The Upper House of the Austrian Reichsrath by no means shares the views of the Lower House upon the Slesvig question. Its members represent better the whole empire. In the Lower House the Germans have an overwhelming majority. In fact, with the exception of the few Tscheques from Bohemia, the few Roumans from Transylvania, and the Poles, all the members are Germans. In the debate upon the credit asked by the Government for the Federal execution, the most considerable speakers of the Upper House advocated the maintenance of the London Treaty.

The session of the Reichsrath was closed on Monday by the Emperor in person. His Majesty's speech may we think be taken as an indication that Austria is yet disposed to maintain the London Treaty. His Majesty said, "Most serious events have directed our attention to the state of affairs abroad. I have neglected nothing in order to maintain the precious blessing of peace. The mission of Austria is to be strong against any attack, but to raise the voice of peace in the council of nations. Our friendly relations with the Great Powers of Europe promise the complete attainment of this object. The crisis which for years threatened to occur between Germany and Denmark has resulted in war, notwithstanding the endeavours of my Government to exercise a conciliatory influence. In conformity with the vote of the Federal Diet, I have, as a German prince, taken part in the Federal execution, and, in concert with the King of Prussia, the Duchy of Slesvig has been occupied as a pledge. The excellent conduct and bravery of the allied armies have achieved brilliant results. My joy on this account does not spring from ambition and love of conquest, but from the attainment of the just objects which are known to Europe. I confidently hope that the results achieved will secure a happy future to countries whose rights have long been violated, and will not endanger the peace of Europe in a more extended sphere."

It must be remembered, however, that it is with Prussia rather than Austria that the decision will rest. Austria has been used by Prussia to serve Prussian purposes, and Count Rechberg has been completely outwitted by Herr von Bismarck.

The Emperor said in conclusion, "Austria has shown that in her rejuvenated form she preserves her good old spirit, and that the inheritance of her strength and glory abide with her on the new path of liberty on which she has entered."

These words will not find the echo in Europe which they would have met a few months since.

The Italian Government is said to be making great military preparations. If the war lasts a few weeks longer it is almost certain that Austria will need all her strength to maintain the Quadrilateral.

The Queen of Spain gave birth to a princess, on Friday. Her Catholic Majesty has now five children, and there is not much chance of that contingency which alarmed English statesmen so much in 1846—the accession of a grandson of Louis Philippe to the Spanish throne. The new ministry has presented its budget to Congress. The figures, as given by the telegram, are not intelligible. We will give the amounts next week.

We omitted to mention last week the death of the Duchess of Parma. She was daughter of the Duchess of Berry, sister of the Count de Chambord, and from the death of her husband in 1854 until the Italian war, the seizure of the duchy by Piedmont, governed the little state as regent, on behalf of her son, now a lad of sixteen.

Prince Napoleon presided on Thursday at a grand banquet given by the shareholders of the Suez canal to M. de Lesseps, and made a speech which, remarkable upon several grounds, is especially so for its references to England. The Prince told the shareholders not to trouble about the opposition of England, because that opposition would amount to nothing. He drew a distinction between the English Government and the English nation. There is, he observed, a mirage of liberty in England which greatly attracts him—pity he did not tell his audience where to find the real thing. But the Prince is evidently an attentive student of Mr. Bright and takes that worthy's rhapsodies for facts. He accounts for the proceedings of the British Government by the statement that "the lords in power are seventy, seventy-five, and eighty years old," and that their "hearts are therefore cold," and they will do nothing for Italy or Poland.

Carrying this view further, he assured the happy shareholders that if the English Government dared to go to war about the Suez canal "it would have to protect itself against the English people." There is not much fear of war upon this question, but the Prince knows very little of the stomach for fighting of the mass of the English people if he supposes that any Government would have to protect itself for declaring war against any nation, and especially against France. The war once declared, it would be carried on with the greatest vigour, and the longer it lasted the more determined would the people be to prosecute it to a successful issue. It is not the fault of the people that England is not now at war to maintain her own honour, enforce the public law of Europe, and protect a weak nation against its oppressors

NEW ZEALAND.

DESPATCHES have been received at the Admiralty from Commodore Sir William Wiseman, Bart., in command of Her Majesty's fleet on the Australian station, containing an official account of the decisive engagement with the Maori rebels, the result of which was stated in our columns last week. The details have also come to hand from other sources. It appears that General Cameron had advanced skirmishing from a place called Mere-Mere, and that a force of gunboats had steamed up to Rangariri, under the Commodore. The soldiers under General Cameron were 1,200 strong, principally of the 65th, 14th, and 12th regiments, while the Commodore had five vessels, manned by 245 seamen and marines. The Commodore had also 300 men of the 40th regiment embarked on board the Pioneer, his own gunboat. The position of the Maoris had been well chosen, and was fortified with extraordinary skill. The landward defences consisted of an embankment and a deep broad ditch, and within was a central fort, the access to which admitted but one person at a time. The Maoris had spent nine months on the works, and had constructed lines scarcely inferior to the efforts of the Russians in the Crimea. The whole of the Ngatiawa tribe, with small detachments from other tribes, manned the works; their total force was about 1,200 men, and William Thompson and the king Matutaere were in command. The action took place on the 30th November last, and the preconcerted signal having been made about 2.30 p.m., the gunboats opened a fire, enfilading the native position, while a battery, worked by sailors, opened fire from the land side. After the lapse of half an hour the firing ceased, and the storming columns rushed to the assault and carried the first works immediately. At the same time the men of the 40th Regiment landed from the Pioneer, and took the position on the river side. But the natives only abandoned their outworks in order to defend desperately the centre fort. The assaults delivered by the soldiers were repulsed four times, and the fire was so tremendous that it was impossible to withstand it. At about 6 p.m. General Cameron requested the Commodore to send a party of seamen, armed with cutlasses and revolvers, to carry the place by escalade. A force of ninety blue-jackets, therefore, made two furious onslaughts, but were repulsed with heavy loss: and it being then dark, the General waited till the dawn. At 5.30 a.m. on the following day the enemy surrendered, and 183 prisoners, with their arms, were captured; 100 natives were killed, some escaped by swimming away in the night—and among these the king and William Thompson—and the remainder were lying wounded in the rear of the works and in the swamps. All the chiefs of the tribe, except the king and Thompson, were among the prisoners. Our loss was very heavy. The fleet lost one officer and four men killed, and four officers and seven men wounded. The land force lost three officers and thirty-three men killed, seven officers and about seventy men wounded. The principal loss occurred in the attempt to carry the central fort, and every officer who lead the rush through the narrow inlet was killed or wounded. The fire of the natives was magnificent, and the majority of our men who were hit were struck in the head. It is believed in the colony that a decisive blow has been dealt, but it is not thought probable that the tribes will submit without further fighting.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

AMERICA.

WHEN a barrister objects to the production of documents called for by the other side, it is a reasonable conclusion that he thinks such documents contain statements that will prejudice his client, or he would not pursue a course that gives the jury an unfavourable impression. Very much such a feeling has been called forth by the delay of the Government in producing the papers relating to Danish affairs. The refusal to lay on the table the diplomatic correspondence with the United States has given rise to a suspicion still more uncomplimentary to the Government. In this instance it is manifest there is not much to conceal, since most of the papers asked for have already been submitted to the Federal Congress. But the Opposition in this country cannot adduce as evidence—at least such a course would be inconvenient and dangerous—a foreign version of the correspondence of the British Government, and therefore until Earl Russell thinks proper to present the documents to Parliament, the hands of his critics are tied. People say, and say it very freely and openly too, that Earl Russell is resorting to a quibble to screen himself from the censures that are sure to be visited on his diplomacy. However, his lordship will not be allowed to enjoy the truce for which he is so solicitous. Everybody, including Earl Russell, who was in the House of Lords on Thursday night must have been aware that the hunter was determined to unearth the fox.

The Earl of Derby repeated the question he had put on Tuesday week, as to the willingness of the Foreign Secretary to lay on the table any correspondence, "not only with regard to the Alabama, but also as regards the complaints made by the United States of the injuries they had sustained, or apprehended, from other vessels which had left, or may leave, the ports of this kingdom." On the former occasion Earl Russell had refused the papers on the ground that the correspondence included that relating to the Mersey ironclads, a case which was under judicial investigation. In combating this plea the Earl of Derby first directed attention to the dilatory (and as it seems to us most arbitrary and unconstitutional) proceedings of the Government. On the 8th September Earl Russell informed Mr. Adams the vessels were ordered to be detained, but it was not until the 27th October that the vessels were seized according to due process of law. [The reader cannot fail to see the significance of this delay. On the 8th of September, under great pressure from Mr. Adams, the vessels were "detained" on mere suspicion, and seven weeks elapsed before the Government could, with all the aid of their own officers and Federal spies and informers, get together the primâ facie evidence necessary to justify the seizure, not the forfeiture, of the vessels. It is not, however, quite clear that even on the 27th of October the Government had any legal evidence to authorise the seizure.] The Earl of Derby informed the House that only on the 6th of the present month—that is, quite five months after the detention and three months and a half after the seizure—was the information filed. Nor is this all. The Government admits it has not yet completed its evidence, and since the 6th instant has informed Mr. Laird that "it will be necessary now, four months after the seizure, to send a commission abroad for the purpose of taking evidence to be used in the proceedings."

Passing from these dilatory proceedings of the Government, Earl Derby contended that the excuse that the correspondence he asked might prejudice the case of the steam rams before the Courts was utterly untenable. The question to be submitted to the English law courts is, "Have the Messrs. Laird, in building the vessels, infringed the municipal law of England?" and with any suit respecting the interpretation or violation of our municipal law no foreign government has any right of interference; and consequently the diplomatic correspondence between the Governments of London and Washington cannot legally and constitutionally have any bearing. It is true that it would be an unfriendly act to one of the belligerents and against the spirit of neutrality to repeal or not to execute the municipal law, "as it would be to strengthen the existing law (which by the way has been proposed) for the purpose of making it more favourable to the other belligerent;" but whether the Messrs. Laird have violated the municipal law of this country is a matter with which the United States "have nothing to do," so far as the investigation and trial are concerned. His lordship could not then admit that the pending trial justified the non-production of the correspondence, and there are "some strong grounds" why the papers should be promptly produced. His lordship wanted the English version of the correspondence laid before Congress, so that he might see how far the charges against Her Majesty's Government have been substantiated, "or whether they have been replied to by despatches from the noble earl (Russell), showing that he has not sacrificed the honour of the country or violated international law." Mr. Seward's despatch of the 11th July, though not presented to the English Foreign Secretary, had been laid before the Federal Congress, without any intimation that it has not been so presented, and it would therefore seem as though it was intended "to show the way in which the United States had menaced England, and the way in which England had received the threat." It was, therefore, desirable that the correspondence should be produced, and that Earl Russell "may be able to satisfy the country that while showing his anxiety to preserve friendly relations between the two nations he has at the same time not failed to uphold the honour of England." The Earl of Derby then called attention to the following noteworthy circumstances as set forth in the United States correspondence.

On the 1st September, Earl Russell wrote to Mr. Adams that the Government were advised that the evidence against the rams was not satisfactory; that the evidence against the alleged French ownership was not sufficient, and that "the responsible agent of the Customs at Liverpool affirms his belief that these vessels have not been built for Confederates." It is to be observed that Mr. Adams had directed the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the rams on the 11th July, and this was the first communication on the subject that he received.

Mr. Adams did not get this letter till the 5th, and on the 3rd felt it his "painful duty" to inform Earl Russell that his Government approved his former communication, but that it did not express "the earnestness" with which in the interim he had been directed to point out "the grave nature of the situation in which both countries must be placed in the event of an act of aggression committed against the Government and people of the United States by either of these formidable vessels."

On the 4th, Earl Russell, "who, on the 1st of September, stated the opinion of the Government that there was no cause of complaint," wrote to Mr. Adams, "I have to inform you that the matter is under the serious and anxious consideration of Her Majesty's Government." On the same day Mr. Adams asked "permission here to record, in the name of my Government, this last solemn protest," &c. On the 5th, Mr. Adams again wrote a vigorous despatch, in which he notifies that he shall wait to receive from his Government more specific directions; which, said the Earl of Derby, is "a very plain indication of the view which would be taken by the United States Government of the decision formally announced by Her Majesty's Government five days before."

On the 8th—one week after asserting that the result of an investigation of seven weeks was that the Government were advised there was not sufficient evidence to proceed upon, and four days after Mr. Adams was told the matter was under the serious and anxious consideration of Her Majesty's Government—Earl Russell informed Mr. Adams—it is supposed by telegraph from Scotland that instructions had been issued to prevent the departure of the ironclad vessels from Liverpool.

The Earl of Derby continued, "I must express my opinion that the correspondence, as laid before Congress and laid before the public, gives the significant step announced in the noble earl's letter, the appearance of being the consequence of increased pressure." He hoped this was not the case, and was most anxious "that there should be the most emphatic contradiction that can be given to it by the production of the whole correspondence." He, therefore, asked for the correspondence, on two grounds: "First, that its production can in no way affect the question before the courts of law; and secondly, that we are entitled to an English version of the correspondence in reply to that given to the American Congress."

The Earl of Derby then pressed for the correspondence relating to the complaints and remonstrances made by Her Majesty's Government in reference to acts of violence committed by Federal cruisers on our vessels. He did not want to go into any particular case, but to ascertain "the general principles of international law which have been maintained by Her Majesty's Government, and those, on the other hand, which are contended for by the United States." The despatch of 11th July, though not delivered to Earl Russell, had been presented to the Federal Congress, and that despatch announces that the policy of the United States Government is "to pursue vessels into British ports and there carry on actual hostilities, notwithstanding they are lying under the protection of the British flag and in British waters." In consequence "of the extreme inefficiency of the American blockade there has arisen a very profitable trade in vessels which are employed in running the blockade." Now these vessels are not to be treated as war vessels. It was reported that one of them had been pursued by a Federal cruiser, and was fired into when so near the shore that some of the shots passed over and lodged on the land. His lordship then referred to the ruling of Judge Betts in the case of the Springbok, which he characterised as an instance in which the American Courts have, apparently at all events, "violated international law," and he wanted the correspondence to ascertain how the Government had dealt with such cases.

Earl Russell then gave the following history of the seizure of the rams.

On the 11th July Mr. Adams wrote "rather complainingly and hastily," and on the 1st September Earl Russell informed Mr. Adams that the Government had not sufficient evidence to convict the persons fitting out the vessels, but inquiries were still going on. "Inquiries went on, and then another story was put forward that they were intended for the Viceroy of Egypt. It was necessary to ascertain whether that story was true, and we found that it was as unsubstantial as the other statement." Then the rams were seized, that is some time before the 8th. [No one can charge the Government with being dilatory in investigating the allegation of the ownership of the Viceroy of Egypt.] His lordship then intimated the ground on which the detention was ordered. "No further evidence having being put forward, the vessels were ordered to be detained, and a few days later were ordered to be seized." [It seems from this passage that the rams were not detained on account of any evidence of guilt, but from want of proof of innocency. By "a few days" elapsing between the detention and seizure, his lordship means forty-nine days, viz., from the 8th September to the 27th October.] Earl Russell denied that the step was taken in consequence of Mr. Adams's vigorous notes. His lordship then declared, what nobody has ever questioned, that it would be an unfriendly act and a breach of neutrality for armed expeditions to leave our ports to operate against the Federals. He said the noble Earl (Derby) complained that no decision has yet been come to. [The Earl of Derby did nothing of the kind, but found fault with the delay in commencing proceedings.] Next, it had been objected to that commissioners had been sent abroad to obtain evidence. [The Earl Derby of made no such objection, but only condemned the delay in sending out the commissions.] His lordship said he felt himself bound by the opinion of the law officers to refuse the papers. With regard to the other correspondence asked for there were a number of cases, and he would look over the papers. "There have been more than a hundred cases in which we have had complaints to make, and have received from the Government of the United States more or less satisfactory answers." He agreed with Lord Derby that the only penalty incurred by blockade running or carrying contraband of war is that vessels "are liable to capture;" and he regretted to say that the Government had cases lately in which they had to complain "of the unnecessary detention of persons belonging to the crews of such vessels." He was "far from maintaining" that the Federal Government "have in every case done justice to our people and to the owners of our vessels, but all these cases have been matters of discussion."

Earl Russell, not satisfied with giving this explanation, returned to the subject on Monday. He said that upon looking over his private papers he found that the Government could not have been influenced by Mr. Adams's despatches of the 4th and 5th September. His lordship said, "I find it was on that day (the 3rd September) that Mr. Layard wrote to the Treasury desiring that they should be stopped; and I find from a passage in a private letter of mine, that I had taken that course on that day. I wrote from Scotland to Lord Palmerston on the 3rd September, stating that 'the conduct of the gentlemen who have contracted for the ironclads at Birkenhead is so very suspicious that I have thought it necessary to direct that they should be detained.' [His lordship meant that he had ordered the detention of the rams, and not of the contractors, as stated in the above passage.] The next day he again wrote to Lord Palmerston, and observed, "The pressing matter, however, is that of the ironclad rams. I have desired that they should not be allowed to leave the port of Liverpool."

These two explanations of Earl Russell present some curious features, which we present, even at the risk of repetition, in chronological order.

1st September.—Earl Russell wrote to Mr. Adams, in answer to the letter of the 11th of July, that the Government had not been able to procure evidence to justify the detention of the rams.

2nd September.—Earl Russell stated in the House of Lords, on Thursday, that after writing to Mr. Adams on the 1st September, "Inquiries went on, and then another story was put forward, that the vessels were intended for the Viceroy of Egypt, and were being fitted out in pursuance of a contract made by the French subject to whom I have before alluded with the Pasha of Egypt. It was necessary to ascertain whether that story was true, and we found that it was as unsubstantial as the other statement. Having done this and no further evidence having been put forward, these vessels were ordered to be detained, and a few days later were ordered to be seized." As we are subsequently informed by the noble earl that the seizure of the rams was ordered on the 3rd of September, we are forced to the conclusion that a wonderful amount of business was transacted on the 2nd. On that day another story was put forward, was investigated, proved to be false, and other evidence looked for and not found.

3rd September.—Earl Russell instructed the Treasury to detain the rams, and wrote the same day to Lord Palmerston to say that he had determined on that course.

4th September.—Wrote again to Lord Palmerston, saying he had detained the rams, but wrote to Mr. Adams to say the matter was "under the serious and anxious consideration of the Government."

8th September.—Earl Russell informed Mr. Adams instructions had been issued for preventing the departure of the rams.

Lord Russell also said, in reference to the rams, that as soon as he "had come to the conviction" they were for the Confederates he thought it was his duty to detain them, "in order to obtain full evidence of their destination." His lordship quoted from the correspondence laid before Congress to rebut the charge of not having, at least on one occasion, remonstrated with the Federal Government on threatening England with hostilities, and to which Mr. Adams responded by denying having used any such threats.

The Earl of Derby, after commenting on the rams being detained on the 3rd, and the United States Minister being informed on the 4th that the matter was still under the consideration of the Government, asked whether any explanation had been asked from the United States Government "why the despatch of Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams, which had never been submitted to the noble earl, was laid before Congress, without any intimation that it had not been transmitted to or received by the noble earl?"

Respecting the letter to Mr. Adams of the 4th September, Earl Russell said, "I being in Scotland at the time, my letter, I suppose, would not reach Mr. Adams until a day or two after." [The noble earl was asked why, after having determined to detain the rams on the 3rd, he wrote on the 4th to say the matter was still under the consideration of the Government. The time of delivery has nothing to do with the date of the letter.] With regard to Mr. Seward's despatch of the 11th July, Earl Russell said,—

As to the last question of the noble earl, I think it more affects the conduct of the United States Government towards their own people than their conduct towards us. It is the habit—and the wise habit, I think—of Mr. Adams to weigh over the despatches which he receives, and when they contain complaints to consider how he can most effectually urge these complaints, and to endeavour to perform his duty in the most conciliatory spirit possible. I can only say that Mr. Adams has pursued that course from the first. Almost the first time I saw him he told me that he had several despatches couched in strong terms, but he did not think it discreet to read them to me, and he then went on to describe in his own language what the complaints of his Government were. I think the conduct of Mr. Adams calculated to maintain friendly relations between the two Governments. I certainly, at present, don't see the necessity for asking Lord Lyons to call Mr. Seward's attention to the presentation of this despatch to Congress. No doubt, a certain effect may be produced by the publication of that despatch, especially when it is discovered that it never was presented.

[It appears, then, that Earl Russell knew that certain despatches were written by the Federal Government incompatible with the honour of this country to receive, and that he was in the habit of acting upon Mr. Adams's version of the substance of the despatches. Thinking Earl Russell implied that this had been the case with regard to the despatch of the 11th July] Lord Derby remarked, "The noble earl surprised me by saying that Mr. Adams had communicated to him the substance of this despatch." To this Earl Russell replied, "No; what I said was, that it was Mr. Adams's habit, when there was any substantial grievance to complain of, to communicate to me his views of the despatch."

In the House of Lords on Tuesday, the Earl of Carnarvon moved for returns of the claims made by British subjects upon the United States since the secession of the South, and for the claims made by the United States Government on Her Majesty's Government for damages done by the Alabama and other Confederate cruisers. His lordship thought that those persons who had gone out to the United States with the bond fide intention of becoming citizens, had not a strong claim on the consideration of Parliament, but "in the case of persons who are clearly British subjects, and who on mere suspicion have been arrested, put into prison, subjected to indignities and hardships, sometimes even imperilling their lives, Her Majesty's Government, he thought, are bound to require the amplest compensation and redress." His lordship then noticed the case of British merchants, and the outrages committed on British shipping. He also wished to call attention to the seizure of the Confederate vessel, the Tuscaloosa, in Simon's Bay by order of the Government. The Tuscaloosa appeared at the Cape last year, when the United States Consul asked for her detention, but the Governor did not feel at liberty to take that course. When the facts were brought under the notice of the Government, Earl Russell wrote:—

As regards the Tuscaloosa although Her Majesty's Government would have approved the British authorities at the Cape if they had adopted towards that vessel a course different from that which was adopted, yet the question as to the manner in which a vessel under such circumstances should, according to the tenour of Her Majesty's orders, be dealt with, was not one altogether free from uncertainty. Nevertheless, instructions will be sent to the British authorities at the Cape for their guidance in the event of a similar case occurring hereafter, and Her Majesty's Government hope that under those instructions nothing will for the future happen to admit of a question being raised as to Her Majesty's orders having been strictly carried out.

The Earl of Carnarvon wanted, under these circumstances, to see a copy of the instructions that were sent out to the Cape. His lordship, in dealing with the second part of his motion, charged the Government with postponing instead of settling disputed points, and of indirectly offering to hereafter refer the claims of the United States Government for damages done by Confederate cruisers to arbitration. That seemed to be the construction to be put upon Earl Russell's despatches on the subject.

Earl Russell said that people who complained of vessels being captured on their way to Nassau, forgot that if Nassau was the nominal destination, and the vessel was merely to touch at that port, and then, without transhipment, carrying her cargo into a blockaded port, the vessel was a lawful prize. [We never remember any one denying this proposition.] He denied in toto that he had held out any hopes to the United States Government of referring to arbitation the demand for damages done by Confederate cruisers; but that he had repudiated all claims for such damages. He repeated what he had written in a despatch, that the case of the Alabama "was a scandal, and in some degree a reproach, upon British law." On this point his lordship said:—

I do consider that having passed a law to prevent the enlistment of Her Majesty's subjects in the service of a foreign Power, to prevent the fitting out or equipping, within Her Majesty's dominions, of vessels for warlike purposes without Her Majesty's sanction,—I say that, having passed such a law in the year 1819, it is a scandal and a reproach that one of the belligerents in this American contest has been enabled, at the order of the Confederate Government, to fit out a vessel at Liverpool in such a way that she was capable of being made a vessel of war; that, after going to another port in Her Majesty's dominions to ship a portion of her crew, she proceeded to a port in neutral territory, and there completed her crew and equipment as a vessel of war, so that she has since been able to capture and destroy innocent merchant vessels belonging to the other belligerent. Having been thus equipped by an evasion of the law, I say it is a scandal to our law that we should not be able to prevent such belligerent operations. I venture to say so much because at the Foreign-office I feel this to be very inconvenient. If you choose to say, as you might have said in former times, "Let vessels be fitted out and sold; let a vessel go to Charleston and there be sold to any agent of the Confederate Government," I could understand such a state of things. But if we have a law to prevent the fitting out of warlike vessels without the licence of Her Majesty, I do say this case of the Alabama is a scandal and a reproach. A very learned judge has said that we might drive, not a coach and six, but a whole fleet of ships through that Act of Parliament. If that be a correct description of our law, then I say we ought to have the law made more clear and intelligible. This law was said to be passed to secure the peace and welfare of this nation, and I trust it may be found in the end sufficient for that purpose. I say, however, that while the law remains in its present state its purpose is obviously defeated, and its enactments made of no effect by British subjects who defy the Queen's proclamation of neutrality.

The papers in relation to the Saxon were promised, and also the instructions sent to the Cape subject to a reference to the Colonial-office.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Lord R. Cecil asked Mr. Layard if he adhered to his statement that no verbal communication was made by Mr. Adams to Earl Russell of the substance of the despatch of July 11th. Mr. Layard said, "I stated most distinctly the other evening that that despatch had not been communicated to Lord Russell, and that no written or verbal communication in the sense of that despatch had been made to the noble lord. I trust that now at least the noble lord will be satisfied." Lord Cecil thought the answer indefinite, and again asked whether any verbal communication as to the substance of the despatch had been made to Earl Russell. Mr. Layard then said, "I believe that a member of this House answers as a gentleman and a man of honour, and not as a special pleader."

Mr. S. Fitzgerald, pursuant to notice, moved for papers respecting the capture of the Margaret and Jessie, the Springbok, the Science, and the Saxon; and in doing so declared his unwillingness to increase the irritability which existed, and that he did not wish his observations to lead to a general discussion on the relations between the two countries, "relations which were at the present moment, he feared, far from satisfactory, if not alarming." The hon. member then gave the history of the four cases referred to in his notice. The Margaret and Jessie, owned by a Confederate citizen, was pursued into British waters and fired at when so near the shore that the inhabitants of a plantation adjoining a village on British soil were alarmed for their safety." The Springbok had been condemned by Judge Betts, and it had been pointed out by a French writer, M. Vignaud, that the decision contained three flagrant violations of international law: 1st, the abitrary assimilation of articles of commerce to those ordinarily considered contraband; 2nd, the seizure of the whole cargo because a small part of it was contraband; and 3rd, the confiscation of neutral property under a neutral flag, between two neutral ports, on the pretext that the ultimate destination was a blockaded port. The Science was a British ship, which sailed to Matamoras with a cargo consigned to British merchants at that port, and was seized by the Federals under pretence that her cargo was intended for the use of the Confederate Government. "A more outrageous breach of every doctrine of international law could not occur." The capture of the Saxon, under the British flag and in British waters, was peculiarly painful on account of the murder of a British subject by a Federal officer.

The Attorney-General said that the affair of the Margaret and Jessie was being investigated by the United States Government. The captain of the Federal cruiser denied that he had chased a Confederate vessel into British waters, and Mr. Seward had stated that if any hostile act or pursuit had been done within the maritime jurisdiction of Great Britain the act would be disavowed, and ample redress given. Of course, as there was a controversy as to facts, the Government could not refuse the further inquiry called for by the Federal Government. Respecting the Springbok, the learned gentleman said he had recently been supplied with a full copy of the judgment of Judge Betts, and he was under the impression that the French writer, M. Vignaud, had only seen a summary of that document. He did not deny that some passages in the judgments of United States Prize Courts were open to criticism as to legal theory, and he was far from saying that the principles of law were always applied correctly to the facts but he knew of no decision since the war that did not imply an honest intention, and the Springbok was not an exception. Judge Betts had followed the rule of our courts which was, that "when you find the same persons who are concerned in contraband cargo, concerned also in cargo not contraband, you may escheat the whole of it." As to the destination of the cargo, if the United States court had decided to forfeit the cargo because "the goods on board might ultimately find their way to a belligerent, when actually transported to Nassau," that would be a principle "unkown to international law." But the ground taken by Judge Betts was that the cargo of the Springbok, was intended for the Confederacy by transshipment at Nassau. The Supreme Court may accept or reject this doctrine, but it is in accordance with "the principle of law which is acted on in this country." Lord Stowell laid it down that a mere transhipment at an intermediate port will not break the continuity of a voyage, which "can only be affected by a previous actual incorporation into the common stock of the country where the transhipment takes place." Respecting the Science, if the facts are as stated, and the United States should decide that a vessel, having delivered a cargo consigned to Mexican merchants, may be seized because loaded with goods that have come from the Confederate States, Her Majesty's Government would not agree with such a decision. As to the case of the Saxon, in which, according to information, "a most wanton and barbarous murder was committed," he had no doubt the Federal Government would offer all the reparation in its power. The Saxon, though a grave case of capture, was not taken in British jurisdiction, for the island Angra Pequina, is not formally British territory. In 1861, Sir George Grey, the governor of the Cape, issued a proclamation, subject to Her Majesty's confirmation, declaring the island to be annexed, but "the confirmation was never given, and possession was never taken in Her Majesty's name."

During the animated discussion that ensued it was admitted by the Attorney-General that, whatever might be the ultimate destination of the cargo, a vessel going to Nassau, intending afterwards to make another voyage, could not legally be captured on her way thither. Lord Palmerston replied rather tartly to the sharp criticisms against the Government, denying that it was in the habit "of bullying the weak and truckling to the strong." He asked Mr. Fitzgerald not to press his motion for the papers, and the hon. member acceded to the request.

DENMARK.

On Friday evening Lord Palmerston stated that the Government had proposed, before the war broke out, that a protocol should be entered into by England, France, Russia, and Sweden, as witnesses of a diplomatic engagement on the part of Denmark to revoke the November Constitution, and so give a diplomatic security to Austria and Prussia in lieu of the territorial security those Powers wished to obtain, but that the English Government never offered to give any guarantee. His lordship also stated that the Government, in concert with the Governments of France, Russia, and Sweden, had proposed an armistice.

Mr. Layard said, on Monday, in answer to Mr. Disraeli, that an unsatisfactory answer had been received by the Government in reference to the proposal for an armistice, and that "no armistice is likely to be agreed to at the present moment."

On Monday evening Lord Campbell called the attention of the House of Lords to the treaties and conventions by which the possession of Slesvig and Holstein was guaranteed to Denmark by Great Britain. He did not wish to discuss the policy of Her Majesty's Government before the papers were laid on the table, but Europe ought to be informed that there was a guarantee in existence by which England was bound to prevent Slesvig being held by a foreign Power. The treaties to which his lordship referred were those of 1715, 1720, and 1736, and the guarantee was admitted by Mr. Disraeli and Lord Palmerston, during a debate in the House of Commons in 1848. Admitting that there had been a breach of the engagements of 1852 by Denmark towards Germany, that could not affect the guarantee of 1720, and Denmark had not forfeited the guarantee by repudiating the advice of Great Britain, for, on the contrary, she had followed it. The question was, the guarantee being valid, how it could be fulfilled, and his lordship thought that an armed alliance between England and France would be sufficient to obtain the object.

Earl Russell said that Lord Campbell was justified, having the opinion he expressed, in calling the attention of the House to the guarantee of 1720, but he thought it was not desirable to discuss the matter at the present moment. Her Majesty's Government were examining the question, and it was perfectly clear that the consideration of the treaty of 1720 must have an influence on any transaction in which this country may engage with foreign powers on the subject. He could not without further reflection give a positive statement as to the intention of the Government.

POLAND.

Mr. Hennessy called the attention of the House to one of Earl Russell's diplomatic "muddles." In his Blairgowrie speech, his lordship said that as Russia had not complied with the stipulations in the treaty of Vienna with respect to Poland, the title of Russia to the kingdom of Poland could hardly be upheld. About the same time (in September) a despatch was sent to our ambassador at St. Petersburg, embodying this declaration, but upon the remonstrance of Prince Gortschakoff that despatch was withdrawn, changed, modified, and re-dated. It was of importance that the policy of the Government should be as they declared it, and Mr. Hennessy asked Lord Palmerston to present to Parliament the original despatch.

Lord Palmerston replied that it often occurred that a despatch was altered after being sent to one of our ministers abroad, and that Mr. Hennessy would be equally entitled to ask for the draft of a despatch before it was finally settled by the Secretary of State, as for one that had been so altered. In his (Lord Palmerston's) opinion, the speech of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie did not quite tally with what the Poles wished, or at all events with true Polish interests. To say that Russia no longer holds Poland by a treaty which stipulates for certain things, and that the country is held by conquest, is to place Poland at the mercy of Russia. After 1832, when we remonstrated with Russia upon the treatment of Poland, we were told that the treaty of Vienna was at an end, and that Poland had been reconquered, but the English Goverment, however, had always denied the justice of that position.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS.

Earl Granville, in moving the appointment of a committee on this subject, said it was proposed that a committee of that House and a committee of the House of Commons should sit together and draw up a joint report. Although the precedents for a joint committee were very ancient and meagre, he thought the present a case in which the experiment might be tried with advantage.

Earl Derby said he was not surprised that there should be almost a panic in the metropolis in reference to railway schemes. The estimated cost of constructing proposed metropolitan lines was £35,000,000, and 8 per cent. of that had been deposited. No less than 160 streets of the metropolis will be interfered with if all the bills before Parliament were sanctioned. He therefore considered that it was a matter which justified the interference of the Government. A committee of five peers was then appointed.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris, February 16.

We have still no clue to the intentions of the French Government in regard to the aggressions on Denmark, but as we, whose machinery for asking questions is in active operation, are equally in the dark as to the action of England we have no right to complain. It was said that in the council held on Sunday it was decided that no interest of France was involved in the Dano-German complications, and that her part is therefore to abstain from any sort of interference. This was the formula used by the Emperor to excuse the inaction of his Government in Russian Poland, but it may fairly be read here with a different meaning. The Polish insurrection commanded the sympathies of large numbers of all parties, and the Government had encouraged the press, both official and opposition, to use very warlike language. But it had no wish to embark alone in a hazardous adventure, and profiting by the indisposition to war, which for the first time has taken hold of the French people, it re-echoed their sympathies, but declared that the interests of France were not engaged in the question. But a feeling of irritation was produced by the steady refusal of England and the more wavering conduct of Austria, which has not yet subsided, and the same plea is again put forward to explain abstention in a war between European governments, which was successfully advanced for refusing to take part in an insurrection. But France does not by this engage her neutrality. She leaves the initiative to other countries, satisfied to look on, if necessary, while Denmark is dismembered, the loss and shame of which she is ready to ascribe to England. A strong Scandinavian kingdom with a Bernadotte at its head would compensate France even for Prussianising Kiel, and England's abstention while formal treaties are set at nought,—confirming all that has been said of her loss of warlike spirit and of her readiness to be browbeaten—would give a moral weight to France which even Kiel would not be too high a price to pay for. But if England at last moves, if she sends a few ships into the Baltic, a couple of regiments to Copenhagen, she will be followed at once by France and perhaps also by Russia. It is worth remarking, that while the Constitutionnel and other papers more or less under Government inspiration hold back, the Siècle, the advocate of all nationalities, refuses Germany the benefit of this plea, and insists on the traditional policy of France. It reminds its readers that M. Jules Bastide, the Minister of Foreign Affairs under the Republic, protested in 1848 against the separation of Slesvig from Denmark on the ground of the treaty of Copenhagen of 1720 The nationality of Slesvig, if judged by language, is a very doubtful question, but this doubt is not mentioned by the Siècle in defence of the rights of Denmark. "Is not France the natural protectress of the smaller States? Will she, like England, suffer the treaties she has signed to be broken with impunity? Does she no longer consider the existence of the Danish monarchy useful to her interests and to the European equilibrium? Does she forget that Denmark took our side in the great question of the rights of neutrals, that she fought with us to the last moment against the coalition, and that she was punished for it by the loss of Norway?" If, however, the attitude of France is at present ambiguous, there are signs that she will not be found unprepared to take advantage of circumstances. There were rumours that 150,000 conscripts would be called out this year instead of 100,000, the usual number, but the drawing began yesterday, and I have heard nothing of a larger draft. At the same time the exact lists of the artillery horses lent out for farm work, have been called for, so that they can be put in requisition at the shortest notice.

Prince Napoleon made a speech at the Suez canal banquet last Thursday, which is the event of the day. It has been sent to all the papers, after a delay of three days, caused by the extensive emendations and omissions which its original vivacity necessitated. Even in its amended form it does not belie the aggressive tendencies of its author. He speaks thus of England as supporting the Ottoman Porte in its opposition to the company.

"They trust to England for support. Well, then, let us speak about England, although I allow it is a delicate question, and the most disagreeable to handle; but yet, with a large dose of moderation and frankness, I shall end by saying what I think. And first of all, even at the risk of displeasing some of you, I have not the least intention of saying anything against the English people, and I make a great distinction between this powerful nation which attracts me. Yes! I cannot deny it. There is a beautiful mirage on the other side of the Channel, the mirage of the liberty I love so well, and which attracts me!" (General chorus of guests: "The mirage of liberty!") "But besides the English nation and English opinion, there is the English Government. Let us not be too hard, even on the English Government. It is opposed to your undertaking. I will not say it is quite natural. I disapprove of it, but I understand it. It does not attack you openly. In your case it prefers means more or less crooked. As for an open opposition, you have nothing such to fear from it; it has written no notes. You will not find a single diplomatic document on the subject. It puts forward the Porte. I do not blame it. But I will explain to you the English policy.

"Where do you suppose I go to look for its explanation? Not in a blue-book, but in the Peerage, where, as you know, the ages of all the nobility of England are to be found. When one opens the Peerage and sees that the noble lords now in power are 70, 75, and 80 years old, one understands how, with all the experience of age, they are somewhat cold-hearted. One understands how aristocratic old England can tell Europe to her face that she will give neither a man nor a shilling to the greatest and justest of causes, to Italy and Poland! (Furious cheers.)"

The Porte is treated quite as amusingly. If such things are in the corrected copy, what must the original have contained?

The Moniteur contains long documents from Mexico, one of them, a bulletin of General Bazaine's taking possession of Guadulajura, dated 14th January, from Vera Cruz. It begins, "Vive l Empire Mexicain!" and concludes, "The occupation of all the principal towns of the interior brings about a general pacification, and fulfils the principal condition insisted on by H.I.H. the Archduke." The two members of the deputation, who had gone to Mexico, were expected last night with all the procès verbaux of the Ayuntamientos, filling a large box, which they are to present to the Archduke, as soon as he notifies his readiness to receive the deputation.

This afternoon there is again talk of a Congress in April to settle the affairs of Denmark, but as it is added that it will include all the Powers of Europe, it may not be so near as the sanguine suppose. Denmark might serve as text on which to hang many other questions, and it will be a strange compromise which calls all the Powers together to deliberate on the treaties of 1720 and 1852, forbidding them to state their own demands. Sardinia found means in 1856 to plead the cause of Italy under pretence of discussing the neutralisation of the Black Sea. The Baltic may give her Venice, and Spain may put in her claim to stolen Gibraltar, for it seems Gibraltar was stolen, not taken.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.—GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA.

Below we give Mr. Seward's despatch of July 11th, 1863, and also the letter of Mr. Adams to Earl Russell of the same date, which is interesting from being the commencement of the official correspondence in reference to the ironclad rams:—

Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams.

Department of State, Washington,
July 11, 1863.

Sir,—Your despatch of the 26th of June (No. 438) has been received, together with three paper books, containing a report of the trial of the Alexandra.

. . . . . .

If the law of Great Britain must be left without amendment, and be construed by the Government in conformity with the rulings of the chief baron of the exchequer, then there will be left for the United States no alternative but to protect themselves and their commerce against armed cruisers proceeding from British ports, as against the naval forces of a public enemy; and also to claim and insist upon indemnities for the injuries which all such expeditions have hitherto committed or shall hereafter commit against this Government and the citizens of the United States. To this end this Government is now preparing a naval force with the utmost vigour; and if the national navy, which it is rapidly creating, shall not be sufficient for the emergency, then the United States must bring into employment such private armed naval forces as the mercantile marine shall afford. British ports, domestic as well as colonial, are now open, under certain restrictions, to the visits of piratical vessels, and not only furnish them with coals, provisions, and repairs, but even receive their prisoners when the enemies of the United States come in to obtain such relief from voyages in which they have either burned ships which they have captured, or have even manned and armed them as pirates and sent them abroad as auxiliaries in the work of destruction. Can it be an occasion for either surprise or complaint that, if this condition of things is to remain and receive the deliberate sanction of the British Government, the navy of the United States will receive instructions to pursue these enemies into the ports which thus, in violation of the law of nations and the obligations of neutrality, become harbours for the pirates? The President very distinctly perceives the risks and hazards which a naval conflict thus maintained will bring to the commerce and even to the peace of the two countries. But he is obliged to consider that in the case supposed the destruction of our commerce will probably amount to a naval war waged by a portion at least of the British nation against the Government and people of the United States—a war tolerated, although not declared or avowed by the British Government. If, through the necessary employment of all our means of national defence, such a partial war shall become a general one between the two nations, the President thinks that the responsibility for that painful result will not fall upon the United States. In stating thus frankly the views of this Government, it is proper for me to add that it is not the President's purpose to resort to the extraordinary measures of defence to which I have referred unless they shall be rendered necessary by a final decision of the British Government that it cannot and will not interfere to restrain the hostilities which are now apprehended; nor will I allow myself to suppose that Her Majesty's Government will for a moment conceive that anything I have written upon this point is written in a spirit of mere demonstration; on the contrary, while the pacific and friendly disposition of her Britannic Majesty's Government is fully appreciated and relied upon, it is well understood that that Government is the last one in the world to yield to vehemence what cannot be conceded in equity and justice. So, on the other hand, it ought to be understood that the United States, if they could ever be presumptuous, are sufficiently chastened already by the scourge of civil war to seek peace and friendship with Great Brstain and all other nations through any concession that is compatible with the permanent interests of national life and honour.

. . . . . .

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM SEWARD.

Charles Francis Adams, Esq., &c.

Mr. Adams to Lord Russell.

Legation of the United States,
London, July 11, 1863.

My Lord,—It is with unaffected regret that I perform the duty incumbent on me, as the representative of the Government of the United States at Liverpool, and of four depositions, all intended to show a determined perseverance in the same acts of hostility at the port of Liverpool which have formed the subject of my remonstrances almost from the day I had the honour first to occupy this post. In many preceding communications I have endeavoured to set forth the facts which appear to me to prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, the establishment on the part of the insurgents in the United States of a systematic plan of warfare upon the people of the United States, carried on from the port of Liverpool, as well as in less degree from other ports in this kingdom. In this policy the persons who have been sent out and have acted as agents have received the aid and effective co-operation of numbers of Her Majesty's subjects. The result of this conduct have been felt in the despatch of numbers of steam vessels laden with arms and munitions of war of every description, together with other supplies, well adapted to procrastinate the struggle, with the purpose of breaking a blockade legitimately established and fully recognised by Her Majesty in the proclamation issued by her forbidding all such acts. It is needless to point to your lordship how exclusively this business has been carried on by British subjects in British vessels, and how much the burden of war has been increased by the necessity of maintaining a corresponding naval force on the ocean in order to suppress it. Nor yet will I enlarge upon the use to which the British islands of Bermuda and New Providence have been put by British subjects, as convenient points for the storing of all these supplies, to the end that they may be more easily despatched to their illegal destination.

Thus it is manifest that all of those things denominated the sinews of war, to wit, men and money, ships, arms, gunpowder and supplies, have been continually furnished by Her Majesty's subjects almost from the beginning of the contest. A war has thus been practically conducted by a portion of the people against a Government with which Her Majesty is under the most solemn of all national engagements to preserve a lasting and durable peace.

. . . . . .

Having thus acquitted myself of the painful duty of recapitulating the points I am instructed by my Government to present, I have now the honour to solicit your attention to the evidence of the last and gravest act of international hostility yet committed. It is the construction and equipment of a steam vessel of war, of the most formidable kind now known, in the port of Liverpool. All the appliances of British skill to the arts of destruction appear to have been resorted to for the purpose of doing injury to the people of the United States. The very construction of such a vessel, in a country in a state of profound peace, without any explanation of the object to which it is to be applied, is calculated to excite uneasiness on the part of those involved in a contest where only it could be expected to be made of use. But when it further appears that it is constructed by parties who have been already proved to have furnished one vessel of war to the insurgents in America, and who are now shown to be acting in co-operation with their well-known agents on the spot in the preparation of that now in question, it is not unnatural that such proceedings should be regarded by the Government and people of the United States with the greatest alarm, as virtually tantamount to a participation in the war by the people of Great Britain to a degree which, if not seasonably prevented, cannot fail to endanger the peace and welfare of both countries. I trust I need not assure your lordship how deeply concerned is the Government which I have the honour to represent in the view of any such possibility, and how earnestly it hopes that Her Majesty's Government, having the will, may find itself likewise vested with the needful power to guard against any such occurrence. I pray your lordship to accept the assurances of the highest consideration with which I have the honour to be your lordship's obedient servant.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

Right Hon. Earl RUSSELL, &c. &c.

THE SEIZURE OF THE "TUSCALOOSA."—So far as the rules of maritime warfare are generally known to the public, or are contained in the latest work of authority on the subject, there cannot be the slightest doubt as to the legality of the capture and conversion of the Tuscaloosa. Some very silly stuff has been talked by ignorant Americans, and by some Englishmen who do not choose to know anything unfavourable to American interests, about the absence of any legal condemnation of Captain Semmes's prizes. Still more absurd nonsense has been talked about some imaginary prize court held on board the Alabama. No doubt any such court would be utterly illegal; and if it were to condemn a neutral ship it would be the duty of the injured power at once to demand redress from the Confederate Government. But Captain Semmes never made any such pretension. It needs no court to condemn an enemy's vessel, her flag condemns her, or if she have no flag, she is condemned by her papers. Capture, not condemnation, is here the title of the captors. The reason why enemy's ships are usually brought before a court for condemnation is that municipal laws require such a measure in order to entitle the captors to the proceeds of their prize, not as against the enemy, but as against their own sovereign. But it has always been the right of a cruiser to "take, sink, burn, and destroy" the ships of an enemy without any sort of trial. "Capture alone divests an enemy of his property jure belli. Upon the surrender of a vessel under an enemy's flag on the high seas a belligerent may destroy her under the general law of nations." We quote from the "Law of Nations," by Dr. Twiss, vol. II., where it is said again that a captor of an enemy's vessel is "by right dominus of the property which he has taken" immediately upon the capture. His right to fit her out as a man-of-war follows as a matter of course. We venture to assert that any one familiar with the details of our naval history could name off-hand a dozen instances in which the captured ship of the enemy has at once, without condemnation, been armed and supplied with men and munitions of war to cruise against the power from whom she was taken. The United States have gone so far during the present war as thus to employ before condemnation vessels taken from English merchants for alleged breach of blockade. It appears, then, beyond all question, that the capture of the merchant ship Conrad, and her conversion into the cruiser Tuscaloosa, were regular and legitimate belligerent operations. This being the case, it is impossible that any collateral circumstances should give us jurisdiction over a man-of-war belonging to a foreign Government. It will not do to plead the order issued at the outbreak of the war that armed vessels with their prizes should be excluded from our ports. The Tuscaloosa did not enter as a prize, and if she had we should still have had no jurisdiction over her except to exclude her. The alleged illegality of the original outfit of the Alabama is of equally little avail to Her Majesty's—or, rather, we should say to Mr. Adam's—Ministers. That might give us a jurisdiction to restore her prizes made on her first cruise, if brought within our ports as prizes. It can give us no jurisdiction now, even over her prizes, still less over a ship first known to us as a regular man-of-war, whose belligerent flag precludes all inquiry on the part of the foreign nations.—Standard.

WILLIAM MURE, Esq., late Her Majesty's Consul at New Orleans, which post he occupied since 1843, with credit to himself and distinguished usefulness to his country, died in London on the 14th inst.

THE death of Mrs. W. H. T. Lee, wife of the Brigadier-General, whose capture by the Federals while lying wounded in his private residence will be remembered, is announced.

CONFEDERATE PROSPECTS.

Two remarkably able and interesting letters from "the special correspondent of the Times" in the South have been published in the last week. We reprint some extracts that give a view of the condition of the Confederate states, and also a passage that has reference to the treatment of British subjects:—

"There is a strange shadowy sense of unreality attached to passing sixteen months in and about Richmond, and then waking up to find oneself in Washington. To describe such a transition would demand not only unrivalled descriptive and antithetical excellence, but also some such quaintness of conceit as has exhumed Rip Van Winkle starting from his long slumber in Sleepy Hollow. In Richmond the spectator has for months and months been familiar with war about his path and about his bed, and at all hours and under every roof. War is breathed in at every breath, watched upon every breeze, heard in every sound, visible at every step. For grace and elegance and letters' sake there is neither time nor superfluity of resource; nor, it must be added, are they compatible with the sublime earnestness of temper exhibited by man and woman. Sentries at the head of every street substantiate the passer's identity and investigate his right to be absent from the army. As early as dawn breaks, you are awakened by the long monotonous chorus of thousands of negroes, engaged in completing the defensive works around Richmond, and going forth cheerfully to their labour, which has long ago assumed such proportions as to defy the assault of 200,000 men. This is no idle statement of my own, but taken from the lips of the ablest, ablest, and least boastful of Confederate officers, whose name will suggest itself to every reader. Cannon are constantly seen in the streets—either new 12-pounder Napoleons going up to the army from the Tredegar Works, or guns which have undergone repair, or field pieces which are going North or South; the well-known lean, lank, ragged, 'grayback' troops, with the same lordly defiant air of individuality and self-assertion as ever, constantly troop through the city, with their old wild, discordant yells, making day or night hideous. The familiar Southern tunes of 'Dixie' or 'The Mocking Bird,' execrably interpreted by a few fifes, a cornet, and a drum, contrast marvellously with the rich swell of fine German bands in Washington, which render to perfection the 'Last Rose of Summer,' or one of Mendelssohn's superb marches, crashing among the distant echoes of Pennsylvania Avenue. And yet there is a heart, a verve, and a sanciness about the Southern 'Dixie' and the mien of its interpreters, which are looked for in vain among the stolid German musicians of Washington and the gaudy troops bedizened with gold lace who follow them.

"But of all things the most astonishing and bewildering to the stranger fresh from Richmond is the incredible ignorance and credulity of these careless sons and daughters. I have hardly patience to dwell upon the evidences of my meaning. A slave who has run away from Richmond, and gives out that he has escaped from President Davis, is elevated into an authority, and mounts the rostrum through the columns of the public journals. 'The Southern armies are melting away by desertion, and Lee and Longstreet can hardly keep the field.' It will be as well to state once for all that in the spring, summer, and autumn months the balance of deserters is always in favour of the Confederates, but that in the depth of winter, while inaction and stagnation prevail, the Federals are, as it were, tethered by their teeth to their own standards. 'North Carolina is on the eve of yielding to the blandishments of General Butler, and, headed by Governor Vance, will be back in the Union by the 4th of next July.' Am I dreaming, or did I hear a fortnight ago from Governor Vance that he would rather fight for twenty years than consent to anything but full, final, and irrevocable dissolution of the Union? 'Vice-President Stephens, the ablest man in the South, is at the point of death.' During sixteen months in the Confederate States I have never seen and scarcely ever heard of Vice-President Stephens. The list of similar chimeras might be swelled to infinity. As it was in the beginning, so it is now, and so it will be to the end. Suppressio veri alternates with suggestio falsi; the Union must and shall be maintained, because every man in the Northern States so wills it, and will give his last dollar rather than abandon the contest! It is useless to reply that the dollars which they are giving are 'bogus;' that this war will be won, not by those who print fastest, but by those who shed their blood most freely, and face self-denial with most sublime indifference. 'Constantly prefer a state of want to a state of abundance,' says one of the wisest writers of all time. Behold in the contrasted aspect of the two sections the moral conveyed in this apothegm! I could not but think, in the first instance, of my parting conversation, a few hours before, with President Davis; of his calm weighty analysis of the comparative strength of the belligerents about to close in a fourth and deathlier grapple; of his quiet earnest confidence; his kindling eye. Were it not that I remember that the deified Washington was surrounded on earth by detractors and vilifiers—that on his right hand stood Charles Lee fomenting by anonymous addresses discord among the American troops, and on his left Jefferson lending his great powers to secret defamation of his chief—I should search for special attributes in the Southerners to account for the fact that, although almost unanimous against the Yankee, they lack wisdom or virtue enough to appreciate the man whom, of all others, Providence has adapted for his mighty task. But, in spite of their indignant refusal to be gauged by the measure of other nations, history is for the Americans the same revolution of cycles and repetition of incidents as for every other people on earth.

"Thus far it cannot be pretended that any of the exceptional trials and hardships with which the South has this winter been threatened have begun to overtake Richmond. It is the universal remark that provisions of all kinds are better and more plentiful this winter than last. It is especially impossible not to be struck with the abundance of deer which hang daily at the doors of the restaurants and eating-houses, while there is an affluence of wild and tame turkeys, of partridges, ducks, fish, and oysters, which laugh all threats of starvation to scorn. Perhaps there never yet was a country which can so little be dragooned into terms by hunger as the so magnificent Southern states, teeming with the richest gifts of river and forest, sparsely occupied by a scanty population, and warmed by a bountiful and enriching sun. There is hardly a foot of the lower portions of the Potomac, Rappahannock, York, or James Rivers but is paved with oysters, and the same can be said of Mobile Bay (more than 30 miles long), of the rivers about Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah, and of the inlets of Florida and Texas. There are two, and only two, manifest perplexities with which the South has to cope—an unreasonably depreciated currency, and great deficiency in railroad transport. We are promised an early improvement in the former by the Confederate Congress—a body about whose ability to execute a colossal task it is hard to be sanguine; the latter is obviated, and but ill-armed able so long as the war lasts. But it must be patent to Englishmen that by neither can the South ever be coerced into accepting terms against its will. History exhibits many instances of countries wrestling in the death throes of defensive warfare under vastly severer financial pressure than the South can ever experience; but where can the best instance be quoted of a country so struggling and accumulating loan improvements? In regard to facilities of railroad transport, they have hitherto been found sufficient for Southern necessities, and they will this year be rather enhanced than diminished by the link which will connect Danville, in Virginia, with Greensborough, in North Carolina, and which will be opened for traffic in a couple of months from this time.

"It is a matter of surprise to all Englishmen in the Confederate States, that Lord Lyons (whose [illegible] I have again and again been unfeignedly glad to see, Mr. Adams) takes no more heed of British subjects in Secession than it does of the codfish in the Atlantic. My own impression has always been that British subjects in the South are not materially worse off without consul than they were before the 'elevation' of Mr. Moore and his colleagues. I have seen dozens of instances in which a hearty desire to act justly between contending claimants to be foreigners and the enrolling officers has been exhibited at Richmond. The efforts of Mr. Gustavus A. Myers, gratuitously and with much self-sacrifice extended to British subjects, have been unremitting; and they have been cordially seconded by the Assistant Secretary of War, Judge Campbell, who brings to the duties of his present post the same mild legal sagacity and uprightness of character which distinguished him while seated on the bench of the Supreme Court at Washington. Exceptional cases of hardship, such as that of Mr. Belshaw, have occasionally occurred, but they have been made the most of in England by the rabid partisans of the North, who are never tired of claiming for the Federal Government the very largest measure of indulgence for high-handedness in 'the hour of their agony,' but who refuse to the Confederate Government and nation the smallest charity under circumstances of vastly severer trial. But I confess it does appear to me strange that the Foreign-office should endeavour to retain within the Confederate States one trusted consular agent in a capacity which he might hold without offence to the Confederate Government. Mr. Cridland, who was Mr. Moore's bona fides at Richmond during the first two years of the war, and who is now residing as a private person at Mobile, is, it I am not mistaken, the last of the quondam British Consuls left upon the soil of Secessia. It is well known that the archives of the British Consulate are left to take their chance in the various towns where the Foreign-office was once represented. If these archives are of as much consequence as is vulgarly imagined, and if the Foreign-office still desires to retain one correspondent within the insurgent States, why not appoint Mr. Cridland custodian of the archives of the British Consulates in the South (or what the French call Chancellier), and give him authority to proceed at intervals from town to town, and see that those archives are in safe keeping? In no other way can the Foreign-office obtain such trustworthy private information from an agent in whom they will consent to repose confidence. Perhaps Lord Russell, gulled by Mr. Adams, and Lord Lyons, hoodwinked by Mr. Seward, think that yet a few weeks and British Consuls will resume their functions at Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile, under the shelter of the Stars and Stripes. There are places and circumstances in which opportunity of observation is of more moment than sagacity of induction, and entitles ordinary men who possess it to instruct philosophers who generalize at a distance. I will venture, therefore, in conclusion, to assure Lord Russell that the gigantic task which President Lincoln has taken in hand is not hitherto half-way towards its accomplishment; that before its completion rivers of blood will flow where rivulets have flowed before; that, if necessary, where one slave is found fighting for Mrs. Stowe and Mr. Sumner, ten slaves will be found fighting for their masters and for slavery; that the fourth year of the war finds the two sections under circumstances of far greater equality as regards men and material of war than its predecessors; that the North is, perhaps unconsciously, bolstering up its faith and stiffening its backbone by a diet of ingenious mendacity; and that if ever it should succeed in driving its enemy from the field, it will find itself face to face with a problem, the difficulties of which it has not begun to gauge, but which are such as have baffled solution by any otbernation since the creation of man, and which will baffle and exhaust even the irrepressible Yankee.

THE prohibition against leaving the plantations is not an isolated regulation, but the most efficient part of a system of regulations soon to be adopted for exacting compulsory labour from the negroes. It is a sort of Fugitive Act to secure their presence on the plantations while the system is put in operation, and to keep them at their tasks afterward. The lessees are likely to be harder task-masters than ordinary slave-drivers, who neither share the profits they extort nor are free from the restraining influence of proprietors, who have a permanent interest in keeping the physical stamina of their slaves unimpaired. Another consequence of this new system of serfdom which is likely to prove distasteful to the radicals, is, that it leaves the negroes in such a condition, and under such control, as to insure an easy restoration of the old form of slavery at the termination of the war. Peace will find the same negroes on the same plantations, doing the same work. If the Supreme Court declares the proclamation void, there will be no difficulty in remanding the slaves to the custody of their masters. If there comes into power an administration which remits the question to the respective State Governments, the relapse from the new to the old system will be a mere legal form, which will hardly change the external aspect of plantation life.—New York Herald.

THE Lynchburg Republican states that a Captain Dacie, representing himself to be an Englishman, and lately residing at Montgomery White Sulphur Springs, has been swindling by selling bills for sterling exchange to the amount of $1,200 000 without authority. He induced the cashier of the Bank of the Valley of Christiansburg to endorse his drafts. He is reported to have returned to Europe.

IF we had consulted our commercial interests; if we had consented to take part with France in an intervention to bring about a pacific settlement of the quarrel; if we had listened to the suggestions of public opinion; or if we had taken offence when offence was evidently intended, the Confederate States would ere now have been recognised by all the European Powers.—The Morning Post, February 10.

Opening of the Spring Campaign.

THE spring campaign has opened well for the Confederate armies. After their two months' repose they are active along the enemy's whole line, and at most points have achieved a marked success. In Western Virginia, in North Carolina, in Eastern Tennessee, in Northern Alabama, in Kentucky, and on the Mississippi banks, we hear of simultaneous movements. Everywhere the invaders are threatened with attack, and for a time the Federal and Confederate forces seem to have changed their parts, the latter assuming the offensive, the former content if they can hold the ground they have conquered in the three years' struggle. As we anticipated, the most dangerous movement to the Federal army has been made in Eastern Tennessee. The accounts from this quarter are so conflicting that it is somewhat difficult to determine the precise position of affairs; but there can be very little doubt that what fighting has taken place has on the whole been favourable to the South. The New York press limits Longstreet's designs to the occupation of Strawberry Plains, about a day's march from Knoxville, as the only valley in the neighbourhood from whence there is still forage to be drawn; but his ultimate object is undoubtedly the capital of Eastern Tennessee; and he has made considerable progress towards the achievement of his aim within the last three weeks. His advance took the Federals completely by surprise, driving them across the Holston river, capturing an immense quantity of stores, 200 prisoners, caissons, &c. The Federal army retreated upon Knoxville and recrossed the river in force, to meet Longstreet's advance on the southern side of Knoxville, and here an engagement took place between a Federal force of cavalry and mounted infantry and a Confederate foraging party, which is claimed as a decided victory by the Northern press. At the same, time it is stated from Confederate sources that Tazewell, in the immediate vicinity of Cumberland Gap, has been occupied by some of Longstreet's forces; so that it would appear that something like an investment of Knoxville is aimed at. The Southern general holds a most excellent position. He has full command of the railroad and of the roads into Virginia and North Carolina, and he is said to have an impregnable base of operations at Bull's Gap. If it be true that he has been heavily reinforced from Lee's and Johnson's forces, General Foster, or his successor, will have hard work to hold Knoxville. The latest advices from the South report a battle on the 28th near Sevierville, in which the Confederates were again victorious. But we shall have to wait a week or two before we can form any definite notion of Longstreet's plans, and his chances of success. More mysterious still is the reported retirement of General Johnson from Dalton. It is said that his force is broken up, a portion having marched to the defence of Mobile, another portion having joined Longstreet by a circuitous route. But the whole story rests rather on rumours than known facts. A Federal reconnaissance failed to discover any large body of Southern troops at Dalton, it is true, but it is not easy at first sight to understand why the position taken up by General Johnson, one which could not be turned, and was naturally so strong, that it could be held by an army of 40,000 men against almost any numbers, should have been abandoned. If Johnson has retired, it is quite certain there must be work in prospect for his army somewhere. It was perfectly safe from any attack by General Grant for the next three months. A mere retrograde movement is out of the question. The probability is, that one or two divisions have reinforced Longstreet, and that the real struggle of the spring will be for the possession of Knoxville.

In the meantime the Confederates are keeping the enemy on the alert at various points. One day it is reported that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad has been struck by Confederate cavalry, and some miles of the track destroyed; the next the news reaches Washington that General Early, with a considerable force, has marched into Western Virginia, that he has captured trains and many prisoners, and driven the Federal troops out of several strong positions. The raid accomplished, the supplies obtained, the Confederate general fell back, and the Federals claim a victory; but it says very little for the progress Northern arms have made, that in this the fourth year of the war they cannot protect Western Virginia, which, almost from the first, has been as much under Northern rule as Maryland. Another dash of a similar character is reported upon Newbern, North Carolina, that State which, by the-by, has been of late, according to Northern accounts, exhibiting so strong a desire for reunion. There the Federal troops were driven, after some sharp fighting, behind their entrenchments at Newbern, and a Federal gunboat was captured. Probably the Confederate commander intended nothing more than to beat up the quarters of the invader and withdraw; for a despatch of the 3rd inst. states that the Confederates had retired, but the capture of the gunboat is fair proof of the success of the movement, and of the remarkable activity of the army which the Northern press has so long pictured as starved and demoralised. General Butler also has a reverse to acknowledge. One of those marauding expeditions, whose only object seems to be the looting of inoffensive citizens and the abduction of niggers, has been severely handled on the James River, a gunboat sunk, and nearly the whole of the force engaged in it either killed or compelled to surrender. The check is useful, as it will probably put a stop to a system of warfare which was nothing more or less than the worst kind of razzia. From Kentucky the news is equally favourable to the Confederates. A small force had penetrated as far as Scottsville, at no very great distance from the Nashville and Louisville railroad. A considerable cavalry force under Morgan was concentrating for an advance into Eastern Kentucky, probably with a view to aid Longstreet's design against Knoxville. At Athens, and at Florence, Alabama, we hear of the Confederate cavalry at work. It is reported that Corinth has been occupied by Southern troops, and that Fort Pillow has been evacuated by the Federals. Finally, it is announced that Gilmore's land forces are coming North, and that the siege of Charleston is virtually raised. The last item of news is, we fear, too good to be true. Gilmore's abandonment of his operations against Charleston would be tantamount to a confession of absolute failure—a break down on the part of the North. If only to aid Mr. Adams and help on the draft, the siege of Charleston must go on. Possibly the siege of Mobile will proceed pari passu. But it is an amusing illustration of the progress the Federals have made at Charleston to find that after six months of incessant bombardment the brave garrison at Fort Sumter has erected new batteries, and that the New York press is so familiarised with failure as to announce without comment the probable return of Gilmore's land forces.

It is not to be wondered at that President Lincoln has ordered a new draft of 500,000 men to take place on the 10th of March. New York politicians may speculate on the causes of this sudden resolve. To us the immediate cause is sufficiently clear: that is, the knowledge that at the commencement of the fourth year of the contest the South is better prepared, in the efficiency and equipment of her soldiers, and even in their numbers, to resist invasion than at any former period; that the feelings of her people were never more thoroughly aroused, and that the prospects of the North were never more gloomy. The Federals may achieve mastery on the sea-coast, but they have reached the limits of their success in the interior. There are no great rivers to aid them now. They must accomplish everything by sheer hard fighting, whether they march upon Richmond or Atlanta. The force now in the field is hardly strong enough to hold the territory gained since the war broke out, and the draft of 500,000 men, unpopular as it may be, is the only step that will carry Mr. Lincoln's Administration over the year. Whether the draft itself is possible, will depend very much on the military events of the next month or six weeks.

The "Foul Blot."

IF a man's house were attacked and set on fire by a gang of ruffians, with the intention of murdering him and his, what should we think of the humanity and piety of the bystanders who devoutly exclaimed, "This man is an evil-doer; the justice of Heaven be done"? Yet their conduct would not be more wickedly absurd than the reasoning of those who plead slavery in justification of the North's avowed purpose of exterminating a whole people. Nay, to make the analogy more perfect, it should be added that the inmate of the burning dwelling was guilty of no worse crime than that of wearing, not from his own choice, a coat after an antiquated fashion which after having been discarded by his neighbours had become exceedingly obnoxious to them. The motives of human conduct, even in great affairs, are too often not a whit more rational. Mankind, whether as individuals or in aggregates, are swayed rather by prejudices or sympathies than by principles of abstract justice, especially when the latter conflict with the former. To keep no faith with heretics was once an accepted dogma of religion, and is still more frequently acted upon in politics and in social life than most of us are willing to confess. To rescue a felon from the grasp of an infuriated mob, requires the prompting of some high sense of duty. In the case we have imagined, abstract justice would have said, "Be the man ever so guilty, leave him to the law;" but this appeal would certainly not have brought such swift and willing aid as the cry, "The man is innocent, save him." Applying our illustration to the issue between North and South, the imputation of a great crime has been the main weapon of the aggressor, and has chilled, or at least neutralised, the sympathies for the wronged. Unfortunately the advocacy of the Southern cause in Europe has been in a great measure confined to the less effective appeal. With the exception of this journal, the champions of the South generally concede the substantial truth of the charge against their clients, contenting themselves with urging extenuating circumstances and prospective promises of reform. We have no hesitation in saying that this is the chief reason why their efforts, zealous and able as they are, have not yet produced ripened fruits.

We shall, doubtless, be told that no other course was open to the friends of Confederate Independence; that the abhorrence of slavery is a feeling deeply rooted in the conscience of the English people, and which must be propitiated; and that, by our own illustration, it would not assist the victim of an attempted wrong, if his friends stopped to argue vexatious questions. These observations, though founded on truth, are more plausible than ogical. We will not insult the intelligence of the English people by supposing that they have a mere unreasoning senseless hate of a name; they hate slavery because, as their experience as slaveholders n the West Indies and elsewhere gives them a right o do, they associate it with a systematic violation of human rights and Divine laws. But it cannot affront this instinctive repugnance to cruelty and crime, which is the most honourable attribute of our nature, to inform them that the institutions of the South resemble only in name the slavery once practised in the English West Indies and still practised in Cuba and Brazil. Again, it is not necessary for the advocates of the South to stop to argue questions. The events of the last three years have furnished a mass of evidence ready to their hands; all that is required of them is that they shall use it.

This evidence may be classed into three great facts, which will be found to refute the most important clauses of that indictment against the South which debars her from the active sympathies of mankind. First, it is demonstrated beyond the possibility of denial, that the Southern slaveholders who, in the same sense as the owners of property in every other country, may be regarded as the ruling class, have shown themselves, not degenerate in body and mind as they were represented to be, but capable of the highest moral, intellectual, and physical qualities. The South stands before the world as a nation wise in council, brave in the field, heroic in self-sacrifice and endurance, patient in adversity, temperate in the use of victory. Secondly, the non-slaveholding whites, who had been so long libelled with opprobrious epithets that the terms "mean whites" and "white trash," unknown at the South, were currently accepted here as not inappropriate designations, have filled the ranks of the Southern armies with willing and patriotic soldiers. These lazy lawless vagrants and marauders, as beyond the limits of their own country they were described and believed to be, have rivalled the best European troops in all the essentials of warlike discipline. Not an act of wanton cruelty, not an instance of excess when in enemy's territory, not a case of mutiny, can be laid to the charge of the patriot soldiers of the South. Whether in the dash of attack or in the severer trial of retreat, whether in the fatigue of eventful campaigns or in the weariness of inaction, their fidelity, their implicit obedience, and their unshaken confidence in themselves and their cause, were as conspicuous as their gallantry. If "mean whites" and "white trash" are terms descriptive of any phase of degeneracy, the South may proudly claim that her population contains less of these elements than that of any other country in Europe or America. Lastly, the negroes, between whom and the whites, Europe was told, there existed a smouldering but deadly feud, ready to break out at the first opportunity, have resisted, with truly amazing constancy which the lower orders of few countries under similar circumstances could have equalled, every temptation to separate their interests from those of their masters. It is justly due to the negroes of the South, that in proportion to their humbler means and capacities, they have vied in patriotism with the whites, and if aught of good to that race can come out of this war it will be that they, like the whites, are ennobled by unselfish and holy devotion.

Now, what are the accusations brought against the institutions of the South? That they debauched her higher classes, degraded the mass of her white population, and embruted the negro. Is it asking the English people to cease their abhorrence of debauchery, lawlessness, and brutality, if we ask them, with the proofs before us, to acquit the South of each and all of these accusations? Do we solicit their admiration or even their tolerance for all the abominations which they associate with the idea of slavery, by convincing them that these abominations, however inseparable they may be from other systems elsewhere, have nothing to do with the Southern system? It is truly horrible to reduce human beings to the condition of cattle, to breed them, to sell them, and otherwise dispose of them, as cattle. But is it defending such practices to say that the South does none of these things, but that on the contrary, both in theory and in practice, she treats the negro as a fellow-creature, with a soul to be saved, with feelings to be respected, though in the social order in a subordinate place, and of an intellectual organisation which requires guardianship with mutual duties and obligations? This system is called slavery, because it developed itself out of an older and very different one of that name, but for this the South is not to blame.

A whole literature will be opposed to the assertion of the truth. Let the defenders boldly challenge controversy on the field of facts; the more searching the investigation, the more complete the evidence, the more fairly will the character of the Southern people be cleared of aspersion. So is there an anti-social literature in every country, and consisting of precisely the same materials. Substitute in the place of the Southern slaveholder any of the more homely personages of a well-known class of fiction, the debauched nobleman, the aristocratic seducer, the grinding employer, the wealthy villain, and you have the pabulum which the art of printing has provided for obscene imaginations everywhere, and which in its more dangerous form hounds class against class. The dramatis personæ change their stage costumes with the changing taste of the period. At one time it was the monks and priests that committed all the monstrous villanies of the novels; during the French Revolution it was the kings and queens, with their courtiers; just now it is fashionable young ladies, and the scene is shifted from subterranean vaults and oubliettes to the drawing-room. As for the heroine, whose virtue suffers so many hair-breadth escapes, we recognise her instantly in the mulatto or quadroon slave girl; only that in her case the lovers of the sensational are usually gratified by a refinement on the old and stale-worn horrors. The only difference between this miscalled literature and that which Federal America has bestowed on Europe is, that decent people estimate the former at its just value, while the latter piqued curiosity by the novelty of its scenery, and still imposes on credulity by its former coincidence with a strong current of popular feeling.

But of this the friends of the South may be assured, that so long as they make no determined effort to relieve the Southern character from this false drapery, they will never gain for it that respect, that confidence in the rectitude of Southern motives, that active sympathy, which can alone evoke effective assistance. Men will not readily interfere on behalf of murderers, robbers, and tyrants, wherever the abstract right may lie, and they will be prone to accept excuses for not so interfering, even after they are convinced that it is their duty. The best assurance you can give that the destinies of the negro race are safe in Southern hands is, not that the South will repent and reform, but that she has consistently and conscientiously been the friend and benefactor of that race. Southern expostulations against the tone assumed by some of her advocates are sometimes met by the reply that the South has no right to complain of the manner in which Englishmen endeavour to assist her, and that she has only to accept the benefit of their assistance without questioning their means. Even if this reasoning could appease the scruples of so pre-eminently truth-loving a people as the South, it is utterly fallacious. A powerful prejudice may be likened to an infuriated wild beast; it is unwise to provoke its attack, but, if attacked, there is no safety but in boldly confronting it. Truth must be fought for; it cannot be insinuated by a dexterous mixture with falsehood. And in a bold battle for truth there are many defeats, but the gains of victory are always with the defeated. No cause has ever prospered which its advocates dared not wholly espouse. The Peace party in the North at this moment, reduced from a numerical majority to an insignificant and despised faction, is a melancholy illustration of this axiom in politics.

There is still a higher consideration than that of expediency, why the advocates of the South should make no concession, which is not warranted by the facts, to the popular prejudice. The South fights not only for independence, but for the vindication of her national character. The blood and the tears which she is shedding are not only to baptise her liberty; they are to wash out the stains which a fiendish malignity has cast upon her. To the whole force of the argument which is attested by a national martyrdom, she has an indisputable title, and she has a right to expect that no part of it should be lost or wasted by the timidity of her friends. The hope of material assistance she has long since abandoned: much less would she now purchase it at the price of her self-respect; let her champions, then, lend her the only aid which they are able to render—that of seeing that justice is done to her past as well as to her present.

It is, therefore, always with pain that we hear such expressions as "the foul blot," and similar ones, fall from the lips of earnest promoters of Confederate independence. As a concession they are useless; as a confession they are untrue. There might be some sense in speaking of the paupers, the criminals, or the insane, as the "foul blot" on the escutcheon of the British nation, and yet the expression would be both harsh and unjust. It might fairly be retorted that Great Britain is proud, justly proud, not of having poor, but of the boundless charity which in no other country gushes forth so abundantly and spontaneously for the relief of distress; not of having criminals, but of having set the example of treating them with humanity; not of having in her population the usual victims of density and intense activity, but of the tenderness with which she cares for these unfortunates. Now, the South has no paupers, and remarkably few criminals and lunatics, but one-fourth of her population is of a race marked by nature with striking physical differences and differing equally in moral and intellectual peculiarities. For the presence of this race she is in no other sense responsible than that under her protection they have increased from half a million to their present numbers. The "foul blot" consists in her subjecting all the individuals of this race to family government, upon essentially the same principles and for similar reasons as the whole of one sex, and all the minors of our own race are so subjected. This is literally the head and front of her offending. But under every other system the juxtaposition of two widely differing races has heretofore been impossible, and has ended either in cruel hardship to the weaker race, or more often its utter extermination. The South, on the contrary, has found this race in a condition little above the level of the brute creation—be it always remembered that she neither sought them nor reduced them from a higher to a lower state—and in fifty years she has educated them to such a degree that all mankind now clamours for their freedom as the equals and peers of the white men. We may wish that all men were free, and worthy of freedom, just as we wish that all men were prosperous, virtuous, and of sound mind, but we can only deal with the facts as God has made them, and set ourselves honestly each to the performance of the duties assigned him by an Allwise Power. Thus the Southerner may retort as we have seen that an Englishman would retort for his country. He might say the South is proud, and of nothing more proud than this—not that she has slaves, but that she has treated them as slaves never were treated before, that she has used power as no nation ever used it under similar circumstances, and that she has solved mercifully and humanely a most difficult problem which has elsewhere defied solution save in blood. Or he might use the unspoken reflection of an honest Southerner at hearing much said of "the foul blot:" "It was indeed a dark and damnable blot that England left us with, and it required all the efforts of Southern Christianity to pale it as it now is."

Ministerial Evasions.

There is something very strange in the persistent refusal of the Administration to lay before Parliament the correspondence which has passed between the Foreign-office and the Government of the United States. The alleged reasons for that refusal are two-fold. It is said that in one or two cases negotiations are still pending; and that it is not usual under such circumstances to publish the despatches already sent and received. This is true enough; but it is also true that this rule has been broken whenever it has been thought by the Government of the day that the publication of such despatches would tend to satisfy the public at home without interfering with the action of the Government abroad. Now no one supposes for a moment that the publication of the correspondence in the cases of the Margaret and Jessie, the Science, and the Saxon would tend to delay or hamper any attempts which Lord Russell may be making to obtain redress for the gross violations of public law committed by Federal officers; and it is only fair to conclude that, in his opinion the production of the papers would not tend to satisfy public feeling, but to excite it; that is, that their effect would be to convince the British people that their honour is not safe in the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers. In regard to other and still more important papers, urgently demanded by the Opposition in both Houses of Parliament, it is pleaded that the documents called for relate to a matter which has been brought under the jurisdiction of our courts of justice, and that a parliamentary discussion of the subject would prejudice the case of the Crown. It may be answered that the Crown has not usually been in the habit of making a mystery of its case; that the secresy, chicanery, and abuse of legal technicalities which are allowable in a civil suit between private parties have never been supposed appropriate to the conduct of a prosecution by the Attorney-General; that already there has been more than enough of vexation, delay, and oppression practised by the Crown lawyers against the owners of the Alexandra and the builders of the Mersey ironclads, and that the country has a right to know why the one was seized more than a year ago and the others so long back as September last. A more conclusive reply is, that what Parliament desires to know is, not the case of the Attorney-General against Sillem or against Messrs. Laird, but what has passed between Lord Russell and Mr.

Seward in regard to certain demands preferred by the latter; and that the two things have no direct bearing upon one another. It is possible that Lord Russell has been right, and has maintained the honour of the country in his correspondence with the Federal Government, and yet that there is no good case for the prosecution instituted by his orders; on the other hand, it is quite possible that the conduct of the Foreign-office has been cowardly and dishonourable, and yet that the Crown has a conclusive case against the vessels under seizure. The one is a diplomatic, the other a judicial question; it is with the former only that Parliament is concerned and on that only can the papers throw light; and the attempt to intermix and confuse the two distinct subjects of inquiry, with a view to postpone that which properly belongs to the House of Commons, is simply a piece of disingenuous special pleading, which raises the gravest suspicions that the evidence which the Government are so anxious to suppress must be of a very damaging character. Nor can the Foreign Secretary escape by pleading the authority of the law officers. Those gentlemen are, of course, anxious that the Ministry shall run no risk of ejectment; and more than this, one of the two was very recently counsel for the Federal embassy under very suspicious circumstances, and has thereby deprived his opinion on such a question of all moral weight. There is, therefore, no reason why the correspondence should not be produced; there are the strongest reasons why it should. Not only is the political reputation of the Foreign Secretary at stake—not only is he suspected, on very weighty presumptive evidence, of having unworthily cringed and truckled to the Government of the United States—but a question has arisen affecting his personal honour. The correspondence, or one version of it, has been published in America; and in the American publication is found a copy of a despatch, supposed to have been communicated to Lord Russell, in which the most insolent menaces are employed in order to compel Great Britain to take steps inconsistent with her duty as a neutral Power. Great indignation was excited by the appearance of this document, and Lord Russell and his subordinate, when called to account, flatly denied that any such despatch had ever been communicated to the Foreign Secretary, whether verbally or in writing, and that he had never heard of it till he saw it in the newspapers, which had copied it from the American correspondence. Now, the rule in such a case is clear. Parliament is bound to accept the word of a Minister of State, whatever may be the counter-assertions of foreign Governments; and on the other hand, the Minister is bound to use all possible diligence in vindicating himself, and proving beyond a doubt that he has spoken the literal truth. It is impossible to suppose that a man of honour would be content to allow such a matter to rest in doubt for a single moment; and therefore the non-production of the correspondence necessary to clear up the mystery and effectually vindicate the personal honour of the Foreign Secretary is a scandal and a source of grave uneasiness. There must be some very serious apprehension of danger from the publication of the required documentary evidence to induce Lord Russell to allow a question which touches him so nearly to remain unsettled for a single hour. Now, there can be no danger to the public interest from the presentation to Parliament of the whole of a correspondence, of which a version, said to be garbled and unfair, has been already given to the world through the American Congress. The apprehended danger, therefore, must be to the Ministry. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the papers are withheld from Parliament because it is felt that they contain evidence on which, if once a discussion be allowed, the Government must be convicted of having forgotten its duty and betrayed its trust.

The evasive, shuffling, disingenuous tone of Lord Russell's reply to Lord Derby, on Thursday night, is sufficient in itself to convince every one that the Minister is conscious of having done that which the country will not approve, and of having failed to do that which the honour and dignity of England required. Lord Derby demanded specific explanations on several matters, which he stated with his usual distinctness. He pointed out that on the 1st September Lord Russell has declared that there was no evidence on which the Mersey ironclads could be seized; that on the 5th September Mr. Adams replied by a note, threatening, in unequivocal terms, that war should be the consequence of their departure from Liverpool; and that immediately on the receipt of this note Lord Russell had communicated to Mr. Adams his determination to seize the vessels in question. Lord Russell's answer—if answer it could be called—was, that the decision to seize the ships, though not communicated to Mr. Adams till after the receipt of his menacing note of the 5th, was formed before that note was received. Of course this is a point of which the sole evidence remains in Lord Russell's own breast. We are bound to believe him, but others will not do so. Europe and America alike will inevitably believe that it was the threat of Mr. Adams, and nothing else, which induced the Foreign Secretary to retract his letter of the 1st September; and they will draw the necessary conclusion, that the way to extort concessions from England is by bluster and menace. Why was no fitting rebuke administered to Mr. Adams? Because Lord Russell thought that gentleman justified in his menace. "If armed vessels go from our ports to wage war on the United States, it is a good cause of war against us." Possibly; but was there any question of armed vessels being despatched from Liverpool? Most assuredly not, and this Lord Russell knows as well as we do, and in insinuating the contrary he was guilty of a gross equivocation. Lord Derby called attention to the destruction of the Margaret and Jessie within half a mile of a British island; so close to the shore that shot and shell fell among the dwellings and in the plantations of the inhabitants, to their great peril and alarm. Lord Russell had not a word to say; not the ghost of an answer to make. Lord Derby directed attention to the promise of Lord Russell at Blairgowrie, that the Foreign Enlistment Act should be altered to meet the demands of the Federal Government—a promise which also had the appearance of being extorted by the insolent note of the 5th September—and remarked with great justice, that if it be an act of bad faith towards one belligerent not to put our laws in force, it is equally an act of hostility to the other to alter those laws, durante bello, for the advantage of his enemy. Again Lord Russell was silent: let us hope from shame. All he could do was to eulogise the prize courts of the United States, and to shelter himself under the shelter of an appeal, in general terms, to the authority of Sir R. Palmer, and his colleague—late the legal adviser of Mr. Adams.

On the next evening Mr. Fitzgerald brought up several questions touching the proceedings of Federal cruisers in the House of Commons. The defence of the Government was entrusted to the Attorney-General, who contrived to make a defence for the Federal Prize Courts in the case of the Springbok, but was compelled to own that, in the three other instances cited by Mr. Fitzgerald, a gross and unpardonable outrage had been committed. The Science was seized in the neutral harbour of Matamoras, while loading with neutral property from that town. The Attorney-General had no doubt that she would be released in time, because, although twenty ships seized with similar contempt of law have been condemned, one vessel, by some strange caprice of conscience in the judge, was acquitted. The Margaret and Jessie was chased, fired into, and sunk within 500 yards of our shore, as much within our jurisdiction as if she had lain in the Liverpool docks. The captain of the Federal cruiser had, it appears, the impudence to deny that the operation took place in British waters, although his shot and shell actually fell on British soil; the papers were not sent to Mr. Seward till months after the occurrence: months have now elapsed since they were sent and no satisfaction has been offered; and now Mr. Attorney-General bids us wait patiently till it shall please Mr. Seward to support the falsehood of Captain Trenchard or to "disavow" his act, and in either case to accept the decision of a friendly Government with becoming humility and gratitude.

The worst is to come. A cowardly and cruel murder was committed by a Federal officer on board a British ship; deliberately perpetrated, with that evidence of malice prepense which is conclusively afforded by a previous threat of assassination. Mr. Fitzgerald desires to know what means Her Majesty's Government has taken to exact vengeance for this crowning outrage; and he is informed that Lord Russell has intimated to the Federal Government his opinion that the offender ought to be brought to trial; which opinion has been so far respected that an investigation has taken place, and long ere now the murder has been formally pronounced an "accident." It was just as much an accident as a certain murder on a Japanese high road, for which Japan has had to pay £125,000, has seen three ships burnt and a great city shelled and fired. So it appears that when an ignorant barbarian in hot blood cuts down an Englishman who is defying the customs of his country, England exacts the amplest vengeance that a great Power can take on a weak one; even to the bombardment of a populous town and the massacre of hundreds of women and children. When the uniformed officer of a civilised and responsible Government deliberately, wantonly, and in cold blood assassinates an unoffending Englishman, we are delighted to obtain an expression of half-contemptuous regret from his superior, and content to suggest to his Government the propriety of bringing him to trial!

Lord Robert Cecil expressed the almost universal feeling of Englishmen in a speech of remarkable truth and bitterness, describing the policy of the present Ministry in a phrase which will not soon be forgotten: "Unlimited ferocity in the East, unlimited humiliation in the West." Unsparing severity to the weak, unbounded forbearance to the strong; bluster and bombs for those who cannot resist us, soft words and patient endurance for those who are bold enough to threaten us: these are the maxims of Lord Russell's administration, these are now supposed throughout the world to be the standing rules of British policy.

Scandinavia.

When the traveller crosses from Germany into Denmark he soon perceives that he has passed from a lower to a higher grade of political civilisation. In the former country he saw a people who have displayed wonderful intellectual activity, who have on many a bloody field proved their valour, who are numerically greater than any other European nationality, who boast that they are free from the yoke of priestly domination, and yet who, with all these excellent qualities and advantages, are essentially a "prince-ridden" people, being under the yoke of the multitude of royal personages amongst whom the country is divided as though it were their private patrimony. This observation, which is applied to the political and not to the social condition of Germany, is aptly illustrated by what has lately occurred in Prussia. There a king not distinguished for statesmanship or for military prowess, has openly defied his subjects, has treated the Constitution with measureless contempt, and his subjects have submitted to the wrongs and the insults with a servile equanimity, which, happily for the honour of humanity, is without precedent. Or take the late high-handed proceedings of Austria and Prussia as an example. On paper, though not in fact, the German Diet is the representative through the various governments of the rights of the whole Fatherland, and is supposed to be a shield by which the least of the States is protected from the oppressive ambition of the greatest. There is no doubt that lately the vast majority of Germans—the minority only consisting of princes and court parasites—have cultivated a considerable esteem for the Diet, and have endorsed its policy respecting the Danish duchies. A Federal execution in Holstein was ordered, and Germany was in ecstacies; but the joy was of short duration, for it pleased Joseph of Austria and William of Prussia to set aside the order of the Diet, to oust the Federal army of occupation, and to take the business into their own charge. Germany is very indignant, whines, and submits. In short, no people has so little real political power as the Germans, and the Czar is not in practice so thoroughly a despotic ruler as the Emperor of Austria, and still less so than the King of Prussia. What a totally different aspect is presented by Denmark! Under the most unfavourable circumstances, that is, whilst harassed by continual threats of invasion, constitutional government has made such rapid progress that the Danes are in the enjoyment of a full measure of freedom. Neither in theory nor in practice has England a freer constitution than Denmark. With an intense love of country, and with proud and inspiring recollections of past greatness, the Danes, though few in number, present a bold front, and command the cordial respect of Europe. They only need extent of territory and population to wield a powerful influence, whilst the Germans, who have a large country and are a numerous nationality, seem to lack every other requisite for national development. Germany has the opportunity but not the energy; Denmark has the energy but not the opportunity, and has been wont to look to the establishment of a Scandinavian kingdom as a remedy for the weakness that leaves her too dependent on the sagacity, the courage, and the honesty of fallible allies. Perhaps the map of Europe may never be marked with the United Kingdom of Scandinavia, and we do not think that the crown of Christian is now in danger. Earl Russell is no longer his foreign minister, and therefore his people loyally confide in his patriotism and devotion. Our present purpose is not to speculate on possible changes in the North, but to expose some erroneous views that are held on the subject of a Kingdom of Scandinavia.

It is worthy of remark that the Treaty of London (1852) was negotiated mainly on account of a reported project of union between Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. After the last war the Danes openly canvassed the policy of proclaiming the King of Sweden as their king on the demise of their then reigning sovereign, and it was this that induced Russia, Austria, and Prussia to take such a deep interest in the settlement of the succession. But for the fear of having too strong a neighbour Russia would not so generously have resigned her claims to a portion of the disputed territory with-but the slightest compensation. Prussia, coveting the duchies, would not have been anxious to save Denmark from a war of succession, had it not been for the purpose of averting the threatened amalgamation. Yet there are many who think, when Denmark talks about giving up her individuality, it is an idle menace. They argue that Denmark would be altogether lost in the new kingdom, and that a nation will never, except on compulsion, so stultify itself.

This line of argument is not only false, but the very reverse of the truth. Despite her slight numerical inferiority, Denmark, in a United Kingdom of Scandinavia, would hold a position analogous to that of England in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Denmark has an enormous advantage in geographical situation, which would make her the entrepôt for the foreign commerce of the whole kingdom, and which must contribute to her political importance by bringing her into nearer contact with other European nations. Indeed, so apparent is it that Denmark would lead, that the Swedes formerly shrank from union with her, and used much the same arguments that were familiar to Scottish and Irish patriots, who opposed the consolidation of these dominions; and we may add, the same arguments that were adduced by many Neapolitans against the establishment of the Kingdom of Italy. It is impossible not to sympathise with the sentiment that makes a separate community dislike the prospect of becoming a province, though it may be sufficiently clear that the fusion is advantageous, and peculiarly so to the poorer States. Sweden and Norway would gain in every respect from a political copartnership with Denmark, and the inequalities are not so great as to make Denmark dominant though that country would occupy the most prominent position. Lately the Swedes and Norwegians have seen the matter in its true light and the union would be popular. We only mention the previous disinclination to show that those who are best informed and most interested do not think that to merge herself in a Scandinavian Kingdom would involve a fearful sacrifice on the part of Denmark.

Another error in connection with this subject is the idea very general in Germany and we believe entertained by some Englishmen, that the establishment of a Scandinavian Kingdom would put an end to all difficulties about Slesvig and Holstein by the surrender of those duchies to Germany. We admit that the Swedes abhor the prospect of any political connection with Germany; and that the main objection heretofore urged to a union with Denmark was the relations between Holstein and the Diet. This did not apply to Slesvig, because Germany has no more right to interfere in that duchy than she has in Ireland, and Sweden has never hesitated to declare that Germany ought to be kept out of it at any cost. The present inaction of Sweden is partly due to English diplomacy which has been busy in breaking, as far as possible, the cordial alliance between Copenhagen and Stockholm, and partly to the intimacy between France and Sweden, which induces the latter to wait upon the policy of the former. We shall yet see that Sweden will do something more than protest against the invasion of Slesvig. Besides, it is important to Sweden now, and would be even more so if united with Denmark, that the port of Kiel, the finest harbour in Europe, should not pass into the hands of Germany. So long as Scandinavia retains her naval superiority—that is, so long as Germany has no navy—she has a powerful weapon of offence which, to some extent, compensates for the comparative smallness of her land forces. To permit Germany to hold Slesvig and Holstein would do more than give her a port. Germany has ports already, and Austria some excellent ports, but they have no navy worth the mention because they have no sailors. Slesvig and Holstein have a seafaring population, and would afford recruiting ground for manning a navy. But it may be asked whether Sweden, in the event of a union with Denmark, would wish to retain Holstein as well as Slesvig. In the first place Germany does not care very much for Holstein without Slesvig, and hence the fraudulent claim of the Prince of Augustenburg has been countenanced, to the end that the two duchies might be taken together. The port of Kiel is bounded on one side by Holstein and on the other by Slesvig, so that it is of no military value except to a Power owning both duchies. Now Sweden has never advised Denmark to part with her rights over Holstein, but has advised exactly the settlement proposed by the November Constitution. Holstein was to be entirely self-governed and was only to be connected to Denmark by allegiance to a common sovereign. Every concession was granted except that of permitting the duchy to become the naval recruiting ground for Germany, and thereby enable a powerful and aggressive neighbour to deprive Scandinavia of her sole bulwark—her naval superiority, and, so far as Germany is concerned, her absolute naval supremacy. If Denmark unites with Sweden and Norway it will not be because Slesvig is resigned and Holstein given up to be a Prussian province, but rather to redeem Slesvig from the invader and to prevent Holstein becoming the basis for further aggression.

It would be a real sorrow for Englishmen to see the grandsire of their future king deprived of a crown for no other fault than trusting to the good faith of an English minister, and we cling to the hope that Denmark will be saved from disintegration, not, indeed, by the idle wind that Earl Russell calls moral suasion, but by the might that has before this forced Austria and Prussia to respect right. Were it not, however, for King Christian, we should fail to discover a single objection to the formation of a Kingdom of Scandinavia, and it seems to us that there are many reasons for desiring such a consummation. At all events, it will be wise for those who wish to keep Denmark and Sweden and Norway separate, to remember that there is nothing in the contemplation of a union to wound the pride of Dane, Swede, or Norwegian; and those who strive to enforce a Scandinavian union, hoping thereby to get rid of the Slesvig and Holstein question, should prudently reflect on the situation, and they will see that such a union does not imply an abandonment of the duchies, but rather offers a material guarantee for their retention. We repeat, that if it were not for King Christian, or if the loss of a crown was not one of those misfortunes that are impossible to compensate, we should not hesitate to point to a United Kingdom of Scandinavia as the surest guarantee against the encroachments of Germany; and as the best means for developing the resources of the country, and promoting the welfare and happiness of the people.

MR. DE BOW AND THE "STAR."—It is unpleasant to charge even an enemy with deliberate falsehood, and we are disposed, therefore, to set a good portion of the persistent use of forged documents, which has become a feature in the polemics of the Federal and Anglo-Yankee press, to the account of a childish credulity. A ludicrous instance of this has just been afforded by our contemporary the Morning Star. A New York paper reports the arrest at Richmond of Mr. De Bow, the eminent Southern statistician, editor of the Review bearing his name, and holding a very responsible position under the Secretary of the Treasury. The report is probably a mistake; at all events the reasons are not stated, and the information is derived exclusively through the dubious medium aforesaid. Whereupon the New York Evening Post, the only New York paper which has any claim to genuine wit, invents a reason for the amusement of its readers. Mr. De Bow was remembered as giving place in his Review to the writings of the most advanced, and in some cases, the extreme Southern thinkers; but his reputation mainly rests upon his statistical labours, which essentially contributed to arouse the Southern people to a consciousness of their resources and the extortions of the Northern protective legislation. The Evening Post, therefore, did not perpetrate so very bad a joke in fathering him with an article, written with some imitation of his style, which it alleges to have been suppressed by the Confederate authorities, who have allowed unbridled license to the press, and to have been the cause of Mr. De Bow's arrest. In this article Mr. De Bow is made to recant all he ever said about Southern wealth and Northern profits, and the commercial importance of cotton, to confess the utter failure of the Southern cause, and to wind up with a new theory of political economy, proposing a new standard of national development, to wit, the raising of milch cows, and the relative number of these useful animals in various countries. The intended irony was broadly conveyed, but not, it appears, sufficiently broad for the apprehension of our astute contemporary. Will it be believed that it swallows the joke bodily, and gravely moralises over the conversion of the distinguished Southern economist, in a leader running over the third column? Vide Morning Star of 15th inst.

THE CANADIAN EXPEDITION.—A gentleman who was engaged in the frustrated attempt to rescue the Confederate prisoners confined on Johnson's Island, near the Canadian frontier, writes to us to correct some mis-statements which have obtained currency through the Federal press. He says:—"You are aware of the leading facts of this affair and know that our object was defeated by the authorities of the Province. Perhaps you have already learned the secrets of the plan, but if you have not, a few words might be of service. The prisoners who had been released from Johnson's Island, the Federal prison in Lake Erie, conceived a plan to capture the Island and release the large number of officers confined there. The assent of the Confederate Government was asked, but long refused, from a doubt whether it could be effected without violating the neutrality of British territory. This objection was at last so far overcome that a certain number of officers received leave to attempt the hazardous experiment, but under strict orders to do or permit no act, directly or indirectly liable to be construed into such violation, to buy no materials of war and enlist no assistance on British soil, but only to exercise the right of passage as individuals. Accordingly, upon arriving in Canada, arms and cannon were purchased in New York, and were sent by parties there up to the lake where we could get them. Not an article was obtained in Canada. Even medicines and surgical instruments were furnished from New York, and all correspondence with the prisoners was carried on through the personal column of the New York Herald. Several British officers wished to join, but they, as also the assistance of many Canadian gentlemen, were refused. The basis of our operations was to be on Yankee territory, the means for carrying out our object, viz., to release the prisoners, were to be obtained there alone. This principle was adhered to in perfect good faith, in spirit as well as in letter, though not without some difficulty. Success would have been certain, had not an unexpected obstacle caused delay. The Michigan, a Federal gunboat, had anchored off the island, and it then became necessary to capture her before releasing the prisoners. To do this more men were necessary, and some Confederates, who had recently escaped from camps Chase and Douglas, were taken as volunteers. There was no one of the party owing allegiance to Great Britain, or who had "found an asylum on her soil," as the papers had it. But when we had completed our preparations, with the aid of friends in the Federal States, the very day before it was to have been executed, it reached the ears of the Governor-General, and the Yankees being immediately warned by him, it became impossible.

"Such is the whole affair in a nutshell. You will see that all we asked of the Canadian authorities was the right of passage to Yankeedom, individually and unarmed, we having neither the means nor the intention to commit a belligerent act before reaching Yankee jurisdiction. You can draw your own inference from the facts. Some of the Canadian and even some of the English papers, I am told, have taken a different, and, as it appears to me, a wholly erroneous view of the matter."

THE LATE NEGRO MUTINY.—No authentic account of the termination of the late murderous mutiny of the negro garrison at Fort Jackson, on the Lower Mississippi, has yet reached us, though it is doubtless long since quelled. From the Southern papers we gather a few meagre particulars, which, however, add but little to our previous information. The mutinous regiments, it is stated by released Confederate prisoners, are not Northern coloured regiments, but consisted of negroes enlisted and organised by General Banks. Such regiments are generally unreliable and unmanageable, and their offensive behaviour had induced the commanding-general to rescind the original order by which they were allowed to elect their own officers and of their own colour. All officers of this class had been reduced to the ranks, their places being filled with white men appointed by General Banks, and a very severe system of repressive discipline had been instituted against the privates, a great number of whom were sentenced for trifling offences to long periods of service, without pay. This appears to have been the immediate cause of the outbreak, and of the other disturbances along the Mississippi river, some of which could only be quelled at considerable loss of life by strong detachments of white troops. The Southern prisoners who have returned from New Orleans say that the negro troops enlisted in the South can never be of any service to the Federals, and are rather a danger to them; but they contradict the report, which, indeed, we never credited, that in the special cases referred to the negroes counted upon or expected Confederate assistance. The number of white men hung at Fort Jackson was 27; the garrison at Fort Philip, which is only in part negro, remained comparatively quiet. No general release of Confederate prisoners, as was believed, had taken place, as the only white prisoners in Fort Jackson were a few civilians. At the time of the outbreak in that place, General Banks issued a circular to all the newspapers, assuring them that the disturbance was trifling, and requesting the insertion of a paragraph to that effect. Any publication referring to the matter is strictly prohibited and instantly suppressed.

THE "ARMY AND NAVY GAZETTE" ON THE DANISH WAR.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The first article in last week's number of the Army and Navy Gazette rests upon a hypothesis so entirely false that, in justice to the small Danish army, it ought to be corrected. The article states: "The sharp and dexterous descent of General Wrangel on the left of the Danish position is more perfect and decisive than anything the American generals have yet done;" and further, "if they (the Americans) had a Frederick Carl on the one side, or a Von Wrangel on the other, then," &c..

I should be very sorry to deprive these two personages of the military glory which their antecedents have not yet procured them, and which bombastic proclamations alone, like those of Prince Carl, do not give them, but truth and justice compel me to say that the Danish retreat from the Danneverke had nothing whatever to do with the flank movement on the Schlei, or with the "sharp and dexterous descent of General Wrangel," or, in fact, with any movement of the Allied army. A simple statement of dates and facts will prove this. The retreat of the Danes was decided on in a council of war, held on Thursday night, the 11th inst., while the army under Prince Carl, only crossed the Schlei at 2 o'clock on Saturday morning, the 13th. The evacuation of the Danneverke began at 7 o'clock on Friday evening, and the advanced posts were withdrawn at midnight, while the flanking movement only was effected two hours later. The retreat was ordered simply because the length of the position and the want of sufficient resources made the Danneverke untenable. Both parties were at the time mutually ignorant of the retreat and the flanking movement, and the former was, therefore, not in consequence of the latter. Prince Carl did not flank the Danish army, because there was no army to flank; he succeeded in crossing the Schlei, because there was no enemy, and instead of strategic victory, we must simply read "numerical superiority of the Germans."

So far the Austrian non-German troops, whose lives are not considered very precious, have borne the whole brunt of the work, and fought well and bravely, while Prince Carl has performed the prodigious feat of walking over the Schlei with the same ease as he might walk over London Bridge; for this his soldiers receive their reward by being called the "Liberators of Slesvig." Whether such generals would be an acquisition to America, I must leave to Americans to decide.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

A DANE

A NEW ALLY.

To the Editor of The Index.

Manchester, February 17.

Sir,—The Confederate cause has obtained a new and unexpected ally in the Rev. A. Mursell, a popular preacher in this city, and as much run after as Spurgeon. The effect produced by his lecture on Sunday afternoon has completely taken the "Northerners" by surprise, and the greatest consternation prevails among them at the idea of his following up the subject. Mr. Mursell is the more zealous for being a convert, and I am sure he has a lively recollection of the trick played upon him by the chaplain of the George Griswold.

Yours, &c., Q.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, January 23.

The contemplated movement upon Mobile is still the absorbing topic here. As already stated, the movement is being prepared on an extensive scale. Probably I should have said movements, as it is well understood that General McPherson will co-operate with Banks by moving a column out from Vicksburg; but the success of this co-operating movement is extremely problematical, as General Leonidas Polk, who commands in Mississippi, is fully advised of the enemy's intentions, and is making all due preparations. Indeed, so generally known is the designed attack upon Mobile, and the plan of the campaign, that I should think this widespread publicity a ruse, but for the fact, as stated in my last, that troops are being concentrated at such points as leave no doubt that the "Gulf City" is seriously menaced. Banks has occupied East Pascagoula, and is fortifying it as his base; and nearly all the coast villages on the opposite (from New Orleans) side of Lake Pontchartrain are also in his possession. Ship Island is the great depôt of supplies and the halting place for the men before being transported to East Pascagoula. Notwithstanding all these movements, I adhere to my opinion that Banks cannot seriously threaten Mobile until largely reinforced, or unless he should withdraw his forces from Western Louisiana, the line of the Rio Grande, and the strip of Texas coast which he now holds.

Nothing is positively known regarding the co-operation of the Federal fleet in the attack upon Mobile, though Admiral Farragut sailed from New York on the 4th inst. for New Orleans, in his old flag-ship, the Hartford, which has been thoroughly overhauled and supplied with several Parrott guns. It was rumoured yesterday that the fleet had begun the attack, the admiral of the Gulf squadron having arrived off the harbour. But as he is ordered to report direct to General Banks, it is not likely he would stop on his way to attack the now formidable forts (Morgan and Gaines) and the numerous sand batteries in Mobile Bay, to say nothing of the gunboats and ironclads of Admiral Buchanan, unless he considered their destruction quite a small job, as "Old Abe" would say. There was some foundation, however, for the rumoured attack, as the annexed extract from a letter, written by an officer of one of the blockading fleet, and dated off Mobile, January 9th, will clearly show:—

> The monotony of our blockade life was broken this morning by the discovery of a steamer ashore under the guns of Fort Morgan. All the vessels of the fleet got under way; and while some repaired to the flag-ship for instructions, the Octorara steamed in and opened fire on the rebel craft, which speedily drew a reply from the fort. The rest of the fleet soon steamed in and took up their positions, when the fire became quite spirited. The rebel steamer was struck several times and abandoned; but she lay so near the fort that it was impossible to get her out. Finding our efforts to set her on fire were fruitless, the fleet withdrew, after firing for two hours. The rebels used a fine Whitworth gun, with which they made some fair shots, fortunately doing no injury. During the action a man was lost overboard from the Itasca and drowned, by becoming entangled in the lead line, at which he was stationed. Yesterday the Octarora went in under a flag of truce, carrying an English officer to communicate with his country's consul. We were allowed to approach to within a quarter of a mile of the fort, nearer than ever they allowed us to come before. We found many changes had taken place since last we took a near view of the place, more than a year ago. The walls are now concealed and protected by a heavy embankment of sand, against which shot and shell vainly pound.
> "The rebel steamer" to which the writer refers, was one of two that got past the blockading fleet during the previous night. The other was safely moored at her wharf, and the one at which the fleet vainly fired for two hours was also taken off without injury when the enemy withdrew; all of which I learn from a gentleman arrived here this week from Mobile. When the fleet attempts the capture of Mobile it will find "many changes" not witnessed on the 9th inst. There are several batteries contiguous to Fort Morgan, the whereabouts of which the Yankee will never know until with hostile intent he comes within range of their fire. The battered walls of Fort Sumter have taught a lesson which the Confederates have not been slow to improve. Forts Morgan and Gaines are now in condition to "laugh a siege to scorn," at least such a one as the Yankee monitors might attempt. But probably the ironclads and gunboats under command of Admiral Buchanan will prove even of more value in the defence of the city. They form quite a formidable fleet. Some of them are rams of great power, and it is the knowledge of this fact and the well-known fighting character of Admiral Buchanan, the hero of the Virginia (the Merrimac), that creates a feeling of intense anxiety in the entire department of the Gulf. Every available craft that could be spared from here was despatched this week to the Mobile blockading fleet, to lend a helping hand in case of attack, but they will be only so much the more prey for the destroyer. If their mission is to pick up the drowning crews of the blockaders after their encounters with the rams, why there is wisdom; but to send them there to fight is to seal their fate. When the famous Confederate ironclad ram Virginia, constructed from the United States frigate Merrimac, had repaired the few slight injuries she received in her encounter with the first monitor and the frigates Cumberland, Congress, and other vessels of the Federal fleet off Fortress Monroe, she sallied out again to attack her new antagonist, but the latter declined the gage of battle and sought shelter under the frowning walls of the huge fortress. The Yankees were beside themselves over the "impregnability" of the monitor, and boasted that if the Virginia dared show herself again Captain Ericsson's craft would sink her. But when the evacuation of Norfolk compelled the destruction of the Virginia, the low stage of the James river not admitting her being carried up its waters any distance, the truth came out. Philadelphia and New York were no longer in fear and trembling anticipating a visit of the "rebel monitor," and then it was that the Northern press admitted that the Washington Government's only hope of ridding itself of so terrible an enemy as the Virginia was in running her down by the steamship Vanderbilt, then a merchantman, now one of the finest vessels in the Federal navy. With this view she was purchased by the Government and despatched to Fortress Monroe. The same expedient has been resorted to here this week, and with all that mystification and systematic lying so characteristic of Federal officials. We have in port a new, very fast and powerful steamship, the Mississippi, of the Boston and New Orleans line. She is at present chartered by the Government, and was by authority announced in the city press to leave on the morning of the 21st inst. for New York, carrying the New Orleans mails. The Federal postmaster then put out the usual poster, announcing the closing of the mail-bags on the previous evening. This morning, the 21st, and the evening of the 21st, come and go, but not the steamship Mississippi. She has injured her propeller, says Dame Rumour. But the whole affair was a ruse. And while at Federal headquarters they are felicitating themselves on the success of their very elaborate sham, and the Yankee postmaster stows away the mail-bags to await the regular mail steamer on Saturday, the rebels are despatching messengers to Admiral Buchanan, informing him of the "true intent and meaning" of this "Yankee trick." By this time he knows that there was no intention of sending the Mississippi to New York with the mails, but that when she had run down the river sufficiently below the city as to be out of the range of rebel curiosity, she would receive a few heavy guns, have her bulwarks strengthened with cotton bales, and be despatched to the blockading fleet off Mobile. The admiral is now prepared to meet the would-be imitators of the Vanderbilt's unacted rôle. The thing was being carried out with that low and elaborate cunning, systematic falsehood and shameless disregard of moral responsibility so characteristic of the Yankee. The discovery of the trick is another illustration of the saying of Larochefoucauld, I believe, that a man is never so easily deceived as when he is attempting to deceive.
> The Confederates continue to "vex the waters of the Mississippi" and the several garrisons on its banks. From New Orleans to Cairo, a distance of a thousand miles, there is not a Federal post that is not in danger of attack, scarcely a garrison that does not nightly sleep on its arms. I will not weary the reader with details of the ever-recurring operations along the river, but state the facts generally, as above, that this great highway of commerce is not free to navigation, notwithstanding the millions of money expended and the thousands of lives sacrificed by the Federal Government to wrest its control from the Confederates. Even here, within Banks's department, with the large number of armed vessels on hand to "shell the woods furiously," Port Hudson, Donaldsonville, Baton Rouge, and Bayou Sara, are considered by no means safe from capture, or at least from a dash by the Confederate cavalry. These posts are mainly garrisoned by negro regiments officered by white men, with a regiment or so of white troops to drill the negroes and keep them in subordination. Last week the Confederates made a dash into Port Hudson and captured an entire company of a Wisconsin regiment, with the lieutenant commanding—a fellow who had made himself exceedingly obnoxious by arresting non-combatants whom he might happen to encounter in his raids beyond the Federal lines. He was constantly sending such prisoners to this city, reporting them to headquarters as prisoners captured in his desperate encounters with rebel guerillas. The day succeeding the capture of this company, a regiment of cavalry left the post, some say without orders, and came to this city, fearing an attack and capture of the place. On Friday, the 15th inst., the Confederates entered Bayou Sara, 165 miles above this city, and captured a Captain Mann, a deserter from the Confederate service, who had done good service to the enemy as a spy. The Confederates had been on the look-out for him, for a long time, and were determined to have him cost what it might. A demand for his surrender was made by the gunboats lying opposite Bayou Sara, with the alternative of fire being opened upon St. Francisville, a small village to the rear of Bayou Sara. Of course the demand was refused, and the gunboats poured in their broadsides; and the report is, that "Mann went up to the sound of the enemy's guns." Mann was an engineer aboard the Confederate States steamer McCrea, previous to the capture of New Orleans. Passengers arrived here to-day from Baton Rouge say that the garrison and people of that city are exceedingly apprehensive of an attack. The Federal force there consists mainly of negroes; the Confederate force in the vicinity is said to number something like 10,000 men, which is large enough to keep a negro garrison of 20,000 in fear and trembling night and day, notwithstanding the presence of the gunboats. Reinforcements are needed at Baton Rouge, but there are none to spare, unless of negro troops, and these are not considered of the right stuff in an emergency. The main body of the Federal forces in Louisiana are still in the western portion of the State, their advance post at New Iberia on Bayou Teche. A glance at the map will show how small a portion of that section of the State is in Federal possession to-day, after nearly two years of occupancy, with a large army, a splendid navy, and unlimited resources in the material of war and of money for the corruption of Confederate fealty. New Iberia is in Federal possession simply because it is a strongly fortified position, but even that is expected to be evacuated when the sugar crop of the few plantations under cultivation within the Federal lines shall have been shipped to this city. This has now nearly been accomplished, and we may soon hear that the Confederate forces under General Taylor again hold undisputed sway over western Louisiana, from Berwick's Bay to Red river—fully three-fourths, and by far the wealthiest, part of the State. Such is the progress made in the war of subjugation. And yet Mobile is to be attacked and the Texas coast is seized, all to show to Europe the "rapid and extensive advance of the Union arms." Why, New Orleans is to-day, if possible, more thoroughly loyal to the cause of Southern independence than even before the Federal occupation. The Northerner is among us, but not of us. He gives balls, receptions, promenade concerts, and concerts in the public squares, but the native is contemptuously indifferent; he opens stores, and offers to sell goods at a ruinous sacrifice, but the rebels will not buy; he proposes to modify the rigour of martial law, and inaugurate a civil government, appealing with passionate pathos to the citizen to take some interest or show some concern therein; but these obdurate rebels pay no more heed to the appeal than if he were a mere traveller through the country. And my belief is, that time will but widen the gulf that yawns between the Northerner and Southerner, let the final issue of the war be what it may. Three years of such bloody, vindictive, ruthless, savage war as the North has waged against the South has made the Southerner the eternal enemy of the Yankee. Reunion is as impossible as the resurrection of the Saxon Heptarchy.
> The condition of the slaves (they are in reality still such, notwithstanding presidential edicts) in the Government plantations is sad beyond expression. They are badly fed and poorly clad, and being in the employ of those who have no interest in them nor the plantation, save what may be realised from the forthcoming crop, the hapless condition of these dependent creatures can easily be imagined. It is work, or starve and go naked; and if sick, die, for aught the Government overseer or the lessee of Government cares. All the able-bodied negro men having been drafted into the army, the only "hands" left on the abandoned plantations are the old men, women and children. The women have become corrupt in body and mind from the presence of the army beyond anything witnessed in the worst purlieus of large cities. Numbers of them have died and are dying from diseases previously unknown to plantation life. The unwholesome salt rations—refuse of the Federal camps—dealt out to the poor unfortunates, and for which they are liberally charged, have produced scurvy and dysentery and kindred diseases to an alarming extent. The smallpox also rages among them to a degree that excites the apprehensions even of the Federal authorities themselves, calling forth from the commanding-general of the department a special order, prohibiting intercourse between the plantations, in the following terms:—
> III. Considerations of public health require the suspension of all unnecessary communication or travel by plantation labourers between the parishes of the State, or between plantations of the same parish. Such communication or travel, therefore, is forbidden except under regulations established by the provost-marshals of the several parishes, and upon passes issued in accordance therewith. Public officers and managers of estates are requested to assist in the execution of this order.
>
> By command of Major-General Banks.
> Geo. B. Drake, A.A.A. General.

Contrast the mild, almost paternal government, of plantations under the control of their owners, the planters; the abundance of wholesome and suitable food, medical attendance when sick, frequent periodic holidays, regular religious instruction, and above all the constant overruling watchfulness, kindly intercourse and exemplary life of the planter and his family; contrast these conditions of slavery with the life of the "free labourers" on the Government and leased plantations, under the management of Yankee speculators and plunderers, and you will not be surprised that the negro is disappearing like the Indian. There are a few mortuary statistics which I have derived from an entirely trustworthy source. On the "Old Hickory" plantation 214 have died out of a working force of 413, between June 5th and September 11th, 1863; on "White Castle" plantation there are but forty-two negroes left, 258 having died; on the Andrews place 178 are left out of 400; some 400 have died in the Ventross place; all have died on the Girot plantation; of the 260 hands on the Magnolia plantation but 100 are living, and nearly every soul, 600, is dead on the plantation of Miles Taylor, ex-member of the United States Congress. All the above are Government or leased plantations: The smallpox is raging with fearful fatality on the plantations along Bayou Lafourche, Bayou Plaquemine and at several other points. Most of the overseers have died, nearly every person has fled the infested region, and, as is the custom with some of our Indian tribes, the stricken outcast is left to live or die, as Providence decrees.

We have late news from Texas, both from the Federal lines by arrivals at this port, and from the Confederate lines by way of Red river. No general engagement has yet been fought, the Federals keeping close along the line of the Rio Grande and cowering under the protection of their gunboats, along the coast, from the mouth of the Rio Grande to Matagorda Bay. Mr. Brande, member of Congress for Texas, recently arrived in Mobile, informs the Advertiser and Register newspaper of that city that the enemy were at Matagorda, moving along the coast in a column about 6,000 strong, accompanied by their naval force. Their immediate destination was Velasco, which they were expected to reach about the 8th, but it was doubtful whether they would succeed, as Magruder's force was ample to meet them. The general himself was in the saddle, and the Texans, mindful of the days and deeds of 1835 and '36, were turning out to a man. Velasco is at the mouth of the Brazos, in close proximity to the southern extremity of Galveston island, and the object of the Yankee movement is to flank Galveston. Both places are strongly fortified, as even the Yankees themselves admit. They dare not attack Galveston in front, and though they are deferring the attack on Velasco till further reinforcements, both by men and ships, have arrived, it is confidently believed that when they do attack the position they will meet with a most disastrous defeat. General Washburne himself seems apprehensive of such a result, for he has not yet ventured inland from the barren realms of sand that constitute his acquisitions along the coast. And now the cry comes for reinforcements to save the invader from being overwhelmed by the invaded.

Matamoras is again in the throes of revolution. The "patriots" were not, however, permitted to settle their affairs alone, or at least, without the presence of a foreign force. The revolutionary leader was one Juan Cortinas, a routed thief and bandit chief. Hostilities were began on the evening of the 13th inst., and by night of the following Thursday Governor Serna was a fugitive on the Texas side of the Rio Grande, seeking the protection of the United States forces at Brownsville. The official organ here, in giving an account of the affair, says:—

In the course of the evening, Major-General F. J. Heron, commanding United States forces at Brownsville, despatched the Wisconsin Twentieth, the Illinois Ninety-fourth, and five pieces of the Missouri First Battery, across the river. All but the Wisconsin Twentieth bivouacked on the banks, but this regiment went up almost to the Plaza, and spent the night in front of the residence of the American consul, who, the next morning, was escorted to Brownsville, together with a couple of million dollars in specie, belonging to Americans and the United States Government.

It would be interesting to inquire how funds of the United States Government got to Brownsville. In fact, the alleged ownership of the specie is rather questionable.

DEMAND FOR LABOUR IN BERMUDA.

(From a Correspondent.)

HAMILTON, BERMUDA, January 6th.

You will confer a great favour upon us Bermudians if you will allow me to direct the attention of your large circle of readers to our want of labour. More we must have, and we are very anxious that it should come from the "old country." We wish for good loyal Englishmen, not refugees from miserable Yankeedom, who, from present indications, we fear, will soon be pouring in from every Northern State, with as great an anxiety to escape from taxation and tyranny as is shown by rats to flee from the fate of a sinking ship.

There is a most favourable opening here now, both for men of some capital, who are looking for an opportunity of investing it on more remunerative terms than can be obtained in England, and for labourers, whether agricultural or otherwise, with all the security and happiness afforded by the laws and customs to which they have been used. Land is plentiful, and sells at from £13 to £25 per acre, according to quality, with the timber upon it. The soil is extremely fertile, and the climate is so favourable, that everything which will grow in England will flourish here also. Almost all tropical fruits can be produced in perfection. Cattle, sheep, horses, poultry, and all live stock thrive excellently. Our houses are built of stone, which is found in great abundance in all parts of the island. When fresh quarried, it is so soft that it can be cut with a hand-saw; but after being lime-whitened and exposed to the weather, it becomes very hard and durable. The roofs are made of slates of the same material, one inch in thickness, laid upon cedar rafters, and are therefore very substantial. Out of a farm of twenty acres, sufficient stone can generally be procured for all the necessary buildings. Taxes are very moderate, averaging only from 2s. 3d. to 2s. 9d. on the £100. Politics do not trouble us at all; we are content to jog along in an easy-going fashion, and, provided affairs are not very much mismanaged, to leave them to the men in whose hands they happen to be. A few days back we had an election for mayor, aldermen, &c., for this town and district, but it scarcely excited any interest. A few attended, and as they thought the "old squad" had done no harm, they unanimously re-elected them.

We are now endeavouring to form a company for the manufacture of the fibre of the agave and yucca plants, and I think the project promises to be successfully carried out, and to prove a lucrative speculation. We are also taking steps to render the island a pleasant summer resort for families from the Confederate States, when this miserable war shall be terminated, and we hope we shall be able to afford them more pleasure and comfort than they ever found at Saratoga or the rest of the springs and watering-places of the United Cormorants. But we sadly need an infusion of fresh capital and energy to stir us up and push us ahead. We are rather inclined to stagnate.

The remains of the hull and cargo of the wrecked steamer Nola were sold by auction the other day, and I understand realised a fair sum. The hull and engines were purchased for £125, by a Mr. Frank Smith, in the interest, I believe, of the Confederate Government. A Mr. Murphy, a very clever diver, who has lately been successful in widening Timlins Narrows here, has purchased the remaining goods in her for £50, and is very sanguine of being able to raise her. The loss of this steamer was a sad affair, and shows how great the necessity for caution is on the part of captains nearing our rock-bound coast. She was on her passage to Nassau, and was putting in here for coals, in broad daylight, when she struck upon a rock, full in sight of the shore, and went down. Her stern is still afloat, but her bows are stuck fast on the rocks, with a hole in them 10 feet long. I trust the lesson will not be thrown away.

The steamer Dee has arrived safely.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, February 2.

THE quiet in which the North has lately been resting on the assurance that the last days of the rebellion had come indeed, and that the to-be-of war are to come within a very brief period, was sadly disturbed by the tidings coming on Saturday last, of an order for a new conscription of 500,000 men to be made on the 10th of March. It was utterly unexpected, and no official explanation was given in preamble or proclamation, such as have hitherto accompanied such requisitions.

The order, short as it is, is differently understood. There is a drafting order still unexecuted for 300,000 men. The new order allows a credit upon this draft of so many as may have been enlisted and mustered prior to the first day of March, and "not heretofore credited." Are these two drafts, or one? Is the call for 500,000, or are there two 500,000 for 800,000 men in the gross? Are the men already drafted or enlisted under the draft of October, and now credited to the quota, to be counted or not? Men's ideas are wildly afloat as to the amount of demands made upon them, and angered at the bad faith with which they have been treated. The most narrow estimate of the number now required is, that a full five hundred thousand are to be raised by the two drafts, as consolidated into one. All the machinery of the Government and all the exertions put forth all over the North since October have not succeeded in raising more than 150,000, say, for a large margin, 200,000, of the 300,000 asked for. Extraordinary efforts by enormous bounties were put forth, in the belief that it would be the last call, and that, by great and concerted efforts among the people, the men could be raised by enlistment, and the draft, which is an object of terror, averted. The positive addition of at least 300,000, to be raised within the next five or six weeks, dissipates all thought of being able to fill up the call by any inducements for volunteering. The States and counties which have taxed themselves heavily to pay volunteers, have lost their labour and their money. The drafting must come, and there is a general terror of its effects upon persons and society. A quarter of a million must be drafted, and as the experience of the draft of last year shows the impossibility of getting such a proportion out of the enrolment unless the commutation fee is removed and numerous causes for exemption cut off, there is consternation among the poor and a very unquiet state of mind in the whole community.

The uneasiness is greater because the public were totally unprepared to contemplate the necessity of more men than were already provided for by substituting calls. What has happened? Is the Administration alarmed by some new intelligence from the South? Has it discovered that the Southern armies are not disorganised, the Southern people not disheartened and discontented, but the Confederate Government so strong that it can wield a military power that, in addition to the million of men which have been from time to time sent against it, there needs a new fresh force of half a million more? Is the amnesty proclamation so flat a failure? Is the counter-revolution against Jeff Davis so wretched a myth? And are the accounts of Southern destitution, despair, and discontent so utterly and confessedly fabulous, that the Government of the United States, after three years of war, wants, to be assured of success, an army raised to the magnitude of that which Napoleon thought sufficient for the overthrow of the empire of Russia? These are questions which will run through the mind as this demand falls upon the country, and no direct answer will be given by those in authority. They are circulating reports that there is something in the relations with France which makes war imminent; and that these great military preparations are intended more as a menace against the French emperor than for purposes of Southern war. Mr. Seward, they report taking courage from the success of his blustering towards England, in winning for him the applause of his countrymen for having cowed the British lion, has taken advantage of what he supposes to be the financial and political embarrassments of Napoleon in Europe to venture on a similar style of diplomacy with him, without having had the precaution to learn, as he did in the case of Earl Russell, that the demands for which he took such a high tone were already conceded. The report goes that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has given him a reply which disturbs the Administration cruelly, and that another Trent humiliation or a French war is imminent. These stories are current, but it is doubtful whether they are not exaggerated or altogether invented, in order to cover the more probable fact—that the South is found to be very formidable and thoroughly resolute, and that an immense effort is necessary with which to open the spring campaign with any prospect of success.

The onerous calls for troops since the beginning of the war have been as follows:—1861, April, 75,000; May, 64,748; July to December, 500,000;—1862: July, 300,000; August, 300,000;—1863: draft, 300,000;—1864: consolidated draft, 500,000; total, 2,039,748 men.

Of these, it is computed that the fourth campaign will open with an effective force of 700,000 to 800,000 men—recruits and new enlistments. Yet the authorities of the United States will still proceed in treating a revolution of this magnitude as a revolt, the millions who sustain it as mere rebels, who have no title to their lives or their property, except at the mercy of the conquerors.

There is, doubtless, a reality in the conviction which these immense preparations evince, that the South is a great Power yet, and that a mighty effort is necessary to "crush out"—that is the word—the rebellion, which has defied the armies of the North so stubbornly, in three years of varying, but always hopeful, struggle for independence.

A great deal of private information reaches the North occasionally from the interior of the Southern States. Its uniform tenour is to dispel the gloom which the persistent strain of falsehood which passes through official channels into the Northern journals would otherwise cast over the cause of the South. I had recent opportunities to gain information direct from Richmond, and from authentic sources in other parts of the Confederacy and the statement I receive of the condition of public affairs there is entirely different from that which comes by Yankee telegrams, over the wires, through Washington, and from the military centres, from which false news is systematically radiated. There is no general dearth of provisions, there is no general want in the armies of either food, clothing, or arms, shoes perhaps excepted, of which there is a real deficiency. The army of General Lee is reported to be not only well supplied, but to be more numerous than it has been for nearly a year, and ready and eager to follow wherever their general may lead, in the confidence of success. The people en masse are fixed in the resolution never to surrender their independence, and hopeful of being still able to repel or tire out the invading hosts. Allowing for the enthusiasm which may be supposed to colour these accounts, the fact that there is such enthusiasm, and that we hear nothing by private advices of any turbulence or dissatisfaction with the cause, which is more than the cessation of beer, party heat, or some personal disappointment, relates the Yankee at war at Southern despair, as on entering as the enemy which was last week or about from Washington that the people were seeking to be embraced in the amnesty as a protection for surrender, was refuted by the issue on the day after of an order for drafting a new half million of soldiers.

The military events of the week are meagre. There has been fighting in Tennessee, and, if you believe the Government despatches General Longstreet has been baffled in his demonstrations upon Knoxville. Rely upon it, that when he makes one in earnest there, he will succeed. The military authorities at Washington are not at all sanguine with the real belief that Lee's plans are at last known to Longstreet, or that it has been only discovered what they are. There are movements going on which show that they are at a loss to know what the Confederate general intends to do, and how they are to provide against his movements. He has the advantage of so much shorter lines, that they must have large and unsupporting armies at widely still rent points.

The House of Representatives has passed an Act reviving the grade of lieutenant-general in the army, and authorising the President to confer it, with the command of all the armies of the United States, on some major-general in the service. The resolution points to General Grant as the new lieutenant-general, although a discretion is left with the President to choose the man. There has been no lieutenant-general in the army since the days of Washington, during the threatened French war of 1798-9. General Scott had the exceptional rank of brevet lieutenant-general conferred upon him for his services in the Mexican war. But the resolution under which he was appointed limited the President's authority to a single case, and left him no power to supply a vacancy should it occur. General Scott is now on the retired list as lieutenant-general, and General Grant is to be put over him as full lieutenant-general, in a rank permanently added to the army.

Congress has not yet acted on the confiscating law I described to you in my last, but the President is acting as though it were passed—and is seizing, within the Southern districts occupied by Federal troops, upon the lands of the inhabitants, and causing them, without legal powers or condemnation, to be apportioned among the soldiers—black and white—at a nominal price, in fee. The cotton lands in South Carolina are thus divided. An order has recently been issued by General Banks in the department of Louisiana which carries this principle of spoliation even further. The labour by which plantations in Louisiana has been previously worked has been paralysed or boldly carried away by the inroads of the Unionists, so that many plantations cannot be worked by their ruined owners. The order of General Banks is that all plantations which shall not be put into cultivation by the 1st of February shall be deemed and taken to be voluntarily abandoned by the owners, and will be taken by the Government and secured for its own people. There is no question asked of the loyalty of the owner, and no process instituted to test his liability to a legal confiscation. The operation is simple. The Government by its policy first ruins the planter, and then for its own gain treats him as an enemy because he is poor.

Among the thousand instances of the insolent barbarity with which this war is conducted by the United States an example lately occurred on the Mississippi river, about 140 miles above New Orleans, which merits notice for its undisguised and unmitigated atrocity. The Federals put in command of one of their gunboats an Englishman by birth, named Mann, who was a deserter from the Confederate gunboat McRea. He was captured on shore, recognised as a deserter, regularly tried by court-martial, convicted, and sentenced to be shot. The Federal commanders demanded his release; the Confederate commanders refused, and the Federal fleet in revenge anchored abreast of the little town of St. Francisville, inhabited only by women and children and in no way responsible for the decision of the military in its vicinity, and laid it in ashes.

February 17.

IT was I think on Sunday last exactly a year ago when the Rev. C. W. Denison, chaplain of the "relief ship" George Griswold, was permitted to lay waste two mortal hours of one evening in discoursing to a fashionable Dissenting congregation in this city upon the text, "Verily we are guilty concerning our brother" [Sambo]. Excepting the questionable pleasure of gratifying one's almost morbid curiosity (for there was something so fascinatingly Barnum-like in the whole of that American flour transaction that I yielded to become one of the rev. chaplain's auditors), it has often occurred to me since that those two hours were very ill bestowed. Not so, however. The "whirligig of Time" has at length "brought about his revenges," and all those who suffered under the rev. chaplain's sermon a year ago may amply indemnify themselves by a keener enjoyment of the turn that is now uppermost.

On Sunday afternoon last, in the Free-Trade-hall, in the presence of between 5,000 and 6,000 people, the Rev. Arthur Mursell, a well-known lecturer and preacher (Baptist)—the very identical gentleman who this time last year placed his pulpit at the disposal of the chaplain of the "flour ship"—delivered one of his popular addresses, in the course of which he exposed, in a strain of sarcasm fine enough for the occasion, the pious fraud perpetrated last year upon Lancashire in general and upon himself and his congregation in particular. It is not to be wondered at that much political excitement, even to rounds of cheering, should have been caused in that vast assemblage, while Mr. Mursell, with an indignant recollection of having been duped into hiring out his pulpit in so disgraceful a service, concluded this portion of his address as follows:—

"But did they (the Yankees) not stretch out a helping hand to you in your distress? Did they not send the George Griswold to you for your relief? and was she not freighted with the fat of their land? Of course, it would be ungrateful to say that each bag of flour on board that ship was not intended so much to put food in your mouths as to cast dust in your eyes. But 'ungrateful, or not, I confess I never blushed so deeply for my adopted county, as when she accepted that insulting offering from America; and I only wish Lancashire had done an act which would have been more worthy of an honest people, namely, scuttle the ship in the waters of the Mersey and indemnify her owners two-fold in money for the vessel and her freight."

Strange that an excited audience of "working men"—for such is exclusively the class for whose sake Mr. Mursell is delivering his lectures—should applaud a political sermon on a Sunday afternoon! While one is shocked, however, at the moral unfitness of the thing as regards the day no objectionable accident of that kind can rob the occasion of its essential importance. But the reverend lecturer went considerably further into his subject than the foregoing extract gives any idea of. Referring to our smokeless chimneys (the title of the lecture was "No Smoking!") he continued as follows:—"If hunger does not raise from us the cry 'How long, O Lord, how long?' at least humanity extorts it from us, as we look despairingly for any far-off portent of peace. . . One of the saddest effects of this long and colossal warfare is the hardening influence it exercises upon the public mind, leading people to read of hecatombs of slain with a horrible sang froid, the thought of which would have astonished and revolted us three years ago, but which 'damned custom' has inured into a common thing. But the strangest feature, to my thinking, of this foul exterminating slaughter in the New World is, not merely the toleration, but the admiration with which some of our people persist in speaking of America. That land, whose quarrels and whose spirit of quenchless hate have been the source of all our multitudinous sorrows, is still held up before us, by speakers whom some Lancashire men delight to honour and whose lightest whim or wildest fancy they are ever ready to endorse, as the exemplar nation, the model Government, the home of the pattern people of the world; while every howl of rant which is directed at our Queen and country is eulogised as the apotheosis of eloquence and truth, so long as it comes recommended with the genuine twang of New York. For my own part I wonder how any operative in Lancashire can hear the name of America without aversion—can have any other sentiment than a contemptuous pity for a nation which has been the refuge of every traitor, the asylum where renegades are fêted as illustrious guests, where scoundrelism always feels itself secure, and where the conspirator breathes freely as soon as he touches its hospitable soil. Such is the nation whose glorious institutions your political champions hold up for your admiration—such is the nation which has shut up our rich men's mills and emptied our poor men's pantries. It is the glorious land where each adventurer whom decent society has scouted finds a congenial eminence—where Edwin James is no longer an outcast, but an ornament,—where Meagher is not a traitor, but a hero—and where Barnum is one of the institutions of the country—the land of a brave and manly Butler—the land where clerical auctioneers knock down the stalls of God's own house to the highest bidder, provided always that bidder be not a negro—the land which whips and feeds the black man in the South, and kicks and starves him in the North—where he lives a slave under Davis, and dies a freeman under Lincoln......True it is, the Yankees are starving us; to their persistency in a bootless butchery and causeless carnage we owe all our distress; but still, it is done on such a noble scale, and in such a splendid style, that the least the inhabitants of a small and obscure island like ours can do is to stand by and admire! And they do tell us that they love the slave, and are fighting to break his chains. Coming, as the assertion does, from America, where neither falsehood nor exaggeration has yet been introduced, of course we are bound to believe it. Everything tends so much to confirm it. The deep and brotherly affection with which the dark man is cherished by his noble emancipators, the thorough recognition which they make of his equality, the perfect impartiality with which they overlook the difference between his complexion and their own, are proofs positive of the cordial sincerity with which they sympathise with the slave. You are bound to believe in America and in everything American. Is it American? Then it must be true. Only stamp it with the Stars and Stripes, and the ring of it is sterling."

The New York correspondent of the Manchester Examiner, referring to the "stir" caused in the Empire city by President Lincoln's recent order for half a million of men, informs us that the excitement would not be so great but for the conviction that in making the call, the President intends to enforce it. Postponement, adds the writer, is impossible, unless the Confederate forces are to be allowed to sweep everything before them upon the opening of the spring campaign, and that, of course, is not upon the programme. "Your readers," he continues, "need no exposition of the reason why the order has been issued at this juncture. In the first place, it is a simple act of justice to the veteran regiments which have recently re-enlisted so generously to fill their ranks promptly, and in the second place, as the Confederates are sweeping into the army everyone capable of carrying a weapon, a proportionately large force must be opposed to them at the opening of the spring campaign, in order to hold back the tide of invasion which is sure to sweep toward the North. This done, the strength of the Confederacy is finally broken, and the end will be at hand. Looking at the matter in this light, the loyal people of the North will respond to the demand, not enthusiastically, but determinedly and deliberately, confident that it is the last call which Mr. Lincoln or any one else will be obliged to make upon them." And in its leading columns the pro-Federal organ in this city continues the subject as follows: "Whether the number of men will be forthcoming is a difficult question, and one which facts alone will decide. If the present draft does not succeed better than the last the required complement will certainly not be filled up. Congress has refused to annul the privilege of purchasing exemption, and New York may again vote immense grants to assist the people in keeping out of the army. The repetition of such a policy would be strangely inconsistent with the professions of the North, and, in the present state of affairs, positively suicidal. If the Union is to be surrendered, soldiers are not wanted; but those who decline the idea of a pacific settlement are surely bound to fight till they can secure one by force of arms."

Upon the same subject, the Manchester Guardian writes as follows:—

"President Lincoln is again calling spirits from the vasty deep in spite of the comparatively small success which he has recently met with in conjuring them to his aid. This time he proposes to overwhelm his enemies on paper with a new army of 500,000 men. That some new levies of the kind must be near at hand has long been known, though it would hardly have been supposed that the demand, when it came, would be of the ludicrous magnitude attributed to it by this report. Having regard to the far greater extent of ground which they have to cover, the Federals are undoubtedly at this moment shorter of hands than their adversaries, and though, we may be sure, Mr. Lincoln would be delighted beyond his anticipations to get a hundred thousand recruits, it is very likely he may think that his chances of getting the smallest number really absolutely necessary are increasing by his asking for more than five times as many as he can hope to obtain. It does not appear to damp the confidence of the people of the United States to discover that the orders of their Government are only complied with so far as they are found to be agreeable, and probably their weakness for large words is wisely consulted by giving a nominal extent to their preparations far exceeding any rational prospect of the reality."

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, February 17.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THE bank directors having last week reduced the rate of discount to 7 per cent., and the supply of money having since increased, the question now raised appears to be, will a further alteration in the favourable direction speedily take place? A great many persons of practical experience incline to the view that there will sooner or later be an increased amelioration in the terms for money accommodation —first, through the contraction of trade in consequence of hostilities in Denmark; and secondly, from the steady influx of bullion, and the diminution in the drain to India. Although one or two failures have taken place in the mercantile world through the influence of the late stringency in the money market, they have followed more from over-trading than anything else. Perhaps some failures must be expected sooner or later after a lengthened pressure as that recently experienced, and it is to be hoped that no general collapse in credit will ensue. If it shall arise the public will be well prepared for it; for they have had warnings sufficient to avoid any of the rocks upon which mercantile houses usually split. The rage for companies has not ceased—that it is evident. Several have been seriously compromised by the late revised regulations of the Stock Exchange, which must reduce the number likely to be brought forward, in consequence of the heavy amount of deposit enforced. The rates for the negotiation of first-class paper to-day were 6¾ to 7 per cent.; the demand for discount was comparatively active, and for the next week it will be fairly supported. Should, however, the directors determine upon lowering to 6 per cent. it will create equal surprise to their having varied the price from 8 to 7 per cent. The bank, taken on the whole, is in a very easy position.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The position of the bullion market continues on the whole favourable. There has been sent into the Bank during the week £134,000, but against which there has been a withdrawal of £55,000 for shipment to the East. The arrivals of specie have been to the extent of £554,842, of which £455,740 was from the West Indies and the remainder from New York. The late shipments to the East by the Ellora comprised £192,390. Of this £8,549 was gold for Alexandria, £26,450 gold for Bombay, £157,200 silver for Bombay, and £200 gold for Aden. In consequence of the advices from Bombay showing a fall in exchange, bar silver has been flatter, but is again rather firmer, but without any material variation in price. Mexican dollars have not been much in demand, and remain at almost previous quotations. The gold already known to be on its way from Australia is £369,000.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were: to Calcutta, 16,00,000 rupees; to Bombay, 12,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum price declared was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11⅝d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 187 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 80 per cent., on Bombay at 2s. ⅛d., about 21 per cent., on Madras at 2s., about 63 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

In the early part of the week business in the English Stock Market was dull, the dealings being restricted to a great extent by the nature of the intelligence with regard to the Dano-Germanic war, and prices showed a further declining tendency; but subsequently a much better feeling has prevailed, and the operators are working with more freedom. Once more prices have advanced, and generally a more buoyant feeling has prevailed. Consols closed this evening at 91 to ¼ for money, and 91¼ to ⅜ for the account, which, since this day week, is an improvement of exactly ½ per cent. Exchequer Bills are also better, being now up to 8s. to 3s. dis. A speculative movement is again apparent in the Foreign Stock Market, a large business in most descriptions has been transacted, and prices have fluctuated considerably, particularly Mexican, which have advanced 2½ per cent. during the week. Turkish have improved from 1½ to 2 per cent.; Greek is better by ½ per cent.; and Spanish from ¼ to ⅜. The closing quotations this evening were:—Greek, 21¼ to 21¾; Mexican, 38¾ to 39; Spanish Passives, 33¼ to 33½; Ditto, Certificates, 13⅞ to 14⅛; Turkish Six Per Cents. (1854) 90¼ to 91¼; and ditto (1862) 68¾ to 69.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

In American, Government, and railway securities business was again exceedingly languid early in the week, but within the last day or two there has been rather more doing, though only to a moderate extent. Prices have exhibited some fluctuations, but on the whole they may be said to have been fairly sustained. The dealings comprised United States Six per Cents. at 64½ and 64; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, 76 and 77; Do. Pennsylvania, do., 77, 77½, 7?, 77½, and 78. Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 24, 21, 19½, and 20½ dis.; Do. do. all paid, 68½ and 70; Erie Shares, $100, all paid, 61; and New York Central, Six per Cents, 61.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this stock has been steadily advancing since last week, in consequence of considerable purchases, on the part of the public, and the closing of accounts by adverse operators. The increasing conviction that the South cannot be subdued, has the very natural effect of raising the value of their bonds. To-day the quotations has ranged from 52 to 53, to 55 to 56, at which we close, the stock being very scarce.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British railway shares has been more animated than for some time past, and the dealers are again operating more freely in this class of securities. In general prices have improved, the only exception being in Great Eastern and Great Western, each of which shows a decline of about ½ per cent. during the week. On the other hand there has been a rise of 2½ per cent. in London and North-Western; of 2 per cent. in London and Blackwall and Metropolitan, of 1½ in Lancashire and Yorkshire, North British and South-Eastern; of 1 per cent. in Great Northern, Midland and West Cornwall; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire, North-Eastern (Berwick) Do. (York) and Shropshire Union. Foreign railway shares have not been in quite so much demand, but prices are nevertheless rather better. For shares in British possessions there has likewise been less inquiry, but still a fair business in them has been transacted at good prices.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the eighth annual meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of Egypt, it was shown that the net profits, including a balance of £5,145 brought from the previous account, amounted to £15,970, out of which a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent per annum for the half year free of income-tax, amounting to £8,750, was declared, and a balance of £7,290 was carried to the current account.—The first meeting of the shareholders of the Mercantile Exchange Bank was held at Liverpool, when a report was presented, which stated that although the Bank had only commenced business in May last, the profits, after paying the usual expenses, amounted to upwards of £14,000, which would enable the directors to pay a dividend of 5s. per share free of income tax. The report was unanimously adopted, and a resolution was passed to increase the capital of the bank from £1,000,000 to £2,000,000 by the issue of 20,000 new shares, to be issued at a premium of £2 per share. The chairman (Mr. Forwood) stated that they had succeeded beyond expectation not only at Liverpool but at Glasgow and in London, and in the former and latter towns they would soon carry on their business in large and commodious premises secured under peculiarly favourable circumstances, and when they might naturally expect their bank to take a high position amongst the commercial institutions of the country.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the seventh annual meeting of the shareholders in the British Mutual Investment Loan and Discount Company, Limited, the report presented showed the amount of deposits to be £60,191, which is nearly £14,000 in excess of last year. The net profits, after making all allowances, were £6556, out of which £5384 was appropriated to a dividend of 9s. per share, being at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum on the paid up capital, and £1,000 was carried to the reserve fund, which now amounts to £8219. The report was adopted.—At the fourth ordinary annual meeting of the shareholders in the Universal Marine Insurance Company, a favourable report was read, which stated that the net receipts for the past year for premiums, after deducting all the usual expenses, were £232,762, whilst the amount paid for the adjustment of claims &c. was £169,200. Therefore £83,562 remained as net balance on the underwriting account, and a further sum of £4403 for interest to that date had also been received. The investments of the company, which on the 31st December, 1862, amounted to £91,932, had in the interval increased to £162,608, while £127,904 then at the charge of income and expenditure, had diminished to £53,715. The report was adopted, after the negativing of an amendment for the adjournment of the meeting for a month.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the British and Californian Banking Company, Limited. The object being to supplo the want which has long been felt of good banking accommodation in California. It certainly does seem, as the directors state, somewhat remarkable, that while British capital has been seeking investment in every quarter of the globe, California should have been so entirely overlooked. This omission, it is stated, has excited considerable surprise on the part of the merchants and traders of that country, and the present establishment will, it is believed, be eagerly hailed by them. The direct trade with California is rapidly increasing, and a large portion of the precious metals is now being sent to London, instead of, as formerly, to New York. The proposed capital is £2,000,000 to be raised in 40,000 shares of £50 each. But the first issue will be 20,000 shares only. The deposit required in £1 per share, with a payment of £1 10s. on allotment, and a further sum of £2 10s. within fourteen days.—The South Eastern Banking Company, Limited, is another undertaking just brought forward, with a proposed capital of £500,000 in 20,000 shares of £25 each, with power to increase to £1,000,000. The first issue will be 10,000 shares. The required deposit is £1 per share, with £2 paid on allotment. It is intended to concentrate the business in Surrey, Hampshire, Kent, and Sussex, and a provisional arrangement has been made for merging an old established bank and its branches with the South Eastern Bank, the active partner in which will join the bank as soon as the directors are in a position to confirm the provisional agreement. Arrangements it appears are at once being made for opening branches in some large and important towns, where it is not proposed to adopt existing establishments.—A prospectus has been issued of the Selim Tea Company, with a capital of £150,000 (of which one-half is to be first subscribed), in shares of £10. The proposal is to purchase a freehold estate of 4,000 acres in the district of Darjeeling, on the Selim spur of the Himalayas, for the cultivation of tea and cinchona. The price to be paid is £40,000, half in cash, by instalments spread over two years, and half in paid-up of shares.—A prospectus has also been issued of the London Gas Meter Company, with a capital of £100,000, in shares of £10 each. The object is to purchase the business of Messrs. Bischoff, Brown, and Co., at a valuation, one third in cash and two-thirds in paid-up shares, which are not to receive dividend until 7 per cent. is distributed on the remainder.—The Buenos Ayres Bonded Wharf and River Transit Company is another new undertaking just announced, and is brought forward for the purpose of working a valuable concession granted by the Congress of the Argentine Republic for the colonisation and use of the Arroyo del Capitan, together with the erection and construction of such wharves, warehouses, and deposit stores as may be necessary for the requirements of the country trade, and the establishment of towing steamers to and from the rivers Panama and Uraguay. The proposed capital is £300,000, in 15,000 shares of £20 each.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The suspension was announced on Monday of Messrs. Langton and Robinson, largely engaged in the timber trade. The liabilities are roughly estimated at from £180,000 to £200,000, but a dividend is expected to be paid of about 16s. or 17s. in the pound. The suspension was also announced of Messrs. D. and J. Birkett of the Corn Exchange, Mark Lane. The liabilities are expected to reach about £26,000, and the assets are placed at nearly £21,000. A dividend of about 15s. in the pound is therefore anticipated.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The improvement noticed in several departments has been maintained, but not perceptibly extended, and to-day there has been less animation. The effect of an easier condition of money is to some extent counteracted by political distrust. The grain trade continues extremely dull, and to effect sales in quantity lower terms would have to be taken for foreign as well as English wheat. Seeds also meet only a limited sale, but are generally rather firm. American provisions have not moved off so freely. Butter has declined the top quotation for American being 106s. Cheese is dull of sale, at 56s. to 60s. for best imports. Bacon is firm at 46s. for prime American sides. Only a very moderate business is passing in lard, which is without change in value. For petroleum the demand continues steady, and the market is free from any fluctuations of moment. 1s. 11½d. to 2s. per gallon for American refined having been the current terms throughout. Crude has, however, been sold at £17 per ton for Pennsylvanian, which is cheaper. Turpentine keeps up to 75s.

per cwt. for French, the only kind in the market. Rosin is firm at 23s. to 34s. for French, and 31s. to 45s. for American, with moderate supplies. Linseed oil has receded to 34s. 9d., the market closing however with a tendency to recover. Sperm is quoted nominally at £74 for American fishing; oil-cake is inactive. New York linseed in barrels £9 12s. 6d. to £9 15s. per ton. Plumbago is very firm, and the best Ceylon in lump quoted as high as 28s. to 30s. per cwt. At the quarterly indigo sales which closed on Monday an average decline of 2d. to 4d. per lb. was established, and of some 3,000 lbs. sold in all, only a limited quantity was taken for America. Cochineal at the periodical sales held to-day, advanced 1d. to 2d. per lb. on all but Mexican silvers, which are about ½d. per lb. dearer; low pasty to fine Honduras, ranged from 2s. 11d. to 3s. 3d. per lb. The common kinds of safflower still maintain an upward tendency. Other dyes remain without essential change. Camphor sells at 105s. per cwt. and beyond a rise of 2d. per lb. in Cardamums there is no alteration to notice in the value of drugs. The spice trade is rather dull, and quotations hardly so firm. After some extensive transactions in sugar, in which prices again touched the highest point previously attained, the market has become inactive but is still firm. Saltpetre has further given way, a small parcel of 3 per cent. Bengal having sold at 36s. 9d. The common and ordinary qualities of jute are again 30s. per ton lower, the sales for these descriptions to-day going at £18 to £21. For the better grades however, prices are mostly supported. Manilla hemp has sold freely at £34 10s. to £35 for fair to good roping. Cotton at the moment is dull in consequence of somewhat large arrivals. In metals there is not much doing. Lead keeps very firm at £21 10s. to £21 12s. 6d., and spelter has recovered to £21 10s. on the spot.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Feb 17.

THERE has been rather more doing in our cotton market this week, but still business cannot be called brisk. Prices, however, are firm, any material advances being prevented by the large supplies on hand.

The sales this week have been 37,000 bales, of which 11,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 217,410 bales, against 210,020 bales at the corresponding period of 1863. The importations so far this year have been 131,053 bales; last year they were 125,773 bales. There have been exported this year 37,186 bales, whilst in 1863 the exportations were 26,636 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 143,500 bales; last year the number was 97,200 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 32,270 bales; same in 1863, 76,650 bales. The present computed stocks are 235,540 bales. At the same time last year they were 394,370 bales. To-day the sales have been 7000 bales, including 2000 on speculation and for export. The official quotations this evening were, for American descriptions, from 24½d. to 28d.; Egyptians, 26½d. to 30d.; Pernambuco, 27½d.; Bahia, 25½d.; Maranhams, 27½d. to 28½d.; and Surats, 14d. to 24d.

MANCHESTER, February 17.

The Manchester markets during the past few days have shown increased animation, particularly in the shipping departments, in consequence of the receipt of more favourable advices from India. At Bombay yarns had improved, and cloths were 1s. to 1s. 6d. per pound higher, as compared with the account by the previous mail. At Calcutta cloth was 1s. per pound dearer and yarns were also higher. Shippers for the Mediterranean markets have again become active buyers particularly for water twists. Prices consequently rule firm but without any material advance in quotations. There has also been a better trade doing in some trade yarns, but still without any advance being recorded in prices. In cloths a much better feeling has prevailed, there has been more enquiry for the different descriptions but buyers refused to submit to any advance. Manufacturers in general appear to stand out for a considerable advance in prices, and this has to a considerable extent checked buyers. A large business has been done in 10-reed cambrics, but the bulk of the purchases have been for the China markets. There has alone been more business in cloths for the home trade; but the bargains have generally been for small parcels. Buyers for all markets seem more disposed to operate, but still evince considerable caution.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred, for the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be checked. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The promoters of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool, or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W., in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6, Rue Circulaire, and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

THE military news from America continues to be highly favourable to the Confederates. According to the New York telegrams of the 13th inst the siege of Charleston is abandoned—that is, the firing into the city may be continued at intervals, but the strength of the besiegers is so depleted as to make an attack impossible, General Gilmore and Admiral Dahlgren having despatched a land and naval expedition to Florida. The admiral accompanies the fleet. General Seymour is in command of the land forces, but will act under the supervision of General Gilmore. The announcement of an expedition to Florida will not compensate for the costly failure at Charleston. In Tennessee the progress of the Confederates has not been checked. The Federals have been defeated near Maryaville, the Confederates have cut off the communication between Knoxville and Cumberland Gap, have occupied Liverville, have captured Sevierville, and surrounding Knoxville the garrison of which is suffering from smallpox and from short rations, and, to quote the words of the telegram, "nearly all the rest of Tennessee is in their possession." The strength of the Confederates in Virginia has been revealed by Butler's abortive and ridiculous scheme to release the prisoners in Richmond. Some account of this affair will be found in our Southern intelligence. No one will be surprised that Butler's plan included the assassination of President Davis. The Army of the Potomac for its share in the programme lost some hundreds of men and a quantity of material. In Western Virginia General Early has taken 800 Federal prisoners, and secured thousands of cattle, sheep, and swine. As to the much prevaled movement against Mobile, the last report is that General Sherman's expedition is intended for a flank movement against General Johnston, and not to co-operate in that enterprise. The Federal cavalry was defeated on the Yazoo by General Ross on the 5th inst. In North Carolina the Confederates are threatening Newbern and Washington, and it is stated that the Federals lost 1,500 men in the attack on their outposts before Newbern. It is reported that a Confederate ironclad is completed at Kingston, on the Neuse river, and will co-operate with the land forces.

An important, though not unexpected, piece of intelligence appears in our extracts from the Southern papers. A law has passed one branch of the Confederate Congress authorising and regulating the employment of free negroes and slaves in the army, the former by conscription, the latter by impressment. Except, however, as to numbers, the law makes practically few changes, as negroes had free or free. Upon this law many employed in the Confederate armies in various capacities, labourers, and even in some instances as artisans in the arsenals.

It is a fact worth attention that the Federal Congress in the bill just passed for the emancipation of slaves in the Rebel States, provides that the owners should be compensated. Of course this is meant in connexion with loyalty and with law, for which the present Government has not often shown respect; but it is a recognition, or a real recognition, by that body, of the right of property in slaves.

Advices from Houston, Texas, dated January 12 by way of Jackson, Mississippi, state that a large army of Confederate cavalry which had run the blockade had safely reached Monterey, Mexico, "but had been attacked by the English house of Newman and Co., at Matamoras, for the alleged seizure of Major Hart, Quartermaster's Agent for the Confederate Government, to meet his contracts for cotton. The same house attached a large amount of cotton belonging to the Government." Such is a statement, which as to its quite unintelligible. The same advices inform us that General Hamilton, the "Federal Military Governor of Texas," had a public reception at Matamoras, and that at the banquet he said in case of a French advance on Matamoras, the Federals would help the Mexicans to whip them out.

Senator Lane, of Kansas, has introduced into the United States Congress a bill to designate a region on the Rio Grande as a State for negroes. In a report that accompanies the bill he insists upon the necessity of separating the negroes from the governing majority of the white race; and so far as the Yankee treatment of the negro is concerned, Mr. Lane is perfectly right.

Some months since we announced that the United States Government had expressed their willingness for tobacco stored in Richmond on account of the French Government to pass the blockade. On Tuesday night the matter came before the House of Commons. Sir Robert Cliffe inquired whether the British Government had consented to the tobacco coming out, and whether they had thought it their duty to make any similar claim for a supply of cotton for the Lancashire operatives. Mr. Layard said that the British Government had consented to the tobacco being brought out, although a portion of it that has been purchased since the famous "proclamation" of hostilities. Cotton, however, stood upon a different category. We confess we do not quite appreciate the distinction. The French Government wants the tobacco for the sake of its revenue and industry. We want cotton for the sake of our trade and operatives. According to the policy of the British Government all that is necessary for a special suspension of the blockade is that the belligerent Powers and the neutral maritime Powers should consent to it. If the British Government will ask, the Confederate Government of course will not refuse to let cotton come out, for it is not the Confederate Government that is maintaining the blockade. We may be sure the French Government will not object. But what about the United States Government? We have succumbed to Federal threats, and our reward is insult and injury, not courtesy and favour.

Earl de Grey, in reply to Lord Campbell, informed the House of Lords that the Government did not intend to send a commissioner to the Southern States to report on military operations, for two reasons. 1st, that in the Confederacy there is, compared to the North, little to be learnt; and 2nd, that officers would find it difficult to reach the South. With regard to the last assertion we can only say that we never heard of anyone wishing to visit the Confederate States either on business or for a trip, experiencing difficulty in getting in, and also that we were under the impression that it was easy for a belligerent Government to grant a passport in such cases. As to the other objection, it seems to us a very extraordinary one. In this country we have a volunteer army, and it is a matter of deep interest to learn how a volunteer troops will fight, and what are the peculiarities attendant on their management and organisation. In the South the volunteer system, or things much like it, were carried to a large extent, and many valuable communications could have emanated from such intelligent officers as Lord [illegible]. Moreover the Government has no right to interfere with the liberty of the subject in this respect. There is a Foreign Enlistment Act in the Confederate States, and a General Commanding-in-Chief in the army at home. Perhaps the true reason is that Her Majesty's Government are afraid of offending the Federal authorities.

In the debate in the House of Commons on Thursday night Mr. Attorney-General said, with regard to the statement that the [illegible] of the Confederate Navy, which had been published in a pamphlet entitled "Papers of the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury," which had been published in London, was a forgery by the Federal Government, he had no doubt that it was a forgery by the Federal Government, for the purpose of [illegible] the Confederate States in Europe. The statement of Commodore M. F. Maury is confirmed, from positive knowledge, by every person, whose official position enabled or obliged them to be informed of the views and operations of the Navy Department. In Confederate circles, privately, the report was from the first recognised as spurious. It has been published in Southern journals, and in this country has been issued from the Federal press exclusively by papers avowedly in the Federal interest. The exceeding improbability of such a document ever appearing, its contents so far from being [illegible] must be self-evident. Yet it is not unreasonable that it is an intercepted document, even that any confederate authority would for its authenticity. The internal evidence of forgery, affirmed by the Secretary of the Navy, and by Commodore Maury, and by the House of Congress, a proceeding which would be [illegible] among us in the case of any Cabinet Minister's papers, except that of the Secretary of the Treasury, has not been proved yet. What can be thought of the conduct of the Federal Government, which, if it [illegible] all those glaring mistakes, those unnecessary confessions of the only motive that could authorise such a document, permits it to appear as though it formed part of the public records of a foreign Government?

The Federals are endeavouring to engage the Indians in the war. A despatch to the Richmond Enquirer, dated "Houston, Texas, January 31," announces that there has been a serious Indian raid in Utah county, in which twelve or fifteen people were killed; and that the Indians were armed and equipped by the Yankees. When the government of George III were charged with employing the Indians, the whole country was indignant and the war became rapidly unpopular.

The condition of the negroes at Island No. 10 is described in the Northern papers as most deplorable. Eight hundred negroes were sent there last autumn, and placed under the charge of the Rev. — Thomas. No provision was made for the winter, and in one week ten men were frozen to death, and forty more were removed to die from exposure. A letter from Cairo says: "When Colonel Shaw went down to the island, and began to [illegible] to examine into matters, he found the negroes huddled together in miserable shanties, with not a stick of wood to keep them warm, and the themometer indicating a temperature of from ten to fifteen degrees below zero."

According to a Washington letter published in a Northern paper (the Rochester Union, New York,) more than 150,000 claims for pensions have been filed by widows and mothers of soldiers, and the claims audited and allowed amount to $12,000,000 per annum. It is supposed that about half the existing claims have been presented, and that the total liability up to the present time is $25,000,000 per annum.

It is impossible to exaggerate the subserviency of the British Cabinet to the Federal Government, or the contempt and insult evoked by that subserviency. England will not send a military commissioner to the South because he may not get in, but Prussia and Russia do so without any hesitation and without offence. France and Austria may get tobacco through the blockade that has been purchased since the commencement of hostilities, but an English consul was dismissed the public service for assisting the State of Alabama to pay its British creditors interest due on a debt contracted long before the war began; and, moreover, the British Government apologised in most humble terms for this act of their consul. When the French Minister at Washington expressed a wish to go South, Mr. Seward courteously give him every facility. Contrast the treatment of this country. We are not just now referring to the seizure of British vessels, the unlawful interference with British trade, the scandalous outrage on British seamen, the murder of the mate of the Saxon, or the insolent violation of the sovereignty of Her Majesty. As a marked contrast to the courtesy of the Federal Government to other nations we call attention to a paragraph in the last news from New York. "The British gunboat Petrel arrived at Charleston on the 5th instant, wishing to communicate with the British consul at Savannah. Admiral Dalhgren refused permission, and the Petrel put to sea."

The Halifax Admiralty Court has restored the Chesapeake to the Federal claimants. This decision is in accordance with the judgment pronounced by the Court before the trial. No reference is made to the fate of the prisoners.

The price of gold in New York on the 13th February was 59¼ per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The glorious Fenian Brotherhood, of whose impending attack on the integrity of the British empire Mr. Seward lately warned Earl Russell, has fleshed its maiden sword in the Green Isle and won its maiden victory. The battle was on this wise. The Corporation of the City of Dublin had determined to erect in College-green a statue to the late Prince Consort. The "National" party burned with indignation and shame. A protest was indispensable, otherwise the glory and honour of Ireland would be trampled in the dust. So the great O'Donoghue, one of the last of the pure-blooded Celts, to whom the title of Mr. or Esquire is an insult, bade his lieutenant, the mighty Mr. Sullivan, call together the "brethren" in the Round Room at the Rotundo. The "brethren" obeyed the summons of their chief, and at the hour of eight on the eventful evening of Monday, the 22nd day of February, A.D., 1864, a vast multitude thronged the doors of the edifice, impatiently awaiting admittance. The doors once open and one wild rush made, the great hall was packed with a swaying, large, and turbulent crowd. At once an ill-organised attempt was made to scale the platform, but strong men armed with sticks repulsed the assault. The O'Donoghue and his lieutenant then entered, and mingled cheers and groans greeted their entrance. Then arose one Gill to speak, and from him came an indignant repudiation of the insult offered to Ireland in the preference of the Prince Consort to Henry Grattan. Why were they not banded like brothers for fatherland under the mighty O'Donoghue? Then the O'Donoghue advanced. Never had he seen so glorious, so magnificent an assembly. Great indeed was Sullivan! No more was heard, but a terrific shout of "Goulah!" arose, and the onslaught commenced. On the platform and in the hall every man in a moment clutched his neighbour's throat and waved aloft his shillelagh. Resistance against a force drilled and led is impossible, and the Fenian men pressed on to the assault in columns compact and overwhelming. In ten minutes the platform was carried. The great O'Donoghue fled, Sullivan fled, the reporters fled. The green flag was hoisted, a naked sword gleamed aloft, and for the space of one hour, like the Ephesians of old, the victorious Fenians shouted in the exultation of triumph.

Many of these "fighting men" were soldiers in the Federal army, and had returned from America to drill fresh combatants to war under the flag of Limerick. Some even wore the Federal uniform. Many mechanics are daily being enrolled in the brotherhood of St. Patrick, and are avowedly training an army to co-operate with the Northerners when they come to invade this country.

No one seems to understand the distinction between the O'Donoghueites and Fenians, any more than one knows the difference between a Nominalist and a Realist; but surely the nerves of Earl Russell must be terribly shaken by this last threat of Federal aggression.

The estimates for the army and navy of England for the current year have been published. With regard to the former it may be stated that the Indian establishment remains unaltered. That empire is garrisoned by a British force of about 78,000 infantry, 6000 cavalry, and 14,000 artillery; the total for 1864 being 72,684 men; in 72,676 for 1863. By a natural consequence, the home depôts of the Indian regiments show no real variance from last year, and are computed to number 9347 men. The whole cost of the Indian establishment falls on the treasury of the Indian empire.

Setting aside, then, this army of about 82,000 men, specially appropriated to India, we find that the army of Great Britain for the year 1864 will number 145,654 men of all arms. In the infantry there is an addition of 1462, and in the cavalry there is a reduction of 816 men. The artillery also loses 1376 men, owing to the cession of the Ionian Isles. Ten regiments are set down as serving in New Zealand. The St. Helena regiment and the Falkland Islands company are disbanded. The three West India regiments lose 50 men each; but a fourth regiment, 866 strong, is added to that establishment. The estimated cost of the army, including the cost of the militia and the volunteer grants, is £14,844,888.

The naval force, including marines, coast volunteers, and naval reserve, as proposed for 1864, is 98,500 men, and the estimated cost is £10,432,610, being a reduction of about £300,000 on the cost of last year. In the number of boys in service on board the training ships there is a reduction from 9000 to 7000, and the coast-guard appears also as 7000 instead of 9000 strong. The estimates bear evidence of a considerable transfer of work from the private to the public dockyards. On the one hand, "ships building by contract" are set down at £384,000 instead of £684,000; and, on the other hand, the "wages of artificers in the establishment of shipwrights" are put at at £324,979 instead of £80,000, the number of these workmen being raised from 1946 to 5678. The result of this transference yet remains to be seen. A vote of £384,412 is asked to close the account for the four large iron-clads Minotaur, Agincourt, Northumberland, and Prince Albert, so that we may conclude that these vessels will be fit for service at the close of the year.

The royal navy at the present time consists, according to the last Admiralty return, of 592 ships and vessels afloat, 86 of which, being mortar vessels and floats, are effective sailing vessels, and the remaining 506 are steamers. The screw steamers include 20 armour-plated ships and floating batteries, 56 ships of the line, 37 frigates, 9 blockships, 26 corvettes, 35 sloops, 47 gun vessels, 143 gunboats, 7 tenders, 4 mortar ships, and 15 troop and store ships; of armour-plated screw steam vessels building, there are 3 iron third-rates, and 3 wooden, 1 wooden fourth-rate, a cupola ship, fourth-rate, and another converting, 2 wooden corvettes, sixth-rates, and 1 sloop.

The Great Eastern steamship was sold last week by Messrs. Cunard, Wilson, and Co., at the Liverpool Cotton Sales Room. The first bid was £20,000, and the final bid £150,000, the ship being knocked down to the representative of the Great Eastern Company, Limited. This company has lately been formed with the object of again running the vessel. The actual cost, however, of the ship to the new company will be about £80,000, inasmuch as the company has purchased bonds of the Great Ship Company amounting to £70,000, on which however, they will receive about £15,000 by way of dividends.

The Court of Common Council met on Friday last, to take into consideration the report of the special committee appointed to conduct the entertainment given in June last to the Prince and Princess of Wales. The report stated that the total cost of the feast amounted to £15,054. On a motion for the adoption of the report, an amendment was proposed in most vigorous language by Deputy Elliott. He said "that during the six weeks of preparation, the committee had held ninety meetings, and expended on luncheons and dinners £243 at the least. In wine alone for their special use, they spent £107, which, at 60s. a dozen, would represent 428 bottles. Among the miscellaneous disbursements, it would be seen that £277 had been expended in petty cash expenses, of which £165 represented the cost of a breaking-up frolic. The committee had expended £325 on their own personal decoration in the purchase of silk scarves, richly-chased wands, 140 pairs of white kid gloves, and silver-gilt and enamelled badges. Again, it was clear that about £200 worth of things, which he could only designate as costly amenities of the toilet, had disappeared. Some of the members of the committee had valued these at £500 or £700. The perquisites and souvenirs, 'mere unconsidered trifles,' picked up here and there by those gentlemen, and got rid of in some way or other, were of the value of £300. Adding all the items together they had a total of about £1,140—pretty good pay for six weeks' work. The whole entertainment cost £15,000, and as there were 2,000 tickets issued, the cost of each invited guest was £7 10s. Of these tickets the committee had in all 160 at their own disposal, and that number multiplied by £7 10s. gave £1,200 as the value of their patronage. On the occasion of Her Majesty's visit to Guildhall in 1837 the sum of £10 had been offered for one ticket, and no doubt on this occasion some had been sold; indeed it seemed that £400 had been offered by a lady of rank for one ticket. At any rate the committee had a sum of £2,340, or a charge of 16 per cent. on the whole cost. The entertainment to William IV. in 1831 cost £3,000; that to the Queen in 1831 cost £7,000. Now they had gone with a leap to £15,000."

A deputation of the leading members of the council of the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland waited upon the Lord-Lieutenant last week with reference to the deterioration in the breed of horses in that country. Lord de Vesci said that the committee appointed by the council had before them the evidence of gentlemen from every part of Ireland, and also evidence, reports, and letters from officers commanding regiments in Ireland, and on all sides it was agreed that the deterioration in horses fitted for remounts for cavalry and artillery was increasing so rapidly that it was feared that there would be great difficulty in getting horses for the purpose. On these facts the council had determined to ask for a royal commission. The council had been limited in its field of inquiry, but the Government could obtain evidence as to the systems pursued in France, Austria, and other countries where the Government took the rearing of horses into its care, and the inquiry should also be intended to India, where there was a system of mounting the cavalry and artillery wholly irrespective of private enterprise. In Yorkshire it seemed that similar complaints were made of the injury done by the purchase of the best sires for the foreign market. Lord Talbot de Malahide said that many sires were imported into Ireland unsound and diseased, and great mischief had thence arisen. He also thought that the system of weights for the Queen's Plates and the handicaps was most prejudicial. The Lord-Lieutenant thought that the military branch of the subject furnished the only locus standi for an application for a royal commission, and promised to communicate with the Secretary-at-War.

On Saturday last the Solicitor-General of Scotland (Mr. Young) was heard before Lord Ormidale in reply for the Crown, in the objections to the information in the case of the ship Pampero lately seized in the Clyde under the Foreign Enlistment Act. He said that the case was precisely identical with that of the Alexandra, as far as legal questions were concerned. The whole issue was simply this, was the vessel as it stood at the time of seizure liable to forfeiture under the statute? It would be more convenient to raise the legal points at or after the trial, and not at this stage, by way of objections to relevancy. The Court at the trial could direct the jury, leaving it open for either side to proceed by bill of exceptions or motion. As to the point that "to cruise and commit hostilities" was not the intent of the equipper, he held that the words expressed the employment of the ship and not the intent of the equipper. The charge of "arming" had not been laid, but there might be equipment not extending to arming. It was only necessary to prove that the equipment was made for warlike purposes. If it could be proved that the vessel was not intended for a mercantile but a hostile purpose, a purpose of committing hostilities against the United States, the Crown would be entitled to judgment. In fact the line of argument closely followed Mr. Baron Channell's judgment in the Exchequer. The case was again adjourned.

A somewhat peculiar case, which had already been before the Court of the Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, was again referred to on Saturday last on certain accounts and inquiries which had been directed. One George Roberts, after stating in his will that he was about to leave for America, gave to his two brothers and two other persons $4,000, and $1,000 Virginian Stock, and $2,000 United States Stock, which he then held, and also such money as his executors might recover under a certain policy, and ready money and securities for money, in trust to pay the dividends to his brothers and sisters equally for life, and after the death of the survivor he gave the principal to the President and Vice-President of the United States and the Governor of Pennsylvania in trust, to invest $2,000 in the purchase of freehold land in Pennsylvania, and to permit the remainder to accumulate until it should amount to a sum of $100,000, and to apply this sum, together with the purchased estate, to the endowment of a college in the State of Pennsylvania; and it was his will that moral philosophy be taught therein, and a professor engaged who should inculcate and advocate the natural rights of the black people of every clime and country, until they be restored to an equality in civil rights with their white brethren throughout the Union. After the death of all the tenants for life, a memorial was addressed to the trustees named, and the Attorney-General in America was consulted. He was of opinion that the bequest could not be enforced, and should not even if it could be, being of doubtful utility; and Mr. Dallas, the late American ambassador, thereupon declined the gift. The Court was, therefore, invoked to declare the trusts of the will.

The trial and condemnation to death of the seven men, who, on board the Flowery Land, rose in mutiny and killed the captain, a passenger, and the first mate, and afterwards, having sighted land near the river Plate, killed the steward, scuttled the ship, and left on board of her two Chinamen, have been duly recorded in these columns. Two of the convicts, namely, Marsolino and de los Santos, were reprieved on Friday night last, and the remaining five, namely, Leon, Blanco, Duranno, Lopez, and Watto, were reserved for execution on Monday, the 22nd February, in front of Newgate gaol. The authorities, keenly alive to the disasters which would inevitably ensue from the mob likely to assemble to witness the execution, took the most elaborate precautions. Barriers were erected to prevent pressure, and hoardings were built against the railings of St. Sepulchre's church. Three hundred and thirty men, 7 inspectors, and 37 sergeants of the City force were stationed in front of the scaffold, and 300 men of the Metropolitan force kept the great thoroughfares leading to Newgate. Besides these, there were patrols of mounted police. The execution was to take place on Monday morning at eight o'clock, but before the sun had set on the Sunday hundreds of persons had already taken up positions within the barriers, determined to brave the cold of a night when the thermometer was some degrees below freezing point. Throughout the night the crowds of "roughs" and of masculine women continued to increase; and those who stood on the cold ground beneath, bandied their blasphemy against the laughter and jokes of the occupants of the windows above them. For windows facing the gallows had been hired for fabulous sums, and men sat carousing and card-playing through the night by way of a decent prelude to the business of the morning. By 3 o'clock the masses became densely packed, and at that hour the fixing of the scaffold into its place, by the aid of a strong team of horses, served to afford some diversion to the multitude. At 6 o'clock the hooting, screaming, and cursing, mingled with the exhortations, prayers, and hymns of the emissaries of the Religious Tract Society, produced a demoniacal effect. At 7 o'clock Calcraft appeared on the scaffold, and was recognised in a familiar manner by the mob, on whom he smiled grimly. At 8 o'clock the bell of Newgate began to toll, and Duranno was led, or rather supported to the scaffold; Lopez came next, nervous and breathing hard and short, and then Blanco was carried on to the scaffold and seated in a chair. All the prisoners as they appeared were received with groans and hisses, and when all were placed ready for execution one vast shout of execration rent the air. The bolt was drawn, and the bodies fell at the same instant. Blanco was hung still seated in his chair.

Marvellous to relate, no person in the crowd was killed, and of injuries but two, and those of a trifling character, are known.

CONTINENT.

THE invasion of Jutland is the only intelligence of importance from the seat of war. Some small skirmishes have taken place between the two armies at Düppel, but the great attack has not been made and may be delayed some time. Prodigal as the Prussian princes may be of the lives of Prussian peasants, they wish to avoid a check which would increase the credit the Austrian army has already gained to their disadvantage, and they will probably wait until such overwhelming forces are concentrated in Sundewitt that victory, however high its price, is certain. The details of these small engagements which have mostly taken place in an attempt of the Prussians to advance on Düppel from the south, present little interest.

For strategical reasons, the invasion of Jutland must have appeared to Marshal Wrangel a most desirable step. It was calculated to divide the forces of the Danes and establish again that inequality of numbers, temporarily redressed by the strength of the Düppel position, which has given the Germans the triumph of which they boast so much. But political considerations made him hesitate, and although it is certain that the Prussian advance entered Jutland and remained there some time; it was kept very close to the frontier until instructions could be obtained from Berlin and Vienna. According to some statements, these instructions have resulted in the withdrawal of the Prussians, but it is not determined whether this evacuation of Jutland, as it is styled, was an independent act of the two German Powers, desirous of respecting the territory of the kingdom of Denmark Proper, or was occasioned by remonstrances from France and other Powers. We cannot admire the scruples in the one case, or the newly-found concern for Denmark in the other. Denmark and Germany are at war. Although Germany may be willing to localise the war, Denmark is not. She means to strike her foes everywhere that she can reach them, and if Austria and Prussia mean to bring her to subjection they must break her powers of resistance in the next few days. It would be absurd for the Austro-Prussian army to set gravely down before Düppel and leave the Danes at liberty in every other part of their territory. The indignation of Europe is equally absurd. The invader had just as much business in Jutland as in Slesvig. The occupation of Slesvig was the foul outrage upon justice. Any measures that may be taken in Jutland and the Isles are only its necessary complements. It must have been obvious from the first that if the Danes resisted, the war must become, as between them and their invaders, general. But people seem to have a misty notion that the occupation of Slesvig was very much like the occupation of Holstein by the Federal troops: that is to say, that, although unjust, it had some pretence of legality; and thus we find even ministers of state, who saw the passage of the Eider with equanimity, put themselves into great excitement at the intimation of the passage of the Kongeaa. The Danes certainly will not accept this theory that the invasion of Slesvig was a venial offence and that of Jutland a crime. They are at war with Germany; they will hit their foe where they can, as long as their strength lasts; they expect that the enemy will strike them wherever he can get the chance, and they will exhibit to the world a gallant spectacle of courage and endurance, until the moment comes—if, to the shame of Europe, it should come—that, outworn and outnumbered, they can no longer defend themselves.

The Austrian and Prussian civil commissioners in Slesvig are assuming absolute authority. They have abrogated the November Constitution, the pretext for the war, and cancelled the Danish language regulations. In fact, the great German Powers treat the duchy as a conquered province which is absolutely at their disposition. They have commenced the destruction of the fortifications at the Dannevirke and at Frederickstadt. How these acts can be reconciled with the profession that they only occupy the duchy to enforce the repeal of the November Constitution, we cannot see. If the duchies are given back to Denmark it will be in a perfectly defenceless condition.

All accounts agree that the enthusiastic welcome to the "liberators" ceased at Augeln; thenceforward, although a few Germans were profuse in their welcomes, the people generally have shown themselves hostile.

The civil commissioners will not tolerate too enthusiastic Slesvigers. One or two of these gentlemen who made their way to Flensburg, probably with a view of establishing a provisional government for the Duke, were arrested, and after a short detention sent out of the duchy.

The Prussians have a great objection to newspaper correspondents, and the complaints of these gentlemen, who are accustomed to be treated as very important personages, are amusing. The Prussian officers were deaf to their indignations as well as to their representation of the importance of conciliating the public opinion of England and France. One unlucky Frenchman has been arrested, and with the vanity of his nation and of his profession attributes his detention to some feuilleton he wrote in the Siècle, in which the Prussians were badly handled. It is very much like the famous editor of Eatanswill, who fancied everybody read him and admired or dreaded him.

The Allies make bitter complaints of the obstacles thrown in their way by the commander of the Federal forces and the Federal commissioners in Holstein. Instead of assisting them in bringing their stores, &c., to the front, the commissioners have put every possible difficulty in the way of their communication with Germany.

The two great Powers are, indeed, at the present time upon almost as bad terms with their confederates as with the Danes. The ministers of the smaller Governments are mad with vexation that the glory of beating Denmark should have been taken out of their hands. They seem to be resolved to press to a vote the resolution against the London Treaty, in spite of a strong appeal not to do so. An Austrian circular points out the danger of such a course. "It might force the non-German Powers to a decisive counter-declaration in favour of the Treaty." The conference at Wurzburg is reported to have resulted in an engagement on the part of the States represented to acknowledge at all hazards Prince Frederick as Duke of Holstein, if not of Slesvig, and to resist any attempts of Prussia and Austria to withdraw the dispute from the decision of the Diet. The feeling is becoming very bitter. The King of Prussia sent one of his confidants, General Manteuffel, to Dresden, to try to bring the Saxon Government, which is the prime mover of the whole plot, to reason, but in vain. Prussia, however, will not yield. It is stated that a Prussian force has been concentrated on the Saxon frontier, and one of the organs of the Federal party recommends the occupation of Dresden. It would be a strange freak of fortune if this storm, which Saxony has done so much to raise, should sweep the Saxon government away and complete the work of 1815. We have seen many more unlikely events occur.

The situation altogether is very menacing. Powers which have hitherto looked on the contest with indifference, unwilling to help Denmark lest they should lose the pleasure of seeing England humiliated, are beginning to interfere, and France may yet resolve to save the gallant little State, whose weakness and all whose difficulties are the result of her fidelity to France and the first Napoleon.

We cannot see in the reported acceptance by Austria and Prussia of a fresh English proposal for a conference, any sufficient reason to take a more hopeful view of the chances of peace. The two Powers refuse to assent to a suspension of hostilities, and their views moreover differ so widely from those of the other Powers who will be parties to the conferences that agreement is hardly possible. Indeed, we have not much expectation that the conference will meet. The German Diet denies the right of other Powers to interfere in the settlement of the Holstein succession, and will hardly send a representative.

The trial of the Italian conspirators commences today; Mazzini will be tried par contumace. The act of accusation, or indictment, asserts that Mazzini was the author of the plot; documents found upon the prisoners and their own confessions prove his guilt.

A telegram from Madrid announces that the British steamer Princess, which had touched at Malacca to coal, has been seized by the authorities of that port. Rifled cannons, muskets, &c., were found in the hold.

The provincial diets of the Austrian empire, with the exception of those for Galicia, Hungary, Transylvania, Croatia, and Venetia, are convoked for the 2nd March.

The Minister of War, Count Degenfield, has resigned, and has been replaced by Field-Marshal Von Frank.

Prince Adam Sapieha, who has been confined for some time upon the charge of participation in the Polish insurrection, has made his escape. The Sapieha family is one of the most considerable in Austria, the chief, perhaps, in Galicia, and the escape of the Prince, unless the proofs of his guilt were overwhelming, was hardly judicious. The Austrian government would have treated him with great lenity; and its object in arresting him was probably not to punish him but to deprive the revolution of the assistance which a man of so much influence gave it.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

AMERICA.

IN the Lords, on Monday, Lord Campbell inquired if the Government was about to send out commissioners to the Confederacy as well as to the Federal States to report on military affairs. Earl de Grey replied, that no officers were to be sent to the United States to fulfil the office of commissioner in the proper sense of the word, but only to report on the materiel of war. His lordship said that in the South the information was less valuable, because the resources of the South were less. He also remarked that another reason for not sending an agent to the South was the difficulty of the agent getting into the South.

On Thursday in the House of Commons the Attorney-General, in reply to Mr. H. Baillie, said, that if an English merchant ship was captured by a ship of war in the harbour of a neutral state, it would not be the duty of the Government to await the decision of a prize court before demanding reparation. In the case of the Science it was denied by the captain of the United States war vessel that she was captured in Mexican waters, and therefore the Government was obliged to wait until the controversy as to this disputed fact was settled.

On Friday Mr. Layard informed the House of Commons what kind of reparation the present British Cabinet exacts for "a direct violation of the sovereignty of Her Majesty." Mr. Halliburton inquired into the circumstances connected with the Chesapeake affair, and Mr. Layard read a despatch from Mr. Seward, together with the reply of Earl Russell, which documents we elsewhere publish. The main facts are briefly these. The Chesapeake was captured by Confederates acting under a commission from the Confederate Government, who took the vessel into the British harbour of Pankbar, Nova Scotia. The Federal gunboat, Ella and Annie, went into the neutral port and took the Chesapeake by force, or to quote the words of Mr. Seward, "directly violated the sovereignty of Her Majesty by the assumption of power and authority in the name of the United States, as well on board the said steamer Chesapeake as on board the British schooner Investigator, while within British waters." For this Mr. Seward is sorry. Mr. Lincoln censures the officers of the Ella and Annie, but at the same time says he believes the proceedings were taken "under the influence of a patriotic and commendable zeal"—an observation that will make the censure rather agreeable to the officers, and ensure their promotion. Earl Russell was satisfied, and instructed Lord Lyons to inform the Federal Government that Her Majesty's Government "are truly glad that the matter has been settled in a manner honourable to both parties." [We commend this correspondence to the attention of our readers as a fair specimen of Federal insolence, of Earl Russell's subserviency, and of his lordship's idea of national honour.]

THE SEIZURE OF THE STEAM RAMS.

On Tuesday Mr. S. Fitzgerald moved for copies of all correspondence between the various departments of Her Majesty's Government or officers in Her Majesty's service, and Messrs. Laird Brothers, relating to the two ironclad vessels the El Tousson and El Monassir, and of any diplomatic correspondence and papers respecting the same. The hon. member explained that by the terms of his motion the Government could not object to produce the papers on the ground that they had reference to matters under judicial investigation: for the purpose of his motion was not to discuss the validity of the seizure, but to find out whether before the seizure took place the conduct of the Government was lawful or not. Mr. Fitzgerald then gave the history of the case. On the 11th July Mr. Adams informed the Government that the rams were building in the Mersey, and from that date until 1st September the Government was diligently investigating the affair, and on that day informed Mr. Adams that the result of their inquiries was that, "having regard to the entire insufficiency of the depositions to prove any infraction of the law, Her Majesty's Government are advised that they cannot in any way interfere with these vessels." Yet three days later Earl Russell requested the Lords of the Treasury to detain the rams. What had passed in the meantime? [The reader will remember that Earl Russell wrote to Lord Palmerston on the 3rd that he would detain the rams, and wrote to Mr. Adams on the 4th that the matter was still under consideration.] According to the correspondence laid before Congress, the inference is that Mr. Adams had settled the business. That gentleman wrote to Mr. Seward, under date 3rd September, 1863, "As the case seemed doubtful, I concluded that the wisest course would be to put in one more remonstrance. Accordingly I have taken advantage of some depositions, of no great additional weight, furnished to me by Mr. Dudley and others." It appears that this evidence, which Mr. Adams refers to as being of no great additional weight, and which he only used as an excuse for another remonstrance, furnished the Government with the pretext for detaining the vessels. Then what was the conduct of the Government from the 9th September, when the vessels were detained, until the 27th October, when they were seized? The Government sought to get information from Messrs Laird, carefully concealing from that firm that a prosecution was intended, and that the information they furnished might be used against them. Moreover, during that interval the Government proposed to buy the rams, and Mr. Reed the Chief Constructor of the Navy, showed to Messrs. Laird an authority from the Admiralty to negotiate for the purchase. The hon. gentleman at some length contended that Earl Russell had, under a threat from the United States, resolved to detain the rams, and declared that it was expedient that the papers should be produced, so that the proceedings of the Government might be discussed, and that it might be seen if the Executive had exceeded their lawful powers. If the House was to wait till the judicial investigation was over it might have to wait for years. The rams were seized in October, yet it was only in February that any public step was taken to bring the case to trial, and probably it would be the end of the year before it was submitted to judicial investigation.

The Attorney-General said Mr. Fitzgerald asked for a part of the papers, and if they were laid on the table, they would not enable the House to form an opinion on the conduct of the Government, and the Government would not explain their case to the House while it was under judicial investigation. Respecting the right to detain the rams, the learned gentleman would say boldly, and in the face of the country, the Government acted on their own responsibility. The Government did not seize the vessels, but took care that the law should not be evaded whilst the inquiry was pending whether there were grounds or not for seizing them. In criminal cases a person could be brought before a magistrate on imperfect evidence, and remanded from time to time, whilst evidence was being collected that would justify a committal. "That course cannot be adopted in cases of seizures of vessels of this description; the law gives no means for that." Therefore, the Government acted on their own responsibility "in determining that what had taken place with regard to the Alabama should not take place with respect to these ships." It was true the Government had offered to buy the rams, and the learned gentleman ventured to say, "that a course more liberal could not well have been taken." The Attorney-General quoted from a document purporting to be the report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, the authenticity of which, as our readers are aware, has been formally and publicly denied by Commander Maury; and the learned gentleman said, "As between this country and the Confederate Government, we have information from headquarters of a character perfectly unquestionable; and we know, therefore, as a matter of fact, that these ships were being built in violation of our laws and for the purpose of being used in the belligerent service of the Confederate States." The Attorney-General concluded by denying that the Government had been influenced by the letters of Mr. Adams, and he said "that they had been actuated by no other motive but that of vindicating the law, and of doing to other countries that which they expect other countries to do unto them."

Mr. Horsfall read a passage from a letter addressed by Mr. Adams to Earl Russell. The United States Minister observes:—"I cannot but regret that your lordship should have adduced the evidence of Mr. Laird in support of any proposition made to my Government. I trust that I may be pardoned if I remind you that the statement made heretofore by that person in Parliament respecting their action are not such as are likely to lead to their implicit credence in any relating to his own." Mr. Horsfall had known Mr. Laird for forty years, and not a slur could be cast upon his character, and he thought it was undignified and unbecoming in Earl Russell, as a British Minister, in allowing such language to pass unnoticed. In his opinion it would be a fatal policy to say that no ships of war should be built in this country for other Governments; such a course would injure our commerce; and, moreover, we ought to remember that if we accustomed other nations to come to this country for their war ships and munitions of war, we could, in the event of being involved in hostilities, cut off our enemies from their supplies.

Lord Cecil denounced the illegal assumption of power by the Government. If it were permitted for the Executive to proceed upon suspicion and to refuse any explanation pending the investigation, the Government might, under threats of war from a foreign Power, ruin any man. He thought the House ought to protest against this assumption of a new dispensing power, "a new power of suspending the rights of the subject, a new establishment of despotic claims, which might, perhaps, be in place in the atmosphere of St. Petersburg or of Washington, but which were entirely out of place in the atmosphere of London."

After some remarks from Mr. W. E. Forster, defending the policy of the English Government and excusing the insolent despatches of Mr. Seward, Sir Hugh Cairns addressed the House. He said he wanted to know what was the precise demand made by the United States Government, and what was the attitude assumed by Her Majesty's Government; but no such information could be obtained from any papers before the House. Had Mr. Seward stated that it was an infringement of international law for unarmed ships to leave this country if they were subsequently armed? Earl Russell had written in a despatch, to be communicated to the United States Minister, that he considered the case of the Oreto and the Alabama a scandal. Why? Did the noble lord mean that the escape of the Alabama was a scandal because we had laws to punish the offence and did not enforce them? Then why did not the Government punish the persons who openly avowed that they had sent the Alabama out of the country? "Remember, if there is a case for seizure there is also a case for an indictment for a misdemeanour." If there has been no infringement of the law, where was the scandal, and if the law was violated why were the offenders not prosecuted? And then as to the Oreto, she has been tried and acquitted; how can her case be a scandal? But perhaps Earl Russell meant that the case was a scandal because we had no better law to deal with the Alabama and the Oreto. Then why did not the noble earl propose a change in the law, if he remained in the Government? The learned gentleman then commented on the reasons for the production of the correspondence between the Government and Messrs. Laird. It seemed to him that the Attorney-General objected to anything being said that might prejudice the Government, but that a member of the Government might say anything to prejudice individuals with whom they are in litigation. At Blairgowrie Earl Russell observed that "to permit ships of this kind knowingly to depart from this country, not to enter into a Confederate port, not to enter the ports of a belligerent, would, as you see, expose our good faith to great suspicion." The Attorney-General in addressing his constitutents had said "He hoped and believed that the people of the country at large would not be inclined to identify themselves in feeling with those merchants of ours who seemed to think that they are bound by no obligation to our laws at all." There was another instance of a member of the Government seeking to prejudice the case of the claimants. Mr. Milner Gibson, President of the Board of Trade, told a meeting at Ashton that he did not understand the law, yet "the common sense which does not enable him to understand the law does enable him to say that these parties had entered on a deliberate course of violating the laws of England." Sir Hugh Cairns examined and denounced the unconstitutional proceedings of the Government in detaining the vessels without evidence. He said, "I speak with full consciousness of the gravity of the expressions I use when I charge the Government—let there be no mistake—I charge the Government with having done it, and after hearing the Attorney-General to-night, I say having done on their own confession—what was illegal and unconstitutional, without law, without justification, and without excuse." The pretext of the Government that they violated the law to vindicate it was no justification. And the plea of acting on their responsibility was "the same wretched pretence which, from the worst days of despotism downwards, has always justified the acts of the executive Government." If the Government was right in detaining the Mersey rams in September, they have a right to detain any ship they please on suspicion. The Government is authorised by Act of Parliament to seize a ship, and then the owner can make them continue the proceedings and bring the case to trial, but there is no authority for the detention of a ship without seizure, and in such a case the owner has no remedy. Respecting the Alabama the United States Government had been told that the Government could not act upon suspicion and detain a ship, but hereafter Mr. Adams might cite the detention of the rams as a precedent. The offer of the Government to buy the vessels was a mockery: "the Government, with its hands upon the ships, the Government, asserting that the day was coming when the ships would be forfeited, said to the builder 'Come now, sell us these ships, let us buy them of you.'" The climax was this: Parliament meets at last, and the information can no longer be delayed. And then, four months after the seizure, Messrs. Laird are informed that an information will be filed in a few days, and that "it may be necessary to send a commission abroad for the purpose of collecting evidence."

The Solicitor-General, after repeating the protest of the Attorney-General against the production of the correspondence, avoided replying to the arguments of Sir Hugh Cairns, by dwelling on matters not immediately connected with them He was kind enough to say that he did not "desire to reflect on any gentleman entertaining Confederate sympathies," but we ought not to be guided by our sympathies. The Federals, being the stronger Power, insist that neutral nations shall not supply the Confederates with vessels of war, and as England is the strongest maritime Power, it is our interest to insist upon the same rule against the whole world. The learned gentleman observed, "When our territorial rights were infringed we applied for and obtained redress." [The redress in the case referred to was an apologetic despatch.]

Mr. Walpole agreed with the Solicitor-General that we ought to do to America as we would have America to do to us, and also that we should act to neutrals as we expect neutrals to act to us when we are at war. But if the Solicitor-General meant that we were therefore to give up our neutral rights, he (Mr. Walpole) did not agree with him. The law officers of the Crown seem to confound municipal and international law, whereas the two were perfectly distinct. A neutral State cannot supply a belligerent with munitions of war, but the subjects of a neutral State, so far as international law is concerned, can do so, being liable to the penalty of confiscation if they violate the law at home, or of capture if they attempt violate the blockade. The Solicitor-General had stated that it was contrary to the law of nations to furnish any country with a ship of war, but he (Mr. Walpole) hoped that that observation was a slip of the tongue, for neither in America nor in any other country had such a doctrine been held. Mr. Walpole addressed the House, not because he sympathised with one or the other of the American belligerents, but because he was anxious to maintain intact the great principles of international law.

After Mr. T. Baring had spoken against the motion, and Mr. Fitzgerald had made a brief reply, Sir George Grey stated that the Government were willing to present the correspondence with the Federal Government, but not the correspondence with Messrs. Laird. On a division, the motion was lost by a majority of 25; the numbers being, for the motion 153, and against it 178.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT TOBACCO AND THE BLOCKADE.

Sir Robert Clifton asked the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it was true that Her Majesty's Government had, on the application of the French Government, consented that the French Government should pass a quantity of tobacco through the blockade with the approval of the Washington Cabinet; and whether Her Majesty's Government had thought it their duty to make any similar application for the passing of cotton for the benefit of the distressed operatives of Lancashire.

Mr. Layard stated that at the time when the civil war broke out in the United States a large amount of tobacco belonging to the Governments of France and Austria happened to be at Richmond. The French Government asked the Government of the United States to allow them to bring that tobacco out of the country, and the Government of the United States replied that they were willing to consent on condition that the British Government did not object. The French Government made application through their ambassador to Her Majesty's Government, and Her Majesty's Government consented to allow this tobacco to be taken out of the country on condition that it was not made a precedent. Subsequently it was discovered that some portion of the tobacco had been purchased after hostilities had broken out, and a further application being made to Her Majesty's Government it was decided not to raise any difficulty upon that ground. Cotton, however, stood quite in a different category. The tobacco belonged to the Governments of two neutral countries, and formed part of their revenue; cotton, on the contrary, would only belong to private individuals.

DENMARK.

On Friday it was rumoured in town that the Austrian and Prussian troops had invaded, or were about to invade Jutland, and Mr. Newdegate asked Lord Palmerston if Her Majesty's Government would not consider such a proceeding inconsistent with the plea on which the German Powers had entered Holstein and Slesvig, and therefore whether it would not require "more energetic and decisive action, diplomatic or otherwise, on the part of Her Majesty's Government in the sense of the Treaty of 1852." Lord Palmerston fenced these interrogatories with his usual suavity and adroitness. He said that the Government had received no authentic accounts of the invasion of Jutland—a fact which everybody knew. Then he said that "no doubt any entrance into Jutland by the Austrian and Prussian troops would be an aggravation of that violent outrage and injustice which, in our opinion, they have committed in entering Slesvig—a measure involving great sacrifice of life and shedding of blood, for which those two Governments are deeply amenable." Finally, the noble lord declined to state what course the Government would adopt if Jutland was entered. [This will be very reassuring to Austria and Prussia. The Prime Minister of England denounces the invasion of Slesvig as a violent outrage, and speaks of the entrance into Jutland as an aggravation of it. The "violent outrage" has gone unchecked, except by big words, and the noble lord declines to say what the Government would do if a further offence is committed. The inference is that it will not be made a casus belli, for a Government desirous of maintaining peace would be anxious to warn the German Powers of the inevitable consequence of "an aggravation of the violent outrage."]

On Monday night the Danish question led to a spirited skirmish in the House of Commons. Lord Cecil asked Mr. Layard how the Danish papers were getting on, and whether the whole of the copy was in the hands of the printer. It is not an ill compliment to Mr. Layard's temper to observe that the words "Danish papers" make him very angry. He prefaced the expression of a hope that "the papers would be produced next week" by saying it was "absurd" to suggest that any other than Foreign-office printers should be employed; and added, rather pathetically, "if any document of a character to injure the public service were abstracted surreptitiously should I not be the first person held responsible by the noble lord?" Poor Mr. Layard. Earl Russell was at "rest" in the serene atmosphere of the painted chamber, and Lord Palmerston was at home with a cold and gout; so he besought the House to remember that if he did as members wished he might lose his place. But the appeal did not succeed, and Mr. B. Osborne, a very hard hitter, asked whether the foreign Powers concerned had given their consent to the production of the papers. Mr. Layard replied that he had never stated that such permission was necessary and that it was only asked as a matter of courtesy. Then Mr. Osborne, who is the most persistent and pertinent questioner in the House, said, "Has the question been asked?" Mr. Layard replied, "Of course it has been asked." Mr. Osborne would not be put off with the "of course," and wished to know if the Powers had assented. The unhappy Under-Secretary replied, "As far as we have gone yet. We cannot ask for permission until the papers are printed." Sir J. Walsh remarked, he could not understand this answer, and would like to know whether all the papers were to be laid before Parliament, or only a selection. Mr. Layard replied, "When hon. gentlemen see the papers, the greediest will not ask for more."

This was preliminary to an angry debate. Mr. Disraeli denounced ministerial evasions and the delay in the production of the papers. He referred to other great occasions when papers had been promptly presented; he called upon the House, for the sake of its interest and honour, to insist upon having the information, to which it is entitled. Mr. Gladstone made a few observations in reply, in which he sought to throw ridicule on Mr. Disraeli's energetic remonstrances, and said that the Government could do no more than express regret for the inconvenience to which the House was put, and to promise the papers as speedily as possible. After a few remarks from Lord Cecil, Mr. Osborne declared that the House was placed in a humiliating position, and that such excuses from the Government ought not to be received; and amidst loud cheers moved that the Navy Estimates should be put off three weeks, in order that the Commons might have the information required before voting supplies. Mr. Roebuck remarked that the motion was one of want of confidence in the Government, and that he should support it. Then ensued an ominous pause, and Mr. Gladstone rose and expressed his concurrence with Mr. Roebuck that the proposed motion was a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and said that such a motion should not be brought on without notice. Mr. Osborne said he would go on. Mr. Disraeli came to the rescue. He did not approve the foreign policy of the Government, and he was not surprised at the temper of the House, but the verdict of Parliament ought not to be pronounced without discussion. This settled the matter, and on a division the Government was in a majority of 173, only 17 voting for Mr. Osborne's motion. Thus the Government was saved by the forbearance of the leader of the Opposition and the strict discipline of his followers.

PENAL SERVITUDE.

On Thursday Sir George Grey introduced a bill making certain changes in reference to the punishment of penal servitude, founded on the report of the Royal Commission. Whether or not the proposed Bill is an improvement on the present law is a matter of opinion, but certainly it is the smallest reform ever put forward. No sentence of penal servitude is to be passed for less than five years. Respecting transportation no alteration is suggested, and Western Australia, as at present, is to receive rather less than 600 convicts per annum. The ticket-of-leave system is to be continued, but there is to be a somewhat closer supervision of the holders of licences, and for a breach of the law a licence-holder may be summarily convicted by two magistrates and remitted to prison to undergo the portion of the sentence not already served. In some cases the magistrates may sentence a ticket-of-leave man to a short term of imprisonment and then the conviction is to be reported to the Secretary of State, with whom it will rest to continue or revoke the licence. Unless convicts are as ungrateful as they are lawless and dishonest, they will still regard Sir George Grey as their best friend, and will pursue their business without any fear of a conviction leading to more unpleasant consequences than a temporary banishment from their favourite haunts.

INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

THE following extracts and gleanings from Southern newspapers give valuable information as to military and other affairs in the Confederate States, and will in many instances be found useful in the interpretation of the hazy Northern version of the progress of events :—

THE DEMONSTRATION ON RICHMOND

Early yesterday morning intelligence reached the city that the enemy, in considerable force, had reached Bottom's Bridge, with the supposed intention of another advance upon Richmond. As a matter of consequence, considerable excitement resulted, and rumours were abundant and conflicting. Many believed that the demonstration was made by Butler, with the earnest determination of rescuing the Yankee prisoners now in Richmond, while others properly conjectured that it was a feint to divert attention from other, and at present, more important points. During the day we endeavoured to ascertain something reliable with regard to this new movement, and the result of our efforts, as obtained from the most reliable sources of information, disclosed the following facts:—

On Saturday night about 9 o'clock our pickets below Bottom's Bridge discovered that the enemy were advancing in some force—both cavalry and infantry. The pickets retired before them until the bridge was crossed, when a stand was made, and the further advance of the enemy awaited. In the meantime a supporting force had been sent down to the bridge, and preparations were at once made to dispute its passage by the enemy. At daylight yesterday morning the anticipated attempt to cross the bridge was made, but easily repulsed, when they drew off a few hundred yards. Here they formed a line of battle, and it was readily supposed that they intended to make another effort to cross the Chickahominy, but finding our men resolute in their purpose of maintaining their ground, after remaining in line of battle for an hour or two the Yankees retired. Last night matters in the city had settled down, and things again resumed their usual quiet.—Richmond Dispatch, February 8.

The unusual ringing of bells early yesterday morning gave notice that the enemy were advancing up the peninsula and in disagreeable proximity to Richmond. Soon everybody was astir, and a "thousand and one rumours" filled the air, and from the manner in which some of the mounted "home guard" dashed about the streets, thereby creating unnecessary alarm among the women and children, a stranger might have been impressed with the belief that a force of Yankees as numerous as the host of Xerxes was coming to overwhelm the city. The facts are believed to be as follows:—Early yesterday morning the enemy appeared at Bottom's Bridge, over the Chickahominy, when skirmishing ensued with some of our cavalry, and the enemy retired. They then crossed the railroad at Dispatch station, and attempted to ford the river, but were baffled in this by the quantity of felled timber in the swamp, which rendered it impracticable. They then retired to Talleysville, which is about eight miles from Bottom's Bridge. Scouts report that a considerable force came up from Barhamsville, and made a junction at Talleysville with that which appeared at the bridge in the morning. It consists, ar far as could be ascertained, of three brigades of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery. At last accounts they were advancing, and a collision with our troops is believed to be probable. In such an event, however, we may safely say that no apprehension need be entertained of the result.

The reign of quiet on the Rapidan was disturbed Saturday morning by the appearance of the enemy at Morton's, Summerville, and Barnett's fords. Two brigades of their infantry crossed at Morton's in the forenoon, but were quickly driven back. They appeared again, when a portion of our troops were sent across the river and repulsed them, driving them back and killing a considerable number. Our men recrossed yesterday morning, and at last accounts were still on the other side.—Richmond Whig, February 8.

ORANGE COURT-HOUSE, February 7.—The enemy crossed in large force on Saturday at Morton's Ford, but after a sharp contest were repulsed by General Ed. Johnson's division, and driven back over the river and pursued. Our troops returned this morning. The enemy also attempted to cross at Barnett's Ford, but were repulsed by General Scales's North Carolina brigade and Lomax's cavalry. The casualties on our side were slight. The enemy have retired.—Telegram in Richmond Papers.

Richmond is threatened by the enemy. Our pickets were driven in on Saturday night at Bottom's bridge, twelve miles from Richmond. The enemy crossed the York River Railroad near Dispatch station. A large force, massed at Barklemasville, moved forward to Tallisville yesterday afternoon, and was then advancing. Their force consists of three brigades of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, and twelve pieces of artillery.—Richmond Examiner, February 8.

THE AFFAIR AT SMITHFIELD.

Captain Pipkin, with three weak companies belonging to the Thirty-first North Carolina regiment, a small party of the Seventh Cavalry, and Sturdivant's battery, were ordered to intercept a party of raiders then in the neighbourhood of Smithfield, composed of cavalry, infantry, and some marines, the whole under command of Captain Lee. The order was gallantly and successfully obeyed. Our troops secured a position in their rear and front which effectually cut off advance and retreat, except by Pagan Creek. At 12 o'clock on Monday the fight commenced, and after firing without much loss on either side, the enemy sent a flag of truce, asking to see the commander of our troops, and to demand their strength. Of course a refusal to both demands was returned, and five minutes given for an unconditional surrender. This was agreed to, and Captain Lee was in the act of signing the parole for himself and command, when one of his men informed him a gunboat was approaching. With genuine Yankee perfidy he refused to surrender his men, and the fight recommenced. The gunboat shelled the banks while the enemy's troops were getting aboard. Sturdivant's battery took a position about one hundred yards distant and opened with effect on the boat. Our infantry lined the banks of the creek and shot down every man who appeared upon deck. Several of the men leaped overboard and were drowned, while others clung to the rudders and sides of the vessel. In a short time her boiler was damaged and she surrendered. The prisoners were scarcely as ore when her magazine took fire, and she blew up, with her stores, ammunition, &c. The boat was named the Smith Bridges, and mounted three guns. Her captain was taken after being shot through the neck. One of her lieutenants is severely wounded in the stomach, and all her crew captured. Some of the enemy escaped through a swamp, but ten horses were secured. The enemy lost at least twenty men killed and drowned. Our loss was two killed, belonging to the Seventh Cavalry; they were natives of Georgia.

The Express says:—The enemy numbered about 150 in all, and was made up of a portion of the New York Ninety-ninth infantry, a part of the Thirty-fifth New York cavalry, and a section of a Pennsylvania Battery, numbering two guns. It was reported at Ivor before the train left that a large force was landing at Smithfield yesterday, with the hope, it is thought, of recapturing the prisoners who fell into our hands on Monday. But they were several hours too late, as no time was lost by Captain Sturdivant, after the surrender, in destroying the gunboat and securing the prisoners. The entire force surrendered, save Captain Lee and five of his command, who cowardly and treacherously escaped in a small boat, after the display of the white flag.—Petersburg Register, February 3.

THE THREATENED ATTACK ON MOBILE.

MOBILE, February 5.—A special to the Evening News, dated Clinton, the 4th, says: "Sherman's two corps, under McPherson and Hurlburt, are advancing. General Jackson has fought them all day. They made but two miles to-day, and will encamp to-night six or eight miles below Clinton. Persons report the advancing column to be 30,000 strong. General Rose whipped their cavalry on the Yazoo yesterday in a hand to hand fight with pistols."

MOBILE, February 4.—A special dispatch to the Evening News, dated Okolona, says: "No signs of the enemy in Northern Mississippi or in West Tennessee, except at Memphis and Charleston."

The Yankee programme is an advance from Vicksburg into Central Alabama, necessitating, as they suppose, the abandonment of Mobile.

Our forces occupy Corinth and Jackson. Neither have been destroyed, but everything has been carried off, including stock, farming implements, and household furniture.

The Yankee cavalry, in strong force, crossed the Big Black yesterday, or the day before, and were met by Jackson's cavalry. A lively fight took place. Perhaps this is the commencement of the general advance of the enemy.

TENNESSEE.

Our forces remained quiet in front of Knoxville save a little skirmishing. General Longstreet's headquarters are now at Russelville, though his cavalry forces are beyond Strawberry Plains. Knoxville is not yet evacuated, a portion of the Ninth Army Corps is still there. From gentlemen just through from there we gather the following items:

It is rumoured that our forces have destroyed two of the three small steamers used as transports by the enemy on the Tennessee river between Chattanooga and Loudon. The Yankees are building a star fort near Dr. Baker's, ten miles south of the city. The smallpox is raging at Knoxville. Among the recent victims is Mrs. Joroulman, wife of R. D. Joroulman, Esq.

The Yankees are erecting fortifications on Love's hills, four miles north-east of the city, on the Rutledge-road.

A few days ago Major Day, of Rucher's Legion, captured at Big Spring, Claiborne County, Tennessee, seventy-five Yankees, with their horses and arms, besides killing five or six and wounding several.

The Rev. R. M. Stevens, who was arrested by the Federals on their advent into East Tennessee, and sent to Camp Chase, died of hardships while being transported to that prison. Mr. John Bise, a citizen of Knoxville, died whilst en route from that city to one of the Northern bastilles.

We have some interesting intelligence from Knoxville, furnished by a gentleman who has been in the town ever since its occupation by the Yankees, until a short time since, when he succeeded in effecting his escape. The severity of the Federal rule, he represents, has pretty effectually killed the intense Unionism of many of the citizens of the place, and more completely determined the Southern portion of the population to continue the weight of its influence in behalf of Southern rights. When he left Knoxville a great deal of sickness prevailed, and there were over three hundred cases of small-pox in the city. The dead were being buried in yards and gardens, or wherever most convenient. Dead horses and mules were lying in the streets, and for more than a mile around the earth was strewn with decomposing carcases. The beautiful ornamental trees in the streets and in the grounds of private residences have been cut down, and even those in the Asylum grounds have been felled and consumed. The oppression of loyal citizens is represented to be cruel and despotic. They are not permitted to follow their occupations or to sell or buy without a permit from General Foster, and this cannot be obtained without taking the oath. Some who have not the means of procuring food have been starved into taking the oath, in order to draw the scanty rations allowed their loyal subjects. These rations consist of a hard cracker per day, and a little blue, stringy beef. A number of the citizens have been compelled to crowd themselves and effects into one or two rooms, while the other parts of their large and comfortable mansions are appropriated for officers' quarters. The whole country around is a waste of ruin and desolation.—Richmond Papers, February 6 and 7.

CONFEDERATE VICTORY NEAR NEWBERN.

KINSTON, February 3, 1864.

To General S. COOPER: I made a reconnaissance within a mile and a half of Newbern with Hoke's brigade, and a part of Corse's and Clingman's, and some artillery. Met the enemy in force at Batchelor's Creek; killed and wounded about one hundred in all, captured thirteen officers and two hundred and eighty prisoners, fourteen negroes, two rifled pieces and caissons, three hundred stand of small arms, four ambulances, three wagons, fifty-five animals, a quantity of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and two flags.

Commander Wood, C.S.N., captured and destroyed the United States gunboat Underwriter.

Our loss thirty-five killed and wounded.

(Signed) G. E. PICKETT,
Major-General-Commanding.

The following despatch was also received by the Secretary of the Navy:

KINSTON, February 4, 1864.

Hon. S. R. MALLORY: The force under my command boarded and captured last night, the gunboat Underwriter, four guns, ninety men and officers. Her position, within musket range of several strong works, one of which was raking the vessel during the time we had possession, and her not having steam up, caused me to burn her. Our loss is twenty killed and wounded, and four missing. The enemy's unknown.

(Signed) J. TAYLOR WOOD.

One hundred and twenty Yankee prisoners from Newbern arrived yesterday, probably the crew of the gunboat Underwriter.—Richmond Enquirer, February 6.

VIRGINIA.

Orange Court-house. Feb. 2.—Reports received here this evening from several sources state that General Early has captured a force of Yankees at Petersburg, Hardy county, Virginia, estimated at 800.—Telegram to Richmond Papers.

The Richmond Dispatch of February 8, published the following:—

ORANGE COURT-HOUSE, Feb. 6, 1864.

To General S. COOPER:

On the 30th ult. General Rosser captured a train of ninety-three wagons, loaded with commissary stores and forage, on the way from New Creek to Petersburg; also 300 mules and twenty prisoners.

The guard of 800 infantry escaped to the mountains.

Our loss was twenty-five killed and wounded.

Information of the advance upon Petersburg having been received, the garrison evacuated it during the night.

On the 2nd instant General Rosser destroyed the bridges over Patterson Creek and north branch of the Potomac and canal, and captured forty prisoners.

Two hundred and seventy prisoners, fifty wagons and teams 1,200 cattle, and 500 sheep have been brought off.

General Rosser has shown great energy and skill, and his command deserves great credit.

R. E. LEE.

CHARLESTON TELEGRAMS.

February 5.—Eighty shots were fired at the city to-day, The monitors fired eleven and fifteen-inch shells.

February 6.—Eighty-eight shots were fired at the city to-day. There was no firing at Sumter. The enemy has been hauling ammunition all day to Gregg and Cummings Point batteries. There was a large fire on Folly Island to-day. It is supposed to have been caused by the burning of the Yankee. hospitals.

A gunboat in the Edisto river is lying high and dry. It is believed she will be destroyed.

February 7.—The enemy has ceased firing on the city, but continues working on the batteries and hauling ammunition.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

THE CONSCRIPTION OF FREE NEGROES AND THE EMPLOYMENT OF SLAVES IN THE ARMY.—On the 30th inst., in the House, the unfinished bill, reported from the military committee, to increase the efficiency of the army by the employment of free negroes and slaves in certain capacities, was taken up. This bill, in its original form, contains three sections. The first provides for the conscription of all male free negroes resident in the Confederate States, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, to perform such duties with the army, or in connection with the military defences of the country, in the way of work upon the fortifications or in government work for the production or preparation of materials of war, or in military hospitals, as the Secretary of War may prescribe, but leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, to exempt such free negroes as the interests of the country may require should be exempted. The second section authorises the Secretary of War to employ for duties similar to those indicated in the first section, as many male negro slaves, not to exceed 20,000, as, in his judgment, the wants of the service may require; the owners of such slaves to be paid $1 per month for their use and service, and to be paid for him in case he is lost or dies while in such service. The third section provides that if the Secretary of War shall be unable to procure the services of slaves in any military department in sufficient numbers for the necessities of the department, upon the terms and conditions set forth in the preceding section, then he is authorised to impress as many male slaves, not to exceed 20,000, as may be required from time to time to discharge the duties indicated. An amendment was offered to this section which provides that if the owner have but one male slave within the ages of eighteen and fifty years, he shall not be impressed against the wish of the said owner. Substantially in this form the bill was passed, after considerable discussion.

THE Senate, in secret session, has passed a substitute for the House financial bill. The bill to establish a volunteer navy was also passed, and a bill to authorise the President to establish a military court for each division of cavalry in the field, and one for each State in any military department, whenever the public interest may require it. Resolutions complimentary of the Louisiana troops, who have re-enlisted for the war, were adopted, and the House bill to establish an asylum to be called "The Veteran Soldiers' Home," was adopted. The bill to provide and organise a general staff for armies in the field, to serve during the war, was passed. Al staff officers are to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. A bill containing almost the identical provisions was passed by Congress at the last session, and vetoed by the President. The bill to organise forces to serve during the war was passed by the Senate in secret session.

FEDERAL BARBARITY.

A correspondent of the Atlanta Register, writing from Walhalla, South Carolina, January 24, says:—I presume you have heard of the recent invasion of Western North Carolina and a small portion of Towns county, Georgia, by a column of Yankee cavalry, 1,500 in number. They came from East Tennessee and entered North Carolina through the county of Cherokee. They were stopped by the want of subsistence for themselves and horses, and the frequent assaults upon them in their forages by the Carolina Home Guards, and a portion of the Indian forces of Thomas's Legion, then scouting the mountains in quest of bushwhackers. In their invasion and retreat, as usual, they pillaged indiscriminately, and carried off with them many negroes, horses, cattle, food, and clothing. But the climax of their atrocities was the capture of two Confederate soldiers at home upon furloughs, whom they delivered over to the merciless bushwhackers of West North Carolina and Tennessee, who immediately shot them. The names of these two soldiers were Young Colbert and Davidson.

A BRAVE WOMAN.

The Montgomery (Alabama) papers publish a letter from Miss Emma Sansom, who so heroically guided General Forrest in his memorable capture of General Streight and his raiders. This letter is in response to the one written by Governor Shorter, when transmitting the resolutions of the Legislature to Miss Sansom. Streight and his men were captured in Cherokee county, Ala., within a few miles of Miss Sansom's home.

GLADSDEN, Ala., December 20, 1863.

To His Excellency Governor SHORTER:

Respected Sir: I must acknowledge the receipt of your quite complimentary communication of November 27, 1863, and in doing so, tender my gratitude for the more than expected respect shown me for having done my duty. At the time the duty was performed it was a pleasure to be able to render some service to my country, and give aid to our noble cause. There are other duties that would seem more becoming and adapted to my sex, but feeling it my high privilege upon such an occasion, I went forward, inspired by a sense of duty and of the purest motives, willing to hazard woman's timidity in giving aid to impede the onward march of the marauding foe.

In conclusion, I must acknowledge my profound gratitude for the very liberal donation by the State; and while I continue to live, I shall endeavour to render myself not more unworthy of your high respect than heretofore.

I have the satisfaction to be, very respectfully, your friend,
EMMA SANSOM.

WHAT IS EXPECTED OF MORGAN.

(From the Richmond Dispatch, February 7.)

The country looks forward with high hope to the future movements of General Morgan. If he had incentives to great enterprise before in his ardent patriotism and extraordinary energy, he has motives now which will add ten-fold vigour to his resolutions and fire his heart. The ignominy of his treatment in Columbus, and the cruel treatment, resulting in the death of one of the best and bravest of their number, which has been inflicted upon his imprisoned comrades in consequence of his escape, call trumpet-tongued for vengeance.

His nature is too noble and exalted to visit that vengeance upon the weak and defenceless—upon women, children, and old men—after the fashion of the cowardly savages among our enemies who have made mankind blush for their crimes. But every legitimate method of retaliation he is bound to accomplish by every dictate of self-respect, of justice to his outraged companions in Columbus, and last, though not least, of public policy. We are dealing with a foe who can only be mollified by the most vigorous measures, and who is governed by fear rather than kindness.

At the same time, we expect from General Morgan the greatest caution and prudence, for all the craft and subtlety that the most infernal malignity can suggest will be employed to entrap, circumvent, and destroy him. We believe that he is more than a match for Yankeedom in strategems as well as fight, and that he will prove as profound in counsel as vigorous in the field. The whole country says God speed to the glorious cavalier of the West. May he pay back with compound interest every wrong his comrades and himself have received, and achieve new glories for his immortal name.

A PREDICTION—BULL RUN TO BE RE-ENACTED.

(From the Richmond Whig, February 3.)

We venture a prediction that a rout more disgraceful than the Bull Run stampede awaits the Yankees in most of the conflicts likely to occur during the next campaign. They will have to enter upon it with all the disadvantages of raw levies, who will present but a poor bulwark against the gallant veterans of Lee and Johnston. As to the contingent of the three years' men likely to remain in service, if we take the estimates of Yankee authorities, they will not constitute a force sufficiently large to impart an air of martial discipline to the new organisation. The Bull Run stampeders were veterans compared with the material which will compose the new army. The former comprised the well-drilled volunteers of the different cities of the North, and they went cheerfully into the fight, encouraged by a foregone conviction of easy victory, and no dread experience of sad reverse to mar their assurances of triumph. The latter will enter into the conflict with unwilling hearts, novices in discipline, and with the doubts and fears which the presence of a grand army of indomitable veterans must inspire. They will, moreover, have to encounter the serious drawback of malarious infections and ordinary camp diseases, which committed such fearful havoc in the Yankee ranks during the first summer of the war. But we see no grounds to presume that the Yankees will bring into the field a larger force than we will. If they do, it must of necessity be of such material as cannot, if multiplied in the disproportion of ten to one, counterbalance the overpowering advantage which we shall possess in a well-disciplined veteran army. No result, however palpable, achieved now by our arms can be received as an index of what is to come, when we have the "greenhorns" to encounter. We do not desire to underrate in the least degree the fighting qualities of the Yankees. Recently they have done well—much better, indeed, than we ever thought them capable of doing. Our predictions as to what is to result from a conflict between the two armies are justified upon the plainest principles of military science. We, therefore, reiterate our expectation that the Bull Run scene will be re-enacted with increased dramatic effect in more than one conflict during the ensuing summer.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.—THE "CHESAPEAKE."

THE following despatches were read in the House of Commons on Friday last:—

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington,
January 9, 1864.

"The undersigned Secretary of State of the United States has the honour to present his respects to the Right Hon. Lord Lyons, accredited to this Government as the Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty, and to state that he has submitted to the President certain papers which were placed in the hands of the undersigned by his lordship on the second day of this month, and which are described as follows:—1. Memorial of Susan Henry; 2. Affidavit of John E. Holt; 3. Memorial of John E. Holt; 4. Affidavit of John E. Holt; 5. Provincial Secretary to the Mayor of Halifax, December 19, 1863; 6. Mayor of Halifax to Provincial Secretary, December 19, 1863; 7. Same to same, December 22, 1863; 8. City Marshal to Mayor of Halifax, December 21, 1863; 9. Police-constable Hutt to City Marshal, December 21, 1863. The undersigned is authorised in the first place to express to his lordship his appreciation of the deficiency of manner in which his lordship has thus, without formal complaint, brought to the notice of this Government the fact that the commander and other officers of the United States' steamer Ella and Annie in their recent visit to Halifax, in pursuit of pirates who had captured the American steamer Chesapeake, and taken refuge within British jurisdiction, directly violated the sovereignty of Her Majesty, by the assumption of power and authority in the name of the United States, as well on board the said steamer Chesapeake as on board the British schooner Investigator, while within British waters, without having obtained consent thereto of the authorities of Her Majesty's Government there or elsewhere. The undersigned observes that in some of these papers it is represented that the acts of power and authority referred to were attended with circumstances of severity, rigour, and insult to British subjects. The undersigned, however, thinks that it sufficiently appears from the papers that the rigour and severity alleged were not greater than were necessary to secure the persons of the pirates in pursuit of whom the officers complained of were engaged, and to deliver them up to the British authorities of that place. He hopes that this view of the case may be taken by Her Majesty's Government. The undersigned would observe in the next place that the Chesapeake and the prisoners were promptly delivered to those authorities, in compliance with the instructions of this department. The undersigned is further authorised to assure Her Majesty's Government in the spirit of a former communication made by the undersigned to his lordship, relating to the capture of the Chesapeake in British waters, that the President disapproves and regrets the act of force, power, and authority which was exercised by the officers of the Ella and Annie within British waters on the occasion mentioned, as a violation of the law of nations and of the friendly relations existing between the two countries, so greatly to the satisfaction of the United States, and to the advantage of both nations. The President has reason to believe that the proceedings thus disapproved were taken by the officers concerned under the influence of a patriotic and commendable zeal to bring to deserved punishment outlaws who had offended against the peace and dignity of both countries. The President, while he recognises this circumstance as modifying the character of the transaction and mitigating the censure to be bestowed upon it, nevertheless freely concedes that it does not constitute a justification for the violation of the sovereignty of Great Britain which those officers have committed. He has, therefore, directed that they shall be censured for this violation, and he will take such other means as may be necessary to prevent a recurrence of the grievances complained of. Fully determined to make all the amends that are due to Great Britain in the premisses, the undersigned will await the consideration of Her Majesty's Government upon the case as it has now been submitted. The undersigned avails himself, &c.,

"To LORD LYONS," &c. W. H. SEWARD."

"FOREIGN-OFFICE, February 3, 1864.

"My Lord,—Your several despatches of the numbers and dates specified in the margin, respecting the case of the Chesapeake, together with the papers which have been received by the Secretary of State for the Colonies from the colonial authorities in North America, have been submitted to the law officers of the Crown for their opinion on the different questions raised in them. The greater part of those questions have reference to the administration of the law in the colonies, and I need not trouble your lordship with the view taken of them by the law officers of the Crown. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, to whom I have communicated the opinion of the law officers, will doubtless give full instructions to the several colonial authorities. The readiness which Mr. Seward, in his first communication with your lordship, manifested to make all proper and suitable reparation for the acts of the United States officers, has rendered it unnecessary for me to insist upon the questions which, under other circumstances, it would have been my duty at once to instruct your lordship to discuss with the Government of the United States—namely, the wilful and flagrant violation of Her Majesty's territory by the officers of the United States cruiser Ella and Annie. The Government of the United States having subsequently made, as reported in your lordship's despatch of the 12th of January, a full apology for the violation of Her Majesty's territory committed by its officers in the case of the Chesapeake, it is only necessary for me to authorise your lordship to state to Mr. Seward that Her Majesty's Government accept that apology in the same spirit in which it has been offered, and are truly glad that the matter has been settled in a manner honourable to both parties, and calculated to improve the friendly relations which Her Majesty's Government are always anxious to maintain with the Government of the United States. I am, &c.,

"RUSSELL."

THE ADVENTURES OF MORGAN AND HIS MEN.

(From the Richmond Whig, January 15.)

S. C. REID, the correspondent of the Atlanta Intelligencer, had an interview with Captain Henry T. Hines, at Dalton, Georgia, on the 4th instant, and obtained the particulars of his capture, escape from the Ohio Penitentiary, and return to Dixie. As the public are familiar with the circumstances of the capture, &c., we confine our extracts to the thrilling incidents of the return to the Confederacy, in company with General Morgan, which will amply repay perusal:—

"It had been previously determined that, on reaching the outer walls, the parties should separate, Morgan and Hines together, and the others to shape their course for themselves. Thus they parted. Hines and the General proceeded at once to the depot to purchase their tickets for Cincinnati. But lo! where was the money? The inventive Hines had only to touch the magical wand of his ingenuity to be supplied. While in prison he had the precaution, after planning his escape, to write to a lady friend in a peculiar cipher, which, when handed to the authorities to read through, openly contained nothing contraband; but which, on the young lady receiving, she, according to instructions, sent him some books in the back of one of which she concealed some "greenbacks," and across the inside wrote her name, to indicate the place where the money was deposited. The books came safe to hand, and Hines was flush. Going boldly up to the ticket office, while Morgan modestly stood back and adjusted a pair of green goggles over his eyes, which one of the men, having weak eyes, had worn in the prison.

"They took their seats in the cars without suspicion. How their hearts beat until the locomotive whistled to start! Slowly the wheels turn and they are off. The cars were due in Cincinnati at 7 a.m. At Dalton, Ohio, they were detained one hour. What keen anguish of suspense did they not suffer! They knew that at 5 o'clock a.m. the convicts would be called, and that the escape would then be discovered, when it would be telegraphed in every direction, consequently the guards would be ready to greet them on their arrival. They were rapidly nearing the city of Abolition hogdom. It was a cool rainy morning. Just as the train entered the suburbs, about half a mile from the depot, the two escaped prisoners went out on the platform and put on the brakes, checking the cars sufficiently to let them jump off. Hines jumped off first and fell, considerably stunned. Morgan followed unhurt. They immediately made toward the river, striking it at Ludlow's Ferry. Here they found a boy with a skiff, who had just ferried across some ladies from Covington. They dared not turn their heads for fear of seeing the guards coming. "Hines," whispered the General, "look out and see if anybody is coming!" The boy was told they wanted to cross, but he desired to wait for more passengers. The General told him he was in a hurry, and promised to pay double fare. The skiff shot out into the stream; they soon reached the Kentucky shore, and breathed free.

"The boy had told them the place of residence of a lady friend; thither they bent their steps, and were received with the wildest demonstrations of joy and hospitality. They were afraid to tarry long. Horses were immediately procured for them, and that day, the 28th November, they rode to the town of Union, in Boone county, twenty-eight miles from Covington. There they stayed all night and the next day, leaving on the night of the 29th with volunteer guides, and travelling by neighbourhood and by-roads, passing through Gallatin county to the Owen county line, where they stopped with a friend and spent the day of the 30th. They resumed their travels at night, passing through New Liberty, crossed the Kentucky river, and at 2 a.m. on the 1st December stopped twelve miles on the other side of Newcastle. Pushing on that day, they arrived at night eight miles this side of Shelbyville, where they spent the day of the 2nd with their friends, meeting with a glorious reception. At night they departed again, passing through Taylorsville, and reached the vicinity of Bardstown on the morning of the 3rd. Here they remained over until the night of the 5th, having received a most cordial greeting and unbounded hospitality. Again advancing, they passed through glorious old Nelson county, stopping on Rolling Fork. On the 5th they laid over, and at night reached the vicinity of Greensburg, passing between the pickets of the enemy and their base. The fugitives had been joined by four others, and the party now consisted of six. They remained concealed inside of the enemy's pickets during the day of the 6th. Their trip through Kentucky has been one grand ovation, the ladies going wild with joy, and the men offering them everything in their power, showing that the true spirit still breathes in that down-trodden State.

"On the night of the 6th they procured guides to proceed to the Cumberland river, the road being thickly lined with Yankees. At 10 a.m. on the 7th they reached the Cumberland, nine miles below Burksville, having travelled sixty miles that night, and crossed the river in a canoe, swimming their horses and passing for Federal cavalry. That night they stayed at the house of a good Union friend, who, supposing them to belong to Jacob's cavalry, took the best care of them. On the 8th they passed into Overton county, Tennessee, following in the rear of a large Yankee scouting party, who, they learned, were in hot chase after Morgan. The General here learning that a number of escaped prisoners of his command were in the vicinity, a portion being under Captain Ray, he determined to wait until they could be collected, and then take them out, for which purpose he laid over until the 12th of December.

"The squad was now increased to forty men, under command of Captain Hines, and crossing a spur of the Cumberland by way of Crossville, between Sparta and Knoxville, they arrived at Bridge's Ferry, on the Tennessee river, at 10 o'clock in the morning of the 13th. There being no boat or skiff to cross, the party was compelled to fell trees to make a raft. This ferry was within two miles and a half of the Yankee cavalry camp. By 2 p.m. they had succeeded in crossing twenty-five men and six horses. At this time a cavalry force of the enemy appeared on the north side of the river and fired upon the party who had been engaged making the raft. The enemy succeeded in capturing three or four men, but the others made their escape back into Tennessee. At the same moment the enemy also appeared on the south side of the river, when General Morgan, Hines, and four others mounted their horses to escape.

"After riding two miles and a half from the river, Hines rode up to a house, for the purpose of procuring a guide, leaving Morgan and the other men in the road. Hines had obtained the guide when he heard Morgan halloo to him, and soon after a party of cavalry dashed up toward Hines, which, at first, he took for a part of our men, until they approached so close that escape was impossible. Hines had on a Yankee gun-cloth, which covered his clothes, and seeing that they took him for an "Abolish,' he feigned to be a Yankee. The Abolish captain riding up, said, 'Who are you?' 'One of you,' replied Hines. 'Where are the rebels?' asked the captain. "They have just gone down this road; come on and we will catch them," said Hines, riding off in the opposite direction from that taken by Morgan, who, at the time, was near the foot of the hill, and was thus enabled to escape. The party followed Hines, but soon after discovered him to be a true rebel, and taking away his arms, they threatened to hang him for misleading them.

"Hines was carried across the river to their camps and put under guard. He passed off for a private under the name of Bullitt. That night he ate up several letters and private papers, besides the notes of his trip, which would have condemned him, thus making a paper supper, which probably saved his neck. On the evening of the 14th the captain returned from the scout, and reported that the rebels had escaped. He had learned from a citizen that Morgan was one of the party, and suspected Hines of being an escaped prisoner. He charged him with being a Confederate officer, and questioned him very closely. In order to gain Hines' confidence and to pump him, he treated him very kindly and asked him to go to a Union man's house to take supper.

"On leaving the house about 9 p.m., which was half a mile from the camp, after getting off about ten steps, the 'Yankee' remembered he had left his shawl and went back. The night was dark, and Hines struggled with himself to gain his consent to escape, but considering the confidence and kindness of the officer, he concluded to wait until he got out of his hands. Hines remained in camp under guard during the night of the 14th, and the next morning was sent to Kingston, with an escort of ten men, where he was placed in gaol, and kept for five days without fire and almost without food. Here he found three of his comrades who had been captured on the other side of the river. On the 20th he and his three companions, William and Robert Church, and Smith of the 3rd Kentucky cavalry, were sent to the camp of the 3rd Yankee Kentucky infantry, opposite Loudon, on the Tennessee river, nineteen miles from Kingston. The prisoners were confined in a small house in the centre of the camp, the timber being cut down in every direction for half a mile, and there being but one path leading to the mountain from the camp, which was closely guarded. That night it was bright moonlight, but the moon went down just before daylight.

"Hines and his companions, by agreement, under pretence of being very cold, dressed themselves at the time, and sat down with the guards round the fire. At a given signal his comrades rose and stood round the fire, while Hines, keeping one of the guards busily engaged talking, quietly approached the door unobserved, raising the latch, giving the wink at the same time to his friends. Then turning suddenly, he threw the door wide open and said, with composure, "Gentlemen, we have remained here long enough; it is time we were going!" The guards were struck dumb with surprise, and thought it a joke. But before they could recover their senses, Hines flew past the guards in front of the house and ran like a deer for the woods. He heard a struggle for a moment near the house, and then a volley of minie balls whizzed by him. His three comrades must have been caught. The enemy pursued him to the wood and up the mountain for three-quarters of a mile, when they lost his track.

"Hines travelled six miles across the mountains that morning and lay concealed during the day. At night he approached a house in a valley, and finding the occupant a Unionist, he passed himself off as a Yankee government agent. In conversing about the rebels, the Unionist said that there were a few still lurking about, but as the river was well guarded there were but few places they could cross at, and mentioned one place, five miles below Loudon, where he said a rebel lived who kept a canoe. Hines made an excuse to go out that night, and proceeded to the ferry indicated, where he found the canoe and crossed the river. He soon found many friends on the south side of the river to aid him, and travelling altogether by night till out of danger, he finally arrived at Dalton, Georgia, on the evening of the 29th December, having walked the whole distance from Loudon."

GENERAL BANKS'S PROCLAMATION.

THE following is the order issued by General Banks "for the restoration of Louisiana to the Union:"—

HEADQUARTERS DEP'T OF THE GULF.
New Orleans, January 11, 1864.

To the people of Louisiana:—

I. In pursuance of authority vested in me by the President of the United States, and upon consultation with many representative men of different interests, being fully assured that more than a tenth of the population desire the earliest possible restoration of Louisiana to the Union, I invite the loyal citizens of the State, qualified to vote in public affairs, as hereinafter prescribed, to assemble in the election precincts designated by law, or at such places as may hereafter be established, on the 22nd day of February, 1864, to cast their votes for the election of State officers herein named, viz:—

I. Governor.
II. Lieutenant-Governor.
III. Secretary of State.
IV. Treasurer.
V. Attorney-General.
VI. Superintendent of Public Instruction.
VII. Auditor of Public Accounts.

Who shall, when elected, for the time being, and until others are appointed by competent authority, constitute the Civil Government of the State, under the Constitution and laws of Louisiana, except so much of the said Constitution and laws as recognise, regulate, or relate to slavery, which, being inconsistent with the present condition of public affairs, and plainly inapplicable to any class of persons now existing within its limits, must be suspended, and they are therefore and hereby declared to be inoperative and void. This proceeding is not intended to ignore the right of property existing prior to the rebellion, nor to preclude the claim for compensation of loyal citizens for losses sustained by enlistments or other authorised acts of the Government.

II. The oath of allegiance prescribed by the President's Proclamation, with the condition affixed to the elective franchise by the Constitution of Louisiana, will constitute the qualification of voters in this election. Officers elected by them will be duly installed in their offices on the fourth day of March, 1864.

III. The registration of voters, effected under the direction of the military governor and the several Union associations, not inconsistent with the Proclamation or other orders of the President, are confirmed and approved.

IV. In order that the organic law of the State may be made to conform to the will of the people and harmonise with the spirit of the age, as well as to maintain and preserve the ancient landmarks of civil and religious liberty, an election of delegates to a Convention for the revision of the Constitution, will be held on the first Monday of April 1864. The basis of representation, the number of delegates, and the details of election, will be announced in subsequent orders.

V. Arrangements will be made for the early election of members of Congress for the State.

VI. The fundamental law of the State is martial law. It is competent and just for the Government to surrender to the people, at the earliest possible moment, so much of military power as may be consistent with the success of military operation; to prepare the way by prompt and wise measures for the full restoration of the State to the Union and its power to the people; to restore their ancient and unsurpassed prosperity; to enlarge the scope of agricultural and commercial industry and to extend and confirm the dominion of rational liberty. It is not within human power to accomplish these results without some sacrifice of individual prejudices and interests. Problems of state, too complicate for the human mind, have been solved by the national cannon. In great civil convulsions, the agony of strife enters the souls of the innocent as well as the guilty. The Government is subject to the law of necessity, and must consult the condition of things, rather than the preferences of men, and if so be that its purposes are just and its measures wise, it has the right to demand that questions of personal interest and opinion shall be subordinate to the public good. When the national existence is at stake, and the liberties of the people in peril, faction is treason.

The methods herein proposed submit the whole question of government directly to the people: first, by the election of executive officers faithful to the Union, to be followed by a loyal representation in both houses of Congress; and then by a convention, which will confirm the action of the people, and recognise the principles of freedom in the organic law. This is the wish of the President. The anniversary of Washington's birth is a fit day for the commencement of so grand a work. The immortal Father of his Country was never guided by a more just and benignant spirit than that of his successor in office the President of the United States. In the hour of our trial let us heed his admonitions!

Louisiana, in the opening of her history, sealed the integrity of the Union by conferring upon its Government the Valley of the Mississippi. In the war for independence upon the sea she crowned a glorious struggle against the first maritime Power of the world, by a victory unsurpassed in the annals of war. Let her people now announce to the world the coming restoration of the Union, in which the ages that follow us have a deeper interest than our own, by the organisation of a free government, and her fame will be immortal!

N. P. BANKS, M.G.C.

EMANCIPATION AND EXTERMINATION.

(From the New York World, February 4, 1864.)

THE remarkable fact stated by our New Orleans correspondent, in the letter which we published yesterday, cannot have escaped the attention of our readers. Passing without comment his interesting statements relative to the management and productiveness of plantations under the new system, we wish to recall his startling picture of the demoralisation and mortality which prevails among the Louisiana negroes. Experience fully bears out the conclusions on the subject which intelligent minds had reached by reasoning. Examinations have in many cases been made into the health and well-being of the negroes on what are called the Government plantations, "and the report is one of most terrible mortality, equal to that of those awful and hopeless days of slaveship, from our infant recollection of whose rehearsal we recoil with so much horror." A few instances will suffice as specimens: On the Old Hickory plantation 443 negroes were placed on the 3rd of June, of whom 214 had died by the 11th of September. Of 300 placed on White Castle plantation only forty-two were found living on September 16. On the Antibes plantation only 178 were left out of 400, and a proportionate mortality was found on the Vintress, Magnolia, Lewis and Miss Taylor plantations. We commend these impressive facts to the earnest consideration of our northern negrophilists.

We have no desire to shield slavery. We shall be glad to know that it is crippled—that it is extinct. Our sole regret will be for the unhappy race who thus have misery and final extermination thrust upon them. For to discerning minds it is as clear as the noonday sun that the freedom of the Southern blacks must speedily lead to the annihilation of the race. Perhaps matters have reached such a stage that this is necessary. Perhaps it is ordained by that inscrutable Providence which sometimes makes blind human passions its instrument, that this unfortunate race shall be freed from the restraints as well as from the duties enforced by their masters, and be allowed to follow in the footsteps of the red man; be driven by an over-ruling fatality to reap the inevitable consequences of inferiority of race, in presence of a civilisation the advantages of which they cannot share and under the vices of which they must succumb.

Their speedy extinction will result from the operation of natural causes. The females are almost universally debauched by our soldiers, and the other vices which naturally engraft themselves on licentiousness aid it in its fearful inroads on the physical stamina of its victims. When under the supervision of their masters the diseases of the negroes received the prompt attention of physicians in their earliest stages, for they were too valuable as property to be allowed to die if medicine and nursing would save them. But all this is now changed on the forfeited plantations. Nobody has any but a sentimental interest in the preservation of their lives, and they are dying like cattle. Filth, idleness, exposure, irregularities, and vice have in less than two years so deteriorated their constitutions that their bodies are the natural food of pestilence, and when once an epidemic disease breaks out it is next to impossible to stay its ravages. General Banks has felt constrained to enforce an order, for reasons, as he says, of public health, prohibiting the negroes from going from one plantation to another. The debased morals, debilitated constitutions, and frightful mortality of these poor black wretches are a sickening commentary on Abolition philanthropy.

A RECORD OF YANKEE ATROCITY AND TREACHERY.

(From the Richmond Examiner.)

THE correspondence between the commissioners of exchange of prisoners, &c., reported to Congress is very voluminous, covering nearly one hundred octavo pages of printed matter. It, however, affords a summary of great historical interest, with reference to the conduct of the Yankees in the war; and with a view to this interest, we enumerate the points made by Commissioner Ould in the course of the correspondence. They constitute a text for one of the most striking chapters in the history of the war:

1. The arrest and detention of non-combatants.—The Yankee authorities have persistently refused to observe any reciprocal rule as to such parties. Their military commanders have been permitted to make arrests of non-combatants, without regard to their age, sex, or situation. Afterward, they have been thrown into prison, and there indefinitely retained, in most cases, without charges.

2. The retention of exchanged and unexchanged officers and men.—There are officers and men now in Federal prisons who have been there ever since the adoption of the cartel. Commissioner Ould has brought to the attention of the United States authorities again and again the names of some of the parties who were confined in violation of the exchange agreements. In some cases, after long delay, the parties were however, released. Other are still languishing in confinement.

3. The general orders of the enemy, and their connection with declaration of exchange.—So anxious has the Confederate Government been to remove all obstacles to a general exchange of prisoners, that when the computation and adjustment of paroles was made a subject of difficulty by the enemy, we promptly agreed to determine the whole matter in accordance with the general orders issued at Washington. This very liberal proposition has not been accepted by the Federal authorities.

4. The confinement of General Morgan and his officers in the penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio.

5. The detention of surgeons.—Before the date of the cartel surgeons were unconditionally released after capture. That rule was first adopted by the Confederate commanders, and was subsequently followed by the Federals. Some time ago one Rucker was indited by a grand jury in Virginia for several felonies. Although Rucker was never a surgeon in the Federal service, the enemy held Surgeon Green, of the Confederate navy, in retaliation. This caused retaliation on our part, in return, and surgeons were afterwards held in captivity on both sides. In this instance, the Federal authorities proved that they were ready to sacrifice their own medical officers in an endeavour to secure the release of a felon in no way connected with their medical service.

6. The capture of persons upon our rivers and the high seas.—By agreement with the Federal agent of exchange, all such who were captured before December 10, 1862, were declared exchanged. In spite of that agreement, some of our pilots and sea captains were kept in confinement. The correspondence fully shows the refusal of the Federal authorities to adopt any fair and reciprocal rule as to the further exchange of such persons.

This record should be preserved and illustrated for history. It is the incontestable evidence of the brutality and faithlessness of the Yankees contained in the records of an official correspondence, and is, so far, superior to those mere rumours and assertions of Yankee villany, which the world has been disposed to doubt, and to attribute to the exaggerations of our own prejudice and passion.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1864.

The Campaign Developing.

THE fourth year of the struggle between North and South has commenced, and on both sides gigantic preparations are making for a decisive issue. There seems only too much reason to believe that the war will spread this spring over a wider area, and will be waged with deadlier fury than ever, and the latest news shows that neither Federals nor Confederates intend to lose time, and that as soon as the roads are practicable, we shall have accounts of important movements and great battles. The campaign opens, however, under decidedly favourable auspices for the South. The seige of Charleston is at length abandoned. Gilmore and Dahlgren, after hammering away at forts Sumter and Moultrie for six months, have sailed farther south to a safer place, and virtually all offensive operations for the capture of the Palmetto City are discontinued. The Federals have lost a small army by disease and casualties; have found their ironclads a failure, and have sacrificed some half-a-dozen ships of war. On the other hand, they have destroyed a few houses in Charleston, knocked the walls of Sumter into ruins, and occupied Morris Island. If the balance-sheet of the Federal expenditure upon Charleston could be exhibited with the results, we believe such a humiliating display would be made of big words, big figures, and small achievements, as would disgust even the New York Herald. It will take nearly one year's successes to compensate for this failure. Nothing was looked for with such pleasing anticipation in New England as the capture of Charleston; nothing would have been so bright a feather in Mr. Lincoln's cap; nothing would have better helped on the Federal cause in Europe. Mr. Adams, when he asked for a few more shells from General Gilmore's big guns in aid of his advocacy at the British Court confessed as much. He will write some very desponding letters to Mr. Seward, now that his last hope has disappointed him. For the Southern Confederacy the triumph is complete, and for the brave sons of South Carolina. There has been nothing more heroic in the history of the war than the defence of Forts Wagner and Sumter; nothing has better illustrated the devotion of the Southerner to his cause than the gallant resistance against the overwhelming resources of the Northern States by the citizens of Charleston. Not that their trial can be considered at an end. The ironclad squadron will maintain its threatening attitude; the guns of Fort Wagner will continue to pour their Greek fire into Charleston, and possibly some attempt may be made in the course of the year to attack by land where entry by sea has been found impossible. At any rate for some months Charleston has very little to fear, and the strength of a portion of her garrison may be devoted to a weaker point. For the present the designs of the Federal commanders are not sufficiently developed to enable us to point out with any certainty where the danger may arise. Two important movements are announced, both striking at the cotton States; the one from Vicksburg eastward along the Mississippi line; the other from Jacksonville, Florida, where Gilmore's army landed on the 8th instant. The command of the Mississippi expedition is entrusted to General Sherman, a resolute and able soldier, who has distinguished himself repeatedly in Grant's campaigns. According to Confederate accounts his whole force marched out of Vicksburg on the 5th inst., crossing the Black river in the direction of Meridian. The intention of the Federal general was supposed not to be an attack upon Mobile, but a direct movement into Alabama, which would threaten the rear of Johnson's army in Georgia. Such a movement would be extremely foolhardy if it were unsupported, but with Grant's army at Chattanooga ready to push on for Dalton when the roads are dry, and another Federal force marching northward from Tallahassie, Florida, into the heart of Georgia, Johnston's army would find itself menaced on three sides almost simultaneously. This plan looks well on paper, and is just the one to attract the Yankees, but somehow or other these vast concerted movements never do succeed. The Anaconda scheme was grand in conception, but a miserable failure in execution, and we confidently predict the same result in the cotton States. For there are no great rivers here to transport the Federal supplies, but there are immense distances to march in a killing climate, deadly swamps to cross, and a bitter enemy to encounter in every village and town. Johnston's army in Georgia, with the reinforcements available at Savannah and Mobile, will at any time muster men enough to outnumber either Sherman or Gilmore. We have no fear for the Confederacy in this quarter. It may be, however, that Sherman's corps is after all destined to take Mobile in the rear, and that the object of the landing at Florida is to distract the attention of the Confederates. This we shall learn in a week or two.

For the present the principal interest of the war centres in Knoxville. It is tolerably clear that the capital of Eastern Tennessee with the garrison occupying it has been surrounded. Communications with Knoxville and Cumberland Gap have been cut off; Sevierville and, later, Marysville, have been occupied by the Confederates. There are no Federal troops available for the relief of General Scholefield viâ Kentucky. We doubt very much if General Grant is in a position to spare 25,000 men for Knoxville, and a smaller number would hardly dare to attempt the march from Chattanooga at this season of the year. The Federal army at Knoxville, then is in immediate danger, and as we have shown repeatedly, if Knoxville falls to the Confederates Chattanooga cannot long be held by General Grant, much less can the Federals march on into Georgia and attack the strong position of Johnston's army in the neighbourhood of Dalton. It is significant of the danger of the Federals at Knoxville, that within the last three months three generals have held command at Knoxville. General Burnside was relieved by General Foster, and now it is General Scholefield. The first abandoned his post on the plea of "urgent private affairs;" the second on the ground of ill health. General Scholefield might be excused if he declined to take up a command which his predecessor had resigned for such excellent reasons. At Newbern the Confederates have returned to the charge, and the Federal army is by no means safe. An ironclad gunboat is said to be co-operating with the land forces engaged in the attack; and it will not surprise us to learn that Newbern has fallen. Thus on two points we learn that the Confederates have resumed the offensive; whilst from Virginia it is reported that Lee's army has inflicted a severe repulse on the enemy's advance, and that General Sedgwick has fallen back upon his camp—à la Meade. The latter general, pour encourager les autres, as Voltaire would say, has in the meantime announced to a delighted Philadelphia audience that since March, 1861, the army of the Potomac alone had lost not less than 100,000 men, killed and wounded. This is only half the truth, but the announcement will no doubt tickle the ears of the New York mob, and furnish one more proof to the New York press of the power of the North. And it says little for General Meade's qualities as a leader. A commander who inaugurates a new campaign by reminding his soldiers of a series of humiliating disasters and terrible losses, may be a useful opposition orator, but is hardly likely to achieve any great military success. We have only one more interesting incident to narrate, and that is, how, while Meade was uttering his Jeremiad over the casualties of the army of the Potomac, eight miles from Harper's Ferry an express train was captured, and the passengers robbed. "It is not known," says the telegraphic operator with some naïveté, "whether the attack was made by Confederates or gangs of Federal deserters." Sufficient is known, however, to warrant the assertion that the South has at this moment armies stronger, better armed, and better disciplined than she ever placed in the field before; that her confidence in her cause, in the valour of her sons, and in the skill of her generals, is unabated; and that wherever the armies of the North make a forward movement there they will meet a resolute enemy. It would not become us to predict success. We knew before the war, and its experiences have taught us the lesson again and again—that the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; but, humanly speaking, we dare say that at no period of the war was the South better prepared to meet the fury of the invader, and more confident in its ability to roll back the tide of invasion, which months ago had expended its whole strength and broke impotently against the strong barrier raised by Southern manhood.

The Twenty-Second Instant.

MONDAY, the 22nd of February, was the birthday of a man whose name is among the most famous in history, and whose monument was among the greatest that mortal man ever left behind him. There are Englishmen, true to the faith of their fathers, who regard George Washington only as the leader of an unprovoked rebellion and the author of a cruel murder; who speak of him only as the prophets spoke of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, "which made Israel to sin." It is not our business to enter into controversy with the principles of the past or with those who still cling to them. Most Englishmen have agreed to waive this interminable dispute, and to regard the greatest enemy England ever encountered not as the English rebel but as the American statesman. In that capacity he commands the respect of all politicians, American and European, as the chief author and principal support of a scheme which, whatever its imperfections, consolidated the interests of disputing States, and fostered the growth, in peace and security, for more than eighty years, of two great nations. Both those nations profess a reverence for his name which has seldom or never been accorded to the memory of mortal man. Even those who have plundered his patrimony and laid waste his native State, who have violated the principles for which he fought and torn up the Constitution under which he ruled for eight years as President of the United States, pretended to revere him; and it is only by a frantic and thoroughly despised minority that the memory of George Washington is cursed as that of a "slave-holder." In the South, the example of the Virginian statesman is considered the best and most decisive precedent in favour of the claims which his countrymen are now asserting; and the fact that Washington was called a rebel is thought to make that opprobrious epithet almost a title of honour. His birthday, two years ago, was chosen for the proclamation of the permanent Constitution of the Confederate States, and will be, probably, for many generations to come, their great national festival. No one who compares the events which led to the rebellion against England with those which compelled the secession of the Southern States from the Union can well gainsay the right of the latter to invoke in their favour the example of the leader of the first American Revolution. The colonists, subjects of George III., had but one grievance to allege against their king; he had demanded of them a contribution to the expense of their own defence, and had attempted to levy it by the authority of the Imperial Parliament. For years and years the North had taxed the South enormously, not for the common defence, but solely for the profit of certain Northern manufacturers and merchants; and it had broken in a hundred instances the fundamental compact which held the Union together before the States aggrieved—not subjects but equal Confederates—were driven to declare the Union at an end.

The President of the Northern States has hit on a remarkable method of solemnising this anniversary in the year 1864. By order of his lieutenant at New Orleans, a convention has been called at that city, to vote the State of Louisiana back into the Union. Three-fourths of that State are, territorially, in the possession of the Confederates. Ninety-nine hundredths of the native population of that State are thoroughly loyal to the Government of their choice. General Banks could by no possibility obtain from the people of Louisiana any concession to their enemies; least of all could he obtain their consent to return into Federal union and political fellowship with those who have ravaged their soil, burnt their homes, stolen their property, debauched their servants, outraged their wives and daughters, and offered to the whole womanhood of the State the foulest insult that ever a dastard in uniform dared to inflict on defenceless ladies. What must the men of Louisiana be, if any menaces could coerce or any bribes reduce them to swear allegiance to Abraham Lincoln, the patron and friend of Butler—the President by whom that loathsome and cowardly scoundrel was maintained so long in the government of New Orleans, to torture old men and victimise unprotected women? Certainly the wretches who could send in their submission to such a master could not be the brothers of those soldiers who, against overwhelming odds, maintained the honour of the South at Corinth and Chickamauga. They could not claim kindred with the indomitable resolution of England or the fearless chivalry of France; they must be degenerate to a degree exceeding the degeneracy of the mixed races of Mexico, and have lost the very recollection of European manhood. There are cowards and renegades among all races; but few indeed in any country who are capable of such utter baseness as would be implied by the submission of Louisianians to the yoke of President Lincoln and General Butler. Accordingly it is not on native traitors and cowards that General Banks relies. The Federal President has, as our readers will remember, issued a proclamation expressly directed to further such transactions as that which General Banks has taken in hand. He has ordered that, when one-tenth of the number of qualified voters in any State shall have taken the oath of allegiance, they may call a convention, establish a new constitution, and bring the State back into the Union; being themselves acknowledged by Congress and supported by the Federal arms as the lawful State government. It is necessary only that the new constitution should exclude slavery, which, as the wisdom of Congress has very recently discovered, is inconsistent with a Republican form of government. Of course General Banks's army and camp followers, black, white, and mixed, with the swarm of Yankee plunderers whom he has located on the plantations within reach of his protection, amount to one-tenth of the regularly qualified voters of Louisiana. They are not qualified in any sense whatever, but that is a matter of very small importance, and easily disposed of when Federal officers preside at the polls, when Federal troops occupy the streets, and Federal spies take care that the real citizens of Louisiana have no chance of interfering. If any objection be raised to the vote of a runaway negro from North Carolina, or a sutler from Massachusetts, the objector will be at once set down as "suspect," and sent to rot in a Federal dungeon. An artificial State of Louisiana will be created, nay, is by this time created—consisting of the offscourings of New York, Boston, and New Orleans; of the worst sort of negroes, and the vilest species of Yankee—the few redeeming citizens being Irish and German exiles who have found their way into the ranks of the Federal army. By this bogus State a bogus Convention is elected, which will create a sham Constitution, and give orders for the election of a sham governor and a sham legislature, of sham members of the Federal Congress, and sham electors to cast the vote of Louisiana at the Presidential election of 1864.

This is the explanation of the very strange scheme invented by Mr. Lincoln, and the proceedings taken under it. The Presidential election is nigh at hand. An Electoral College has to be chosen, in which each State has a number of votes equal to the number of its representatives and senators in Congress. A majority of the whole number of electors—not merely of those who are present—is required to a choice; if there be no such majority, the election falls to the House of Representatives, where the vote is given not by heads but by States. Hence our readers may understand the value of the manœuvre to which, under the sanction of Congress, Mr. Lincoln has resorted. If the Southern States be not represented at the election of 1864, Mr. Lincoln will be between the horns of a dilemma. He must either allow the election to proceed without them, thereby virtually confessing that the Northern States form the whole Union; or it is eminently likely that no candidate will obtain a majority of the whole Electoral College. That consisted, in 1860, of 303 votes, and is assumed still to include them all. Now of these votes the seceded States (not counting Missouri and Kentucky) held 88; and these are now withdrawn. There remain 215 votes; but the majority required is not 108 but 152. This majority, it is thought, may very probably not be obtainable in the North, in favour of any one candidate; and thus the choice would fall into the hands of the House of Representatives. But if several of the Southern States be represented by nominees of the Federal generals and their chief at Washington—if to the thirty-two coerced votes of Maryland, Delaware, Missouri, and Kentucky be added the votes, exercised by artificial "States," in the name of Louisiana, Tennessee, Virginia, and the Carolinas (to do which would only require about 50,000 soldiers and camp-followers, under the one-tenth clause), and perhaps of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Texas—then President Lincoln would have nearly one hundred votes in the Electoral College at his own absolute command, and might confidently reckon upon re-election. Again, supposing he failed here, and the matter came into the House of Representatives. As things stand now, Mr. Lincoln could reckon on a majority of heads, but not of States. This majority of heads, however, implies the votes of at least four, and probably of seven or eight States; and if we add to these the votes of the bogus Southern States, it is plain that he will have a majority of States at his command, and be able in any event to ensure that re-election on which, as is now well known, he has set his heart. No President, since the days of Andrew Jackson, has ever been re-elected: but the honour of a second term, denied to Van Buren, Taylor, Polk, Pierce, and Buchanan, is arrogated by Abraham Lincoln—and who shall dare to gainsay him?

This political manœuvre sheds a flood of light over some military movements which it has been very difficult to comprehend. In a strategical point of view, nothing could be more foolish than that dispersion of the Federal forces which has almost neutralised their vast superiority in numbers. Though aware that no diversions would distract the attention of the Confederates from the main purpose of the war, they have sent multitudes of little expeditions to all parts of the Southern coast. They have made it their boast that they have a lodgment in almost every Southern State; and the boast is true. They have a foot-hold in every State except Georgia and Alabama. They have no more than a foothold, except in Tennessee, in any of the eleven Confederate States east of the Mississippi. These footholds are of no military use, and they detain in useless and demoralising idleness large bodies of men who might be better employed. We now perceive their purpose; they enable the Government, under the one-tenth clause, to bring back as many States as it pleases into the Union, and obtain any number of votes required for its purposes. For the same purposes campaigns west of the Mississippi, where no victories can affect the issue of the war, have been undertaken, to obtain a pretence for adding to the strength of the Federal Government the votes of Texas and Arkansas. This is the secret history of the "great anaconda policy;" and we recommend its ingenuity to the admiration of all in Europe, or elsewhere, who wish to carry on a tyranny under the forms of popular government.

These proceedings do not in any way concern the Confederates. It is painful to their feelings, no doubt, that a collection of the scum of Europe and Yankeedom should be christened by the honoured names of Louisiana, or Virginia, or South Carolina; that the vilest creatures of Lincoln and Butler should fill the seats at Washington vacated by Davis and Randolph, by Slidell, Benjamin, and Mason, and call themselves the representatives of Southern States. But it is, perhaps, a sufficient consolation under so poor an insult to reflect that these gentry, by assuming the title of citizens of Louisiana or her sister States, have rendered themselves liable, should they at any future time venture within the jurisdiction of those States, to be dealt with as traitors. There is no doubt whatever, that a citizen of Louisiana who accepts a seat in Congress or a State office at the hands of the new "State" created by the public enemy is guilty of treason; and the offender will not be allowed to plead that his citizenship was in fact a mere pretence and imposture. Beyond this, the Southerners have no concern with the matter. It matters little to the people of New Orleans and Norfolk whether they are ruled by a Federal General or by one of his camp-followers, for, in the Northern army, Generals and sutlers owe their respective positions to mere accident or favour, and to no distinction of merit or education.

But the North has surely some interest in resisting the creation of sham States, and the intrusion of their representatives into the national legislature. Already Mr. Lincoln has military control of four States, and can and does determine their elections by his arbitrary pleasure; is he to be allowed to add to this number as he will, and to swamp with his creatures the Senate and House of Representatives? Will New York tamely submit to have her vote in the Senate—the vote of 700,000 electors, neutralized by five or six thousand rowdies, renegades, and fugitive slaves at New Orleans? Will Pennsylvania allow her whole political powers to be overbalanced by the nomination of senators and representatives by the military authorities in Virginia and Tennessee? Will the North, in a word, allow Mr. Lincoln to nominate at his pleasure, besides the control he now exercises over Maryland and her sisters in captivity, 22 senators, 66 representatives, and 88 presidential electors? For this he will be able to do, if he be permitted to carry out the curious experiment in constitutional law which has just been tried in Louisiana. A hundred thousand soldiers and camp followers, scattered over the South, will be able to neutralise the votes of New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, whose electoral population amounts to 1,600,000; and we need not say that these artificial States will be nothing but "rotten boroughs" in the hands of the executive Government of the day. The Northern people seem to have made up their minds to endure four more years of Mr. Lincoln's rule; but if they allow him to carry out the plan which has been set at work in Louisiana they will find that they have given him more than they meant to do; that he is not only President and Commander-in-Chief, with arbitrary power of arrest, and with that liberty to dispense with the laws which was claimed by James II., but that he is also the master of the legislature and of the people, concentrating in himself the electoral, senatorial and representative power of eleven sovereign States. The despotic power of Cæsar—the most terrific tyranny that the world has ever known—also exercised under constitutional forms, rested upon a slenderer grant of military and political prerogatives, upon a less extensive union of privileges and powers in the head of the Government.

The "Alabama" and the "Tuscaloosa."

THE ingenious author of the letters which bear the signature of "Historicus" and which have done such meritorious service for the policy of Earl Russell, has enlightened the British public with an exposition of the law of nations as applicable to the two famous ships the Alabama and the Tuscaloosa. In his latest effort he has arrived at one conclusion, from which in all probability no English politician or lawyer of any position will for a moment dissent. On that point it will suffice to state the result of his argument. An adhesion to his judgment on certain other questions will not be so readily given, and his reasoning thereon will require a more elaborate consideration.

First, then, Historicus refers to the demands put forward by Mr. Seward for compensation for the destruction of Federal merchantmen by the Alabama. He declares that it "is impossible to find any basis either of authority or of reason to give colour to such a claim; that the injury arising from the violation of the right of neutrality is an injury primarily and essentially to the neutral, and not to the belligerent." Moreover, he points out that the former American practice is conclusive against such pretensions; for although during the war of the Spanish colonies the American courts decreed restitution of prize captured by a cruiser unlawfully equipped whenever the prize happened to be brought infra presidia, yet the Government of the United States never pretended to deal with the cruiser herself and never acknowledged any claim on the part of the foreign Power to compensation.

Historicus next proceeds to the capture of the Sea Bride on August 5th, 1863, by the Alabama in the Bay of Saldanha. He admits that the capture took place more than three miles from the shore. But on the other hand, on the authority of Lord Stowell, in the case of the Twee Gebroeders, (Rob. Rep., p. 165) it is said that "it is unlawful for a ship to avail herself of a station on neutral territory, making as it were a vantage ground of the neutral country," and that the act of the Alabama comes under this category. It is admitted, however, that in the case of the Vrow Anna Catharina (5 Rob. Rep. p. 18) a distinction was taken between the "making a harbour an habitual station for captures," and the instance of a ship accidentally lying in the port, and going out to capture an enemy whom she sees approaching." Consequently the whole matter resolves into a question of fact. The Alabama entered the Bay of Saldanha on July 28 for the purpose of repainting, and remained till August 5, on which day she sailed for Table Bay and captured the Sea Bride beyond the neutral boundary on her way out. No further details appear. Yet on that amount of information Historicus pronounces his judgment that the Alabama is not entitled to the benefit of the distinction taken in the Vrow Anna Catharina.

This, however, seems to be a matter of trifling importance, compared with the assumptions and propositions laid down in the letter with respect to the Alabama herself. Historicus advises that "we should deny to the Florida and the Alabama access to our ports, by way of expressing in a legitimate and dignified manner our disapproval of the fraud which has been practised on our neutrality." He says, "It is a sound and salutary rule of international practice, established by the Americans themselves in 1794, that vessels which have been equipped in violation of the laws of a neutral State, shall be excluded from that hospitality which is extended to other belligerent cruisers on whose origin there is no such taint. Accordingly, the Cabinet of Washington compelled all the French privateers which had been illegally fitted out in America against England to leave the ports of the United States, and orders were issued to the Custom-house officers to prevent their return." We assume, for the sake of the argument, that the Alabama was equipped in contravention of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and we ask any candid person of ordinary plain sense whether the flaw in the above reasoning is not as glaring as the noonday sun. The vessels which the Cabinet of Washington thus treated were privateers; the Alabama is not a privateer. She is the property, not of one or more private individuals, but of the Government of the Confederate States. She is owned by a belligerent Power, and has a public and national character. In no way is it possible, by reason or authority, to distinguish her from a ship of Her Majesty's navy, unless it be imagined that the Confederate States in its sovereign capacity cannot own property, and that a Government which can issue commissions, has no title to the possession of a gun or a vessel. It will be time enough to exclude the Alabama from the rights of hospitality when a precedent has been discovered for the subjection of a French public ship of war to the treatment awarded by the Cabinet of Washington to French privateers. Beyond all doubt, the English Government can exclude the Alabama from the British ports, but on the one condition that it also denies access to the ships of war of the Federal States.

Next comes the case of the Tuscaloosa, which was captured in August last, being at that time the Federal ship Conrad. After her capture she put into Simon's Bay, in the character of a man-of-war belonging to the Confederate States, duly commissioned, and under the command of Lieutenant Lowe, of the Confederate States navy. A claim was put in by her original owner, but she was permitted to depart unmolested from Simon's Bay. On her return thither in December last she was seized, on the strength of instructions sent from England. At present it is extremely difficult to arrive at the grounds of the seizure. Historicus evidently feels that he is treading on thorns, and seems much inclined to hold that, if the commission of Lieutenant Lowe was valid, the seizure was unjustifiable. Even there, however, a difficulty confronts him, for the case of the Nereyda, tried in 1823 (8 Wheaton Rep., p. 109), seems to him to conflict with the case of the Exchange, tried in 1813 (7 Cranch Rep., p. 116). In the former case the court claimed the right to condemn a duly commissioned vessel of war; but in the latter case such a power was utterly disclaimed. In our opinion both decisions are sound and reconcilable, but it is at least very remarkable that here also Historicus has overlooked the very point which he had already neglected in speaking of the Alabama. The Nereyda was a privateer; the Exchange was a vessel of the imperial navy of France. That distinction is clearly pointed out in what Historicus calls the masterly argument at the bar in the Nereyda. There the counsel said, "The commission in the case of the Exchange was an evidence or muniment of the sovereign's title. The restitution of the Exchange could not have been effected without judging of the validity of the original seizure, annulling the commission, and pronouncing a sovereign's title wholly void." The case of the Nereyda moreover is adduced as "on all fours" with the Tuscaloosa, but this is by no means a satisfactory view. What were the facts in the case of the Nereyda? She, being a ship of war of the royal navy of Spain, was captured by the privateer Irresistible, a vessel equipped at Baltimore, and commissioned by José Ortegas, chief of the Oriental Republic of Rio de la Plate, and was condemned by a court in the island of Margaritta in Venezuela; after condemnation she was sold, as alleged, to one Julio Francesche, and commissioned as a privateer by the Government of Venezuela. Having put into a port of the United States, she was claimed by the Spanish consul, and judgment was given in favour of the claim. Now it is to be observed that the decision of the judge, so far as it went, rested almost entirely on the absence of any evidence of the title of Julio Francesche, but from the arguments at the bar it may be deduced, first, that the commission of the Irresistible was void, as not being granted by a recognised belligerent Power, and therefore that the captor was a mere pirate; second, that the Nereyda came into port as a privateer without even an ascertained owner. The Tuscaloosa, on the other hand, was captured by a public vessel, and returned to Simon's Bay as a duly commissioned ship of war, not belonging to a private individual, but to a sovereign State. The distinction is obvious, but it may further be remarked that in reality the Nereyda is worthless as an authority on the points at issue, for the judgment never touched them.

But what again were the facts in the case of the Exchange? This vessel, being the property of a citizen of the United States, then at peace with France, sailed from Baltimore to St. Sebastian in Spain, and was there seized under the decrees of Napoleon I. She passed into the imperial navy, without condemnation by a prize court, was armed, and cruised in the Atlantic. Having put into the port of Philadelphia she was claimed by her original owner. What was the language of Chief Justice Marshall? "It seems to the Court," he said, "to be a principle of public law that national ships of war entering the port of a friendly Power open for their reception are to be considered as exempted by the consent of that Power from its jurisdiction. The Exchange, being a public armed ship in the service of a foreign sovereign with whom the Government of the United States is at peace, and having entered an American port open for her reception on the terms on which ships of war are generally permitted to enter the ports of a friendly Power, must be considered as having come into the American territory under an implied promise, that while necessarily within it and demeaning herself in a friendly manner she should be exempt from the jurisdiction of the country." The whole gist of the judgment is the immunity of a public ship of war, irrespectively of all antecedents; and it is difficult to imagine a precedent more thoroughly proving the immunity of the Tuscaloosa, provided, of course, that she is the property of the Confederate Government and is duly commissioned. As to the evidence of her character, the matter is simple, and is defined in the argument in the Exchange: "The flag, the public commission, and the possession of the officer, have always been sufficient evidence at sea or in port, and for fiscal or executive purposes. Why not in judicial proceedings? No public vessel ever carries any other document." And such evidence was admitted to be sufficient.

It is but just, however, to glance at a precedent which might be adduced to throw doubt on the doctrine of immunity, so clearly laid down by Chief Justice Marshall. The Cassius, which belonged to the French Republic, but had been unlawfully equipped within the territory of the United States, was seized in a port of North America on proceedings on a libel for damages in the District Court, brought by a citizen of the United States, whose vessel had been captured by the Cassius. The proceedings were at once superseded by the Supreme Court (3 Dall. 132). Subsequently an information qui tam was brought in the Circuit Court, and dismissed for want of jurisdiction (2 Dall. 369), and from a note appended to the report in 3 Dall., it seems that "the French Minister, deeming the prosecution to be a violation of the rights and property of the Republic, delivered a remonstrance to the American Government, and converting the judicial inquiry into a matter of state, abandoned the corvette and discharged the officers and crew." Now, it is very remarkable that in the case of l'Invincible (1 Wheaton, p. 233) the judge, Mr. Justice Johnson, speaks of the Cassius as having been prosecuted and condemned. Yet the reports seem to be silent as to any condemnation, and the note in 2 Dall. appears to refute such an idea.

The words of Mr. Justice Johnson are as follows: "The hull or the owners of the privateer may, perhaps, under some circumstances be subject to damages in a neutral court, after the courts of the captor have decided that the capture was not sanctioned by the sovereign. In the case of the Cassius, which belonged to the French Republic, the vessel was finally prosecuted and condemned on an information qui tam, under the Act of Congress for an illegal fit out, and thus had applied to her under the statute the principle which dictated the decision in the case of Talbot v. Jansen (3 Dall. 133) with relation to a private armed vessel." It may be remarked that Talbot v. Jansen was a case of simple piracy, for the captor had no commission whatever. That being so, and the condemnation of the Cassius being doubtful in the extreme, it would be unreasonable to rely on an obiter dictum, which was in fact scarcely relevant to the point at issue in the case; at any rate, it would appear that the conduct of the French Minister would justify the Confederate Government in "converting the judicial inquiry into a matter of state," if the precedent of the seizure of the Cassius were to be followed in our courts.

Thus much seems to be capable of demonstration: that the Alabama is entitled to every respect and every immunity which can be claimed by any public ship of war in the service of a foreign State. That access to our ports and the rights of hospitality when within our ports can only be denied to the Alabama in common with all the ships of the Federal navy. That assuming that the Tuscaloosa is a public ship of war of the navy of the Confederate States, and duly commissioned, she also is entitled, without regard to her antecedents, to rights and immunities held to be due to the Alabama. It is unnecessary to contemplate the barbarity of closing English ports to the ships of both belligerents, because there is little fear of any attempt to irritate the Federal States.

Lastly, let men in power weigh well the words of Chief Justice Marshall, where he says, "a nation would justly be considered as violating its faith, although that faith might not be expressly plighted, which should suddenly and without previous notice exercise its territorial powers in a manner not consonant to the usages and received obligations of the civilised world."

PREDIAL AND PERSONAL SLAVERY.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The last number of the Saturday Review contains an article with the somewhat startling title: "The Advantages of Slavery and the Slave Trade." Despite this eccentric caption, however, the article is as much distinguished for sterling good sense and a manly dealing with facts as for the highly polished irony with which it disposes alike of "the paradoxes of the slaveowners and of the extravagances of the philanthropists." It points out that if the statements of such bitter and thorough-going adversaries as a recent writer in the Edinburgh Review are to be believed, and the negroes in fifty years have actually attained an equality if not a superiority over the white men, the slaveholders have accomplished a task even more beneficent and praiseworthy than the most enthusiastic among them lay claim to. The Saturday Review concludes:—

"The Confederates have, in the course of their great struggle, exhibited almost all the highest political qualities, in their capacity to command, in their readiness to obey, in their power of organisation, and in their indomitable resolution. They might have commanded universal admiration, and they would probably have rendered their enemies powerless, if they had also possessed sufficient wisdom and courage to exchange slavery for predial serfdom. The state from which the Russian peasants are even now emerging would be a great and beneficial advance to the Southern negroes. The undisputed political supremacy of the whites would enable them to provide against the economical failure which has partially discredited West Indian emancipation. It would have been no hardship to home-loving negroes to remain attached to the soil, and under wise laws the value of their labour might have been not only maintained, but largely increased. The partial experiments of free labour which have been tried by Federal generals and commissioners are insufficient, and they may probably be found illusory. The emancipated slaves feel that they are on their trial, nor have they yet had the opportunity of living in idleness on their own provision grounds. The South would, under any circumstances, have remained subject to the hatred of the unforgiving race of philanthropists, but in disarming their more equitable opponents they would have escaped the moral isolation to which they are at present condemned. If they are finally defeated their Northern successors will probably introduce a system of regulated coercion which will display many of the features of villenage or predial servitude."

It is upon this point that I desire to offer a few observations on a subject which has almost wholly escaped the attention of the British public, and which I have never seen specially treated in your columns. I must premise by saying that I am not one of those who anticipate the plans of Providence by declaring that "African slavery will be perpetual." On the contrary, the progress of the negro race within the last fifty years, even without accepting the self-confuting testimony of such soi-disant philanthropists as the Edinburgh reviewer, has been so great and in so hopeful a direction, that, unless it is violently interrupted, we have a right to expect that within the next fifty years it will be even greater. Now, I agree with the Saturday Review that predial slavery or serfdom is a step in advance of personal bondage. The one is, in fact, the historical and progressive development of the other. Not by any means that the condition of the serf is better than that of the slave; perhaps the reverse is nearer the truth. But in slavery, pure and simple, the idea of property preponderates over that of person, while in serfdom the idea of property is subordinate. Herein lies the progress, though generally dearly purchased. But I venture to say that in the South the idea of personal rights has always, or at least during the life of the present generation, preponderated, and very largely preponderated, over that of the right of property.

In other words, in the mind of a Southern slaveholder, the idea that the slave is property, enters only incidentally, in theory rather than in practice. I maintain, therefore, that the Southern slave enjoys all the real moral advantages of the more advanced phase of servile condition, without being deprived of the material advantages that belong to the lower one. What then I wish to impress on you is, that the liability of being sold, which sounds so horribly in European ears, is a privilege of the slave rather than of the master, and more frequently used by the former than the latter. It enables him practically (not in law) to change a master whom he does not like for one whom he prefers, for no man would willingly keep a discontented slave. It is a fact denied by no one who has any personal knowledge of the South, that by far the greater number of sales, so far from separating families, are for the purpose of forming family ties. There is not a household in the South where some valued servant has not at some time or other been parted with, that he or she might live with wife or husband. Under any circumstances, the sale of a slave involves loss to the owner, as a man always loses in disposing of any property in which he does not habitually deal, and the habitual dealing in slaves is in the South an infamous profession. Again, by changing masters, the slave has the opportunity of bettering his condition and rising in the social scale. Were he like the Russian serf, chained to the soil he tills, he would be doomed to the toil of a drudge for generations. As it is, the Southern slave, if he show ever so little capacity for a higher grade of work, becomes a domestic servant or a mechanic, and he monopolises many professions, such as barbers, with far better success than his "free" brother of the North. I have always looked upon this subject from the point of view of the negro's good, for I sincerely concur with the writer in the Saturday Review that "the system is unjust unless it is also beneficial to the slave," and I here express an earnest conviction that the capacity of being sold is one of the redeeming features of our institution, mitigating more than aught else the hardships incidental to the lot of the slave, and one which, were I a slave, strange as it may sound to English ears, I should retain until the very last vestige of servile condition had passed away. I have only to add what is proved à priori by the fact that the South numbers more emancipated slaves than there are in all the Northern States together, that I challenge any experienced and observant resident of the South to find a negro, deserving of freedom and desirous to have it, who cannot obtain it, whatever the law of any particular State on this subject may be.

Yours,
A SLAVEHOLDER.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW ON AMERICAN GEOGRAPHY.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

Sir—In the Westminster Review for July and October, page 239, in a brief notice of Mr. G. McHenry's "Cotton Trade," occurs the following rather startling passage :—

"In Europe we have been accustomed to suppose that there was but one American Republic, and that it bought nearly all the land now occupied by the Secessionists of Napoleon in 1804 for $75,000,000, or of Spain in 1820, with Union funds ; to which the South can hardly pretend to have furnished one-third. The special possessions of the South rest upon a basis that is inseparable from Union, if there were no higher arguments that condemn their effort to engross their ownership. The vogue which their arguments have so long enjoyed was founded on the too general ignorance of American politics in Europe," &c.

We may pass with a smile the grotesque idea of the writer that the Union in purchasing certain territory also purchased its inhabitants for all time to come, and confine ourselves to the mere question of fact. The extensive tracts sold by France and Spain respectively to the United States, comprise the present areas of the States of Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri. In addition to this there is a narrow strip of coast which your readers can accurately identify on any ordinary map, by continuing the northern boundary line of Florida straight to the Mississippi river. Another glance at the map will show what proportion the territory thus bought bears to the area of what is technically called "the South." The Westminster reviewer must clearly have forgotten such very insignificant States as Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, with whom Great Britain concluded a certain treaty of peace and recognition, or the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, respectively carved out of the ample domains of the first-mentioned States. He of course did not consider as "occupied by the Secessionists," the State of Texas, which was an independent republic, so recognised by the great Powers of Europe, when it entered the Federation. So that, if we were to omit from the "special possessions of the South" the whole of the Louisiana and Florida purchases, which the reviewer says is "nearly all," and if we were even to throw into the bargain the two great States of Kentucky and Tennessee, we should still have the following trifle left :—

	Sq. miles.
Virginia (recognised by Great Britain in 1781) ..	61,352
North Carolina (idem)	45,500
South Carolina (idem)	28,000
Georgia (idem)	58,000
Alabama, Mississippi (formed of territory originally belonging to South Carolina and Georgia)	50,722 + 47,151
Texas (recognised by Great Britain in 1842)	325,520
	616,245

In other words, if we give the Westminster reviewer all he claims, and the Federal invaders twenty times as much as they hold by precarious military occupation, this model of statisticians will have to look around for new arguments to "condemn the effort to engross the ownership" of a territory more than three times as large as France.

But there is another curious bit of statistics which I commend to the notice of the Westminster reviewer the next time he meddles in American political geography. The aggregate area of all the Southern States formed out of the territory purchased from France and Spain is about 200,000 square miles ; the aggregate area of the Northern States formed out of territory ceded by Virginia after her recognition by Great Britain, is nearly 300,000 square miles. If by virtue of the former transaction the United States might resume the proprietorship of Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, might not Virginia reclaim her title to Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Ohio, Michigan, and Wisconsin?

So much for the candour or the knowledge of a periodical which takes for its motto Goethe's beautiful aphorism, "The love of truth is shown in finding in all things what is good and knowing how to prize it."

Respectfully,
A SUBSCRIBER.

THE "FOUL BLOT."

To the Editor of the THE INDEX.

SIR,—The article in your last week's number, under the heading of the "Foul Blot," ought, I think, to set the executive of the Southern Independence Association thinking about amending one of the planks in their platform. I, myself, though at least as good a Southerner as any of them, have not the honour to belong to that well-intentioned body; but if those gentlemen feel as I should, they would not be very comfortable under the reflection, that by their timidity (for it cannot be through ignorance) they are assisting Ward Beecher and Baptist Noel in giving credibility to all the monstrous anti-slavery calumnies that have been circulated to the prejudice of a high-spirited nation that will not be very thankful for such service.

Yours, &c.,
TRAVELLER.

MANCHESTER, February 22nd, 1864.

FACTS WORTH BEING KNOWN.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—While Mr. William H. Seward is threatening old England with the vengeance of the universal Yankee nation, if English shipbuilders and merchants are not prevented from selling an unarmed ship to the Confederates, which may afterwards, in some far-off island of the sea, meet a consort and receive the necessary ingredients to change herself into a cruising man-of-war ; and while Earl Russell is making every honest, manly Englishman, who loves the proud fame of his glorious old flag, blush at the manner in which, obedient to the threats of vengeance, he is straining English law in order that he may please the great western joker ; it may not be out of place to turn back the pages of time for a few short years and see what has been the policy of the Yankees themselves on this very question, when it was not thine ox that was being gored by the neighbour's bull.

In all the wars in which Spain engaged with her revolted colonies in America, nearly all the privateering that was done against the flag of Spain, under the various "Patriot Flags," was done by Americans, in American vessels, commanded by American officers ; built, armed and equipped in American ports, openly and without even any attempt at disguise. The present Admiral David Porter, who has burned so many towns and houses on the Mississippi, and who has written such very, very bombastic reports, served in one of these patriot cruisers, called the Guerrero, under command of his uncle Captain John Porter, who was formerly, if not at that very time, an officer of the United States navy, and this very Guerrero was the terror of the Spanish merchant ships, and fought, most gallantly, with a Spanish frigate. As the poor Spanish ox was then gored, these gallant Americans were "heroes," not "pirates," as the Prophet Seward now calls Southern men, fighting under their own flag, and for the country that gave them birth.

Fact No 2. When Greece was fighting for her liberty against the Turks, it had of course the sympathy of that nation founded on revolution and the right of any people to govern themselves. Two splendid frigates were openly built in New York for the Greeks, and armed and equipped. The Yankees love liberty, but they have an eye to the main chance also, and as the Greeks could only pay for one of the ships, only one of them went to Greece, the Hellas. The other was purchased into the United States navy, and called the Hudson.

Fact No. 3. When Texas was at war with Mexico, a number of ships were openly built for the Texans in ports of the United States, armed, equipped, and manned by Americans, commanded by officers who resigned from the United States navy to be promoted into that of Texas ; these ships sailed openly from New Orleans, under Commodore Moore, with the Austin for his flag-ship, to cruise against Mexico and did engage some Mexican steamers. In the town of Norfolk, a United States navy-yard, a regular rendezvous was opened, the flag of Texas hoisted, and men enlisted openly, and went out of the harbour, with the flag of Texas flying at the fore of the vessel that carried them, and drums beating.

These are only a few facts for the consideration of Lord John, which, however, may convince his Yankeeised mind, unless he should take advice from Mr. Adams, that when it suits the great Yankee nation to carry a point, they will not be governed by the precedents which he thinks he is allowing them to record against themselves, but they will repudiate them, as they are now repudiating the principles on which their Government rests, and simply because it suits their present madness to do it. They will never be governed by "principle" or "precedent," but by "fury and passion."

VIRGINIA.

THE SEIZURE OF THE "TUSCALOOSA."

PROTEST OF HER COMMANDER.

CONFEDERATE STATES SHIP "TUSCALOOSA," Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope,
December 28th, 1863.

SIR,—As officer in command of the Confederate States ship Tuscaloosa, tender to the Confederate States steamer Alabama, I have to record my protest against the extraordinary measures which have been adopted towards me and the vessel under my command by the British authorities of the colony.

In August last the Tuscaloosa arrived in Simon's Bay; she was not only recognised in the character which she lawfully claimed, and still claims to be, viz., a commissioned ship of war, belonging to a belligerent Power, but was allowed to remain in the harbour for the period of five days, taking in supplies and effecting repairs with the full knowledge and sanction of the authorities.

No intimation was given that she was regarded merely in the light of an ordinary prize, or that she was considered to be violating the laws of neutrality; nor when she notoriously left for a cruise on active service, was any intimation whatever conveyed, that on her return to the port of a friendly Power, where she had been received as a man-of-war, she would be regarded as a "prize," as a violator of the Queen's proclamation of neutrality, and consequently liable to seizure.

Misled by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, I returned to Simon's Bay on the 26th inst., in very urgent need of repairs and supplies. To my surprise, I find the Tuscaloosa is now no longer considered as a man-of-war, and she has, by your orders, as I learn, been seized for the purpose of being handed over to the person who claims her on the behalf of her late owners.

The character of the vessel, viz., that of a lawfully commissioned ship of war of the Confederate States of America, has not been altered since her first arrival in Simon's Bay; and she having been once fully recognised by the British authorities in command in this colony, and no notice or warning of change of opinion or of friendly feeling having been communicated by public notification or otherwise, I was entitled to expect to be again permitted to enter Simon's Bay without molestation.

In perfect good faith I returned to Simon's Bay for mere necessaries, and in honour and good faith in return I should, on change of opinion or of policy on the part of the British authorities, have been desired to leave the port again; but by the course of proceedings taken I have been (supposing the view now adopted by your Excellency's Government to be correct) first misled and next entrapped.

My position and the character of my ship will most certainly be vindicated by my Government. I am powerless to resist the affront offered to the Confederate States of America by your Excellency's conduct and proceedings. I demand, however, the release of my ship, and if this demand be not promptly complied with, I hereby formally protest against her seizure, especially under the very peculiar circumstances of the case.

I have the honour to be,
Your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant,
(Signed) J. LOWE,
Commanding C.S.S. Tuscaloosa.

His Excellency,
SIR PHILIP WODEHOUSE, K.C.B.,
Governor of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, &c.

CONFEDERATE STATES SHIP "TUSCALOOSA,"
Simon's Bay, Dec. 28, 1863.

SIR,—I have the honour to enclose for your information copy of a letter which I have forwarded this day to his Excellency the Governor of the Colony, on the subject of the seizure in this port of the Confederate States ship Tuscaloosa.

I am, sir,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
(Signed) J. LOWE,
Commmanding C.S.S. Tuscaloosa.

To Rear Admiral
SIR BALDWIN WALKER, Br. K.C.B.,
Commanding in Chief.

THERE is a significant piece of news in the Canada telegrams about the difficulties which the North is beginning to have with the negroes. The Federals are forbidding the blacks to remove from the plantations to which they belonged, under pretence of sanitary regulations. This, as some of their own papers point out, is only slavery in a new form and under another name. Nature and circumstances are stronger than man. The more experience the Federals acquire, the more they will come to understand the difficulty of getting the negroes, accustomed to a system of compulsory labour, to work at all when left free to do as they like. As a question of probabilities, it may be looked upon as morally certain that if the North were in possession of the Southern States and their negroes to-morrow, they would only change the system of industry in name, and keep up slavery under a flimsy disguise. If the prospect is not bright before the South, it is much more gloomy for the North.—Morning Post.

INDIA COTTON.—The want of means or care in preparing Indian cotton for shipment seems to have experienced little mitigation. According to the Manchester Guardian, the proportion of cotton which is good or even usable in the shipments of November or December last, is stated by Bombay merchants to constitute a very small proportion of the whole quantity.—The Times City Article, 24th February.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, January 30.

THE MILITARY POSITION.—THE YANKEES IN NEW ORLEANS.—THE RECONSTRUCTION FARCE.

THE secret expedition which has been here preparing for some time past, and which was supposed to be directed against Mobile, is now said to be intended for Texas. One column is intended to go up Red river, if it can, but where the other is to strike the Lone Star State is yet a secret. Probably the commanding general himself has not yet decided the question. Anyhow there has been no battle as yet in Texas, and the Federal columns in the Teche country are reposing quietly in camp. If Dame Rumour may be believed, this repose will not be a long one, as General Taylor is said to have assumed the offensive. There may be some truth in the rumour, as his force, though small, is very effective, and the Teche country just now is quite free from overflow. The expedition to Red river is thus referred to in the St. Louis (Missouri) Democrat of January 19th:—

"Late on Friday evening steamboat-men were thrown into great excitement, which spread extensively on Saturday, by military despatches requiring most of the boatmen here, if not all, to proceed at once to Cairo. Captains and mates rushed wildly through the city, hunting up crews, and numerous despatches were sent to absent officers to report without delay. We presume 1,000 boatmen left on Friday for Cairo, an extra train having been provided for them. It would be an impossible task to compute the number that left on Saturday. It looks as if there was a great expedition on foot—one like those that last year were productive of such important results. Indeed it is rumoured that there are two expeditions on hand: one to the Ouachita and the other to Red river; that all the boats at Cairo are going, and many others as well. Of course we cannot be expected to endorse these rumours as correct."

So far as we can learn, no troops have assembled at Cairo for these expeditions, and yet it is hardly possible that the boats ordered to Cairo will come to New Orleans and transport troops from here to the mouth of Red river.

There is a general movement of troops throughout the department, some going home on furlough, and some being transferred from one post to another, but I do not think any active or offensive movement is at hand. Banks and M'Pherson, who command on the Mississippi, must have reinforcements before assuming the offensive. The one may make a show of transferring troops to the other, but in reality they dare not weaken their already too depleted forces. The Confederate troops are continually hovering round their lines, and being fully acquainted, through an admirable spy system, of the real movements of the enemy, they are ready to strike when an opportunity offers. The expedition to Red river, should it ever reach there, will return as it went. The river is thoroughly blocked, from the falls to its mouth, and every bluff is fortified. The Confederates are also aware of the intended expedition, and have made every due preparation. I derive my information from a letter received here this week from an officer at Shrieveport, Louisiana.

Captain Mann, the Federal spy, spoken of in my last as having been captured at Bayou Sara, was seized after novel fashion. A Texas cavalryman, one of the squad who made the dash into the town, rode after the fleeing Mann to within forty yards of the levee, and right under the guns of the fleet, when, standing in his stirrups, he threw out his lariat and brought down his prisoner as nicely as a Comanche could have done it.

The Yankee in New Orleans is trying hard to ingratiate himself into society. To accomplish this, he is willing, as shown in innumerable instances, to suffer and endure meekly, ay, even good-humouredly, any amount of snubbing. Sometimes his efforts are repelled with scorn, but he is proof against this as he is against the unqualified expression of loathing with which his advances are received by every Southern woman. He has faith, however, in his endurance, in his brass, his low cunning, his greenbacks, his utter want of delicate feeling, as shown in the advantage he would take of martial law and provost courts to punish even women who repel with just indignation all association with the murderers of their kinsmen and the despoilers of their homes. There are not a few of Banks's officers who have relatives in this city, but the shoulder-strap gentry find these same relatives as indignantly averse as the native-born to any recognition. One mode, as they imagine, of softening this repugnance is to visit their relatives in citizen's dress. Of course the uniform and the flag are abhorrent to every "rebel," but to suppose that the putting off of Lincoln livery bridges the gulf that yawns between the Yankee and the Southerner, shows on the part of the former a characteristic inability to measure, say, rather, to understand, the feelings of those he has so foully dealt with. The uniform and the flag are "but the trappings and suits" of tyranny. Their removal does not wipe out the oppressor's wrong.

It would weary the reader to enumerate the various expedients resorted to by the "new comers," as they are styled, to make the acquaintance of the Southerners. Even the commanding-general lends himself and all the influence of his position to the movement. All the agencies of the provost-marshal-general's department are also brought to bear upon this much-desired result. For instance, if a lady is obliged to apply to any one of the officers of that department for a "favour" or "privilege" it is readily granted, provided she consents to return the granter's salutation when they meet in the streets. If permission be asked to give a ball or soirée, the high-toned official intimates his willingness to attend, and attend he does, unless his presence is positively forbidden. He is perfectly indifferent to how his presence may be regarded by the ladies and gentlemen present, and to mark his perfectly imperturbable bearing on these occasions, when no one present regards him save with loathing, one would conclude that, like Uriah Heap, he felt it was good to be despised, especially by his betters. I know of instances where these shoulder-strapped gentry, when passing a gentleman's house where dancing or music was going on, to knock at the door and offer to pay for admission. A soirée musicale is a very common entertainment, especially at the houses of our Creole families. New Orleans, as you may have heard, is celebrated for the musical taste and talent of her citizens. Many of our amateurs would rival the reputation of the esteemed artistes of the opera in Europe. Before the war two opera troupes were regularly engaged during the entire season, say from October to May, and the new Théâtre de l'Opera is one of the finest buildings of the kind in the States. While the war lasts, of course New Orleans will continue to be deprived of the opera for many reasons, chief of which are the loss of property and fortune among that class of her citizens who heretofore have been the liberal patrons of the lyric drama, and the fact that attendance at any public place of amusement is regarded as highly unbecoming while the war lasts. Hence the almost nightly soirée musicale at some private residence, where the "rebel" can enjoy the compositions of the great masters, without having his ears insulted by such abominable airs as "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle." The latter is now the "Rogues March" in the Confederate States army, being always played on such occasions as drumming a worthless fellow out of camp. The culprit invariably petitions for the omission of the insulting tune. From what I have already written you can form an idea how utterly hopeless is the task the Federal authorities have undertaken in their endeavours to bring together the Northerners, military and civil, in New Orleans, and the citizens. General Banks, it seems, thought this musical taste to which I have referred afforded him a powerful lever with which to remove this mountain of prejudice. He announced a grand promenade concert to take place at the Théâtre de l'Opera, for the avowed purpose of bringing together the officers of the army and their families and the citizens. No national airs were to be played, and the officers were instructed from head-quarters to appear in citizen's dress, and to avoid every demonstration that might hurt the prejudices, feelings, or sensibilities of the "rebel" ladies and gentlemen who were expected to be present. The affair came off, as announced, on Tuesday evening last, and a more decided fiasco has never been witnessed in this city. It was a mortifying failure, a "complete fizzle," as the Yankees themselves would say, if they were to trust themselves to speak of it, but they dare not. I am told by a gentleman who was present, one who has lived here twenty-two years, that there were present exactly seven persons of our old population. With one exception, all these attended for the purpose of seeing how the affair passed off, and the report is that they found a rich fund of amusement in the vulgar and ridiculous airs of the Yankees, especially the officers' wives, who shone forth in all the glory of confiscated jewelry and finery and the barbaric splendour of "shoddyite" opulence. It is said that the fair "rebels" of this city were excessively indignant at the thought that there could be any social recognition on their part of the wives of the Federal officers. Women, it is said, are very intolerant of each others pretensions, and the ladies of this city are by no means reticent as to the humble origin, &c., of their Northern "sisters." I think we have had the last Yankee promenade concert in New Orleans.

That farcical fraud, the restoration of Louisiana to the Union, and the re-establishment of a civil State Government, "loyal" to the Puritan destructionists at Washington, is proceeding as well as could be expected under the circumstances. The Federals are in sore travail with this restoration mouse. Banks has issued a proclamation ordering the election to be held on the 22nd of February next, for Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, Treasurer, Attorney-General, Superintendent of Public Education, and Auditor of Public Accounts, which officers are to constitute for the time being the State Government. I enclose a copy of this proclamation, that you may see for yourself the terms upon which "loyal citizens" are allowed to participate in the "restoration."

With all their patronage and their unscrupulous use of power, I now learn that the authorities are despairing of securing the required one-tenth. Only some 1,400 have registered in this city, and fully 1,000 of these are employés of the Government, holding positions in the Custom-house, the city police, and the numerous other departments controlled by General Banks and the military Governor. A large number of Northern adventurers are here speculating in cotton and sugar, leasing confiscated plantations, dealing in "Yankee notions," and engaging generally in any money-making scheme that their sharp mother-wit may invent, and in the anomalous condition of affairs here they soon realise enormous fortunes. Well, this class has of course registered, though they have no more idea of settling here than they have of emigrating to the north pole. Canvassers have been sent into the country parishes, but they report an entire want of success. I am informed that the one sent into St. Mary parish succeeded in registering just twenty-three names, and those he picked up in the highways and by-ways, in the cross-road taverns, in the Government plantations, in suttlers' booths, and this is the result of his three weeks tramp over the parish. St. Mary used to poll 3,200 votes, and she has sent nearly a regiment into the Confederate service. The newspapers published here in the interest of the Federal authorities are in despair at this beggarly account of voters. They do not, to be sure, make any reference to the paucity of names registered, but their passionate appeals to "loyal citizens to come forward and aid the Government in restoring Louisiana to the Union, to poll a large vote, and thereby give the lie to the assertion that the great mass of the people are still wedded to the Confederate cause," and their numerous other ad captandum appeals addressed to the ignorant, the prejudiced, the needy adventurers, the political demagogues, and the hungry swarms of expectant placemen, betray their alarm at the impending failure of their nefarious schemes. And yet the fraud will be consummated. It having been demonstrated that the five thousand voters are not to be had in the civil walks of life, preparations are now going on for enrolling the requisite number in the ranks of the army. Circulars have been sent from head-quarters to the provost-marshals of each camp in this State, instructing the said officials to register the name of each man entitled to vote in the State from which he hails—in other words, to ascertain who of the foreigners in the ranks are naturalised and who of the younger native soldiery attained the age of twenty-one years. The proceeding thus far is kept secret. Should these soldiers vote at the election on the 22nd proximo, no doubt it will be said that they intend to make Louisiana their home. Doubtless thousands of them will find their long home here.

This whole scheme of restoration would require a volume to do it justice, and I refer to it now thus briefly to put the English reader on his guard, when the consummated fraud shall be trumpeted to the world as the free, voluntary, uninfluenced return of one of the "wayward sisters." In a subsequent letter I shall expose the whole secret history of the thing, and do ample justice to the character of the Jacobins, Red Republicans, disciples of Tom Paine, place-hunters, convicted criminals, and Northern adventurers, who constitute the "Free State Party" of Louisiana. Judge whether I have characterised thus justly, when I state that one of the candidates for governor—the "working men's candidate"—owes it to Executive clemency that he is not to-day an inmate of the penitentiary.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, February 10.

MANUFACTURED NEWS.—THE AFFAIR ON THE RAPIDAN.—THE MILITARY MOVEMENTS OF THE CONFEDERATES.—THE RUMOURED EXPEDITION AGAINST MOBILE.—THE FEDERAL CONFISCATION ACT.

A JOURNAL of this city, in speaking of the war news made up at Washington for circulation in the North, said bitterly that "the great interests, political and speculative, now engaged in duping the Northern people, are almost irresistible." It is apparent that there is a combination to "forge news," with branches "in all the armies," for stock-jobbing purposes in the interest of the favourites of the Administration.

The reward of this systematised lying has been a thorough distrust of whatever is published from official sources as army news. The public, which used to believe everything, is coming to believe nothing. They look for to-morrow's despatches to contradict to-day's, and look narrowly to the movements of particular cliques in Wall-street rather than the utterances from the Department at Washington, for a true version of the state of affairs, as the authorities really understand them. The Government has been repeating in every form of telegraphic despatch the disorganisation of the Southern armies, the despondency of the Government, the destitution and despair of the people, and the eagerness of large masses of them to throw down their arms and accept the President's amnesty, on his own hard conditions. At the same moment the Government calls for half a million new soldiers, and the currency, the barometer of the public faith in the closing of the war, refuses to fall.

We are now greeted with reports of active military operations on one side or the other, on all the lines where the armies confront each other. The Union army of the Potomac made on Saturday what is now, since the event, called a reconnaissance in force across the Rapidan, but came back again. Until we get Southern accounts we shall not know what they attempted to do, and what they suffered, before they recrossed and after. But by the showing in the Federal papers they suffered "considerable loss." Some of their pontoons were taken, and two regiments were badly cut up in making their escape. This means something more than is expressed; but the addition of the customary formula, that they accomplished all they went for and that active movements will now follow, can scarcely mean anything. It is not seriously supposed that the army of the Potomac can begin operations towards Richmond now in earnest, since it is well known that the army is in the process of reconstruction for spring work. The regiments are to be reorganised, with a full complement of 2,400 men, and a huge swarm of minor officers then got rid of. The work of filling up the ranks with the men to be drafted is a work of time, and hence it is not believed that an advance movement will be made until April at soonest, on this line.

The Confederates are taking the aggressive and hovering in Northern and Western Virginia, in North Mississippi, and all over Tennessee. They are gathering in East Tennessee under General Longstreet, and threatening Knoxville. In North Carolina they have been very busy, capturing outposts, and at one time approaching so close to Newbern as to give alarm lest they should capture that place and all its stores. The siege of Charleston is practically suspended, although the bombardment goes on with no other object than that of harassing the inhabitants and damaging the city which there is no thought of taking. General Gilmore has gone to Washington to report the causes of his failure, and a part of his troops have been sent away to other places, for more pressing duty. The defence of Charleston against such terrific odds is one of the most glorious events in military annals, and ranks General Beauregard among the most skillful engineers and successful commanders of the age.

Recent reports give reason to believe that a large combined movement is on foot for the capture of Mobile. The forces reported to be destined to this work are troops from General Banks's department, now gathered at Lake Pontchartrain, to go by way of Pascagoula, an army collected at Vicksburg to penetrate through Mississippi, and so descend in the rear, and a fleet to attack in front, under the command of Commodore Farragut. This is a wide net to spread, and there is manifest danger that it may break in some part before it can be drawn round that devoted little city. On the Confederate side it is stated that General Johnston, with a good army, is in the way of Sherman, who has a long and hard country to travel in, and that the city itself is well fortified and garrisoned. There are some incredulous people here who think that the Vicksburg expedition, large as it seems to be, is not meant for any such distant service as the march on Mobile by such a route. It is more consistent with the Washington plans for carrying on the war, that the object of this expedition should be merely to overrun the cotton districts, seize the large stores of cotton supposed to be hoarded there, and disorganise the labour of the country by setting free and conscripting the slaves, and thus preparing the way for the extirpation of the old population and the confiscation of the lands to Yankee occupation. This is now the unconcealed policy of the Administration, and unless this huge raid is intercepted and driven back by the Confederates, the same blazed track of devastation will be left on its march as marks the progress of the Union troops in the "recovered" districts of Virginia, Arkansas, and Louisiana.

The House of Representatives on Saturday got through with its savage debate on confiscation, and passed by a majority of eight votes the declaratory amendment to the Act of 1862. It repeals the positive limitation in that Act, that the forfeiture of real estate for treason shall not extend beyond the life-time of the party convicted, by substituting for it the naked declaration that no forfeiture of estate shall be worked by that law "contrary to the Constitution of the United States." The effect designed and avowed is to subject all the property of the South to universal confiscation, under military law, and without the interposition of the Courts and the defences which might be interposed by pleading the Constitution. To understand the atrocious logic of this enactment, it must be noted that the Constitution of the United States provides—

Article 2, sec. 9.—"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall ever be passed."

Article 3, sec. 3.—"No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life-time of the person attainted."

It is plain, therefore, that no confiscation of real estate could reach the heirs of any person legally convicted before the courts. The animus of the legislation of Saturday is to make forfeiture universal and perpetual, without trial; and this is the process by which it is thought to be secured. The Act of Congress of July, 1862, made this universal confiscation of the property of all persons, with a few enumerated exceptions, within the "insurrectionary States," who should fail, within sixty days after the proclamation of the President, to lay down their arms and renew their allegiance to the United States. The Act was accompanied by the declaratory amendment, now repealed, that it should not affect succession to real estate. That limitation being removed, the further amendment is added, that no further notices or warnings to delinquents shall be required to bring any property within the operation of the Act, since the President's proclamation of 1862. In other words, it is assumed, that every person who did not before October 23rd, 1862, make open submission to the United States, is a confessed public enemy to the United States, and that his whole property becomes forfeited forever, by virtue of the Act of Congress. This sounds like the merest nonsense, but it contains the substance of the plea for the constitutionality of the Act by such members of the House as felt a need for excusing their acts by an appeal to that instrument. The bolder portion of them, however, discarded the flimsy subterfuge, and did not hesitate to avow that this was a vindictive measure, aimed at rebels, who, having thrown off the obligations of the Constitution, have no title to its protection, and were to be treated as subjugated enemies, over whom there is a natural right to exercise the power to take from them at pleasure their property and their lives; and it was ferociously said, and applauded in the saying, that if it were for the interest of the North that the whole population of the Southern States should be exterminated and their lands divided among the Northern soldiers and their own slaves, it would be done without hesitation and remorse; and it was more than once said that the time has come to proclaim and carry out that purpose. There was a strong but unavailing opposition to the passage of this measure, and on the final vote the Administration was deserted by some of its usual war supporters from the Border States of Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri They denounced it as barbarous and unchristian, and not merely wicked but in the highest degree inexpedient, which, being a blunder, is held to be worse than an infamy. They held it to be the very insanity of predestined destruction to consolidate the five or six millions of the South in a hatred to the Northern Government and race, which will make peace between them, under any possible issue of the war which now rages, utterly impossible for many generations. The Senate is expected to pass the Bill, and, indeed, at a canvass lately held of the Republican members, it was decided to take it up and put it through immediately.

I mentioned in my last that the whisky tax imposed in the House on the stock in hand had troubled the speculators, who, being in the secrets of the Government, had bought immensely for a rise. As I anticipated, they were powerful enough to get this clause struck out in the Senate; but the House, with surprising tenacity, is disposed not to give way. But the influences are so strong, that in some way the difficulties will be so adjusted that the favourites of the Treasury will make their profits.

The presidential question is getting more and more agitated, and has assumed some very remarkable phases, which I will attempt to explain to you in another letter. There is a double struggle going on:—one is that of the Outs against the Ins; the party which wants the offices, the power, the patronage, and the plunder involved in the collection and disbursing of a thousand millions of dollars annually, and the control of an army of 800,000 soldiers; and the other between partisans of the faction which controls them—which of them shall be the master of the position for the next four years. It is a mighty stake to be played for, and I may interest your readers in detailing to you how these "Republicans" play it.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, February 24.

IT would seem harsh and hasty to charge so respectable and so ably conducted a newspaper as the Manchester Examiner with deliberately over-stepping even the limits of partisanship by lending its influence, no matter how indirectly, to swell the tide of emigration to the Federal States under circumstances which cannot but call that journal's patriotism into question. And yet, almost from day to day, especially since Messrs. Cobden and Bright gave the key note at Rochdale, the newspaper I have named has found some occasion for chanting the praises of "America" as offering a highly desirable market for the robust portion of our unemployed population. To day the song is sung in a paragraph extracted from a New York paper. To-morrow, in the skilfully conducted correspondence of its own representative in the Empire City; next day, in some more or less authentic letter purporting to be written by a Lancashire emigrant who writes himself down "a citizen" and speaks of his employer as the "boss;" and lastly, and most suspiciously of all, in the refining effusions of mythical "Manchester operatives," who, having been betrayed into emigrating to Canada, deprecate the evil consequences of their example, and broadly add that there is more need of an emigration society in British America than in England—that hundreds of Canadians are emigrating to the States, and that the cry is "still they come."

Instances of this indirect but no less unjustifiable advocacy of an "emigration policy" by the Manchester Examiner could be multiplied beyond the limits of this letter. For example, we were scarcely informed the other day that President Lincoln had issued an order for half a million more men, when we were also regaled with the intelligence that "good willing labourers" would find work in the United States, "live well," and "save as much as they could earn at home." Flesh meat, poultry, or some dainty, is, it seems, "put down to each man's meal." After working hours the working man cannot be "detected" from his boss. All wear cloth "to their work:" cord and moleskin are "disbanded," square-toed boots are put on, and check shirts are replaced with white linen. Such are the inviting features in the prospect held out to "robust immigrants"—such as carpenters, blacksmiths, hodmen, or other serviceable fighting materiel of that kind. To tailors, it appears, the letter-writer in the Examiner cannot offer any such inducements, "the business being monopolised by females and sewing machines;" he naively adds, however, that "unless the poor tailor be moderately strong he would stand but a poor chance of getting employment," and he winds up all with, "Now I've told you what is good and what is bad, and I think I cannot do better than tell you that of all the trades going there is none like soldiering—fighting for Uncle Sam." Yesterday morning, the same journal, quoting from the New York Shipping List, informed us that a number a manufacturers, traders, and farmers of the State of New York had sent "parties" to England with the view of employing mechanics and labourers for service this spring; and "it was confidently predicted by sanguine calculators that the number of immigrants to arrive in 1864 would reach nearly half a million." But the whole of the paragraph is worth quoting:—

"The diversion to the Federal army of such a vast amount of labour from its legitimate channels would produce serious results were it not for the assurances of a large increase in European immigration. There is reason to believe that there will be such a heavy influx of the bone and sinew of the old world to our shores during the current year as to compensate, in a great measure, for the exhaustion of our population by the circumstances of war. Should war break out in the north of Europe we may expect to see a vast increase from that section, second now to that of Great Britain—but likely to surpass it under the disturbing influence of war. It is estimated that nearly one-seventh of our industrial population north and west have been drawn off from their usual vocations by the war. In this condition of our affairs, therefore, we ought to encourage and welcome the accessions to our labouring population from the old world."

The Manchester Courier of yesterday, upon the kindred subject of the Irish exodus, writes as follows:—

"There are those who do not regard the decrease of population as an evil. We are told that in proportion to the area capable of cultivation, the country is still over-populated; that two and a-half acres of soil that can be called food-producing in any worthy sense of the word, is all that can be counted against every individual, while under similar conditions in England at least three and a-half is the proportion. Unfortunately, however, it turns out on examination that of the emigrants who have taken their departure for America, the great proportion consists of able-bodied labourers in robust youth, or in the flower of manhood, and that only the very young, and the aged, and the useless have been left behind. We will not again, so soon, follow the bones and sinew of the population to its destiny on the opposite shores of the Atlantic, or stay to contemplate the uses to which it is put when it gets there. Nor shall we pause to consider the inducements that have been held out to the unhappy emigrants—inducements hardly more seductive in the shape of high wages, to be paid in "greenbacks," than in the paradisaic pictures drawn by Mr. Bright and men of his party on platforms devoted to the quackery of agitation in the market-places of this country. We know but too well that high wages for labour, in almost nine cases out of every ten, mean bounties for being sabred and shot on the blood-stained fields of Virginia and Tennessee."

There was some talk, a few weeks ago, of an effort being made by the Union and Emancipation Society to contribute a "George Thompson purse," but owing, it is said, to financial objections, the movement rather halts. Nor does it appear from latest accounts from the other side of the Atlantic that Mr. Thompson is finding things smoother than in England for "shaping his old course in a country new." The following ominous little paragraph appears in one of our morning papers:—"AN UNWELCOME VISITOR.—The New York Times urges that Mr. George Thompson, the anti-slavery lecturer, late member for the Tower Hamlets, should receive no welcome from the Unionists and loyal people of America."

The excitement created in Northern circles here by the Rev. A. Mursells' Sunday lectures in the Free-Trade-Hall has still to be allayed. Members of the Union and Emancipation Society have made any number of attempts to answer the rev. lecturer in the columns of the Manchester Examiner, but in vain. The sale of the lecture on "No Smoking," of which I gave a brief abstract in my last letter, is said to be unprecedented. The following "notices to correspondents" attest the importance attached by the Northern clique in this city to Mr. Mursell's vigorous attack upon the Yankees:—

"SUNDAY LECTURES IN THE FREE-TRADE HALL.—The numerous letters which we have received in reference to these lectures are inadmissible to our columns, where the lectures themselves have not been reported."

"NO SMOKING.—We beg to inform a very numerous set of correspondents that the Free-Trade-Hall Sunday lectures, not having been reported in our columns, cannot be assailed by them. We have quite enough to do to consume our own smoke."

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, February 23.

THE chronicle of the last week has been singularly bare of interest, so much so that the Indépendance Belge has not been once withheld from circulation. When there is anything stirring in the political world, the Indépendance is generally stopped every other day.

As disengaging the imperial policy in Mexico, the arrival of the archduke and archduchess on Thursday is an event of great importance. There are some sceptics who fancy they discern a change in the prince's intentions, or at least a hesitation, from his coming here as archduke and not as emperor, as was very confidently announced. This is over refining, and the last news given in the Moniteur, which represent the submission of the country to the new régime as complete, do not even leave him an excuse for delay. The question of the confiscated Church property threatens to be the great difficulty the new sovereign will have to contend with on his arrival, if we may judge from the eager haste with which the restored bishops are launching general excommunications against all aiders and abettors of the work of sacrilege. In this comprehensive description the French army and the regent Almonte are evidently included. The necessity of at once settling this question has probably some weight in deciding the Emperor's journey to Rome, for it is only there that measures to pacify the contending claimants can be taken.

As a symptom of feeling in the friends of the Government, the debate on M. Bravay's election for the second time for the Garde, has been read with great interest. It came out that the committee had determined to recognise the legality of the election, but at the same time to censure the conduct of the prefect for whose warm support of Mr. Bravay there seemed to be other than political reasons. The Government commissioners refused however to accept a decision which cast a blame upon a public servant of such high rank, whereupon the committee dropped all reference to the prefect, but recommended that the election should be annulled. This proposal was adopted by a large majority, in which the members of the minority figured. Sunday's Moniteur contained the commercial treaty with Italy, including the tariff of duties. Only one article is subjected to export duty on the side of France, and this article is rags.

The artistic world has been greatly excited by the results of the sale of unfinished works and sketches left by Eugene Delacroix. During his life his talent was disputed by a large portion of the French public, and his pictures had a slow sale at very moderate prices. He has made a posthumous fortune. His oil pictures and sketches, very few of them in a condition to be appreciated by any one but a painter, fetched nearly £9,000, and the pencil sketches and water colours of which there is an enormous number, seem to be equally run after. It is difficult to account for this sudden burst of enthusiasm, which the wits call, "L'exaltation de la Croix," but it is certain that six months hence the same things will not be worth one-third of what is now paid for them.

The press is almost exclusively occupied with the events in Slesvig, and the discontent in the smaller German States to which Austria's and Prussia's high-handed proceedings have given rise. The Presse, with that inexhaustible verve which suggests a ready remedy for every ill, seizes this opportunity to lecture on the European Union—a confederation of all the sovereign states of Europe, to be opposed to what?—to the United States of America! The debates on the balance of power in Europe are mere childish quarrels. There is no risk to be feared from such home disputes as Italy, Denmark, or Poland. They are mere family disagreements. The great danger which threatens us is from the insolence of the reconstituted American Union, whose resuscitation, which M. de Girardin, who only a year ago demonstrated to be for ever impossible, now thinks is only a matter of weeks or months. He considers it certain that the necessity of curbing the pride of America, and preventing the application of the Monroe doctrine, will oblige Europe to oppose to it a league of the whole old world. Better, then, at once to erect this bulwark, which, in M. de Girardin's eyes, presents no difficulty. He is certainly the cleverest man alive, ready to fill columns every day on every possible subject, whether it be on the liberty of the press or that of baking, on a new system of banking, or a reform of diplomacy. His suggestions are always ingenious and seldom practical, as in this case, where he proposes, as an easy matter, in view of a future danger, the construction of a great confederacy which should swallow up all the rivalries that have divided the old world since the beginning of time; instead of proposing the far simpler plan of destroying the danger by aiding the separation of the contending States in the North and South of the late Union. He sees the danger which threatens the world, but it is only to shut his eyes to the simplest and only infallible remedy. Meanwhile the little family squabbles of which he speaks so disdainfully threaten to acquire a fresh development as spring approaches. There are signs of movements in Italy which portend fresh convulsions not only in that country but also in the East. The old game is again to be played between the Party of Action and Victor Emanuel's Government. In one paper it is announced that His Majesty and General Garibaldi have come to an understanding, in another that General Turr has resigned his commission to hold himself in readiness for events; and from Spain we hear of an English ship, laden with contraband of war, seized on its way to Ancona by the authorities of Malaga, where it had put in for repairs. Whether to aid or to oppose the designs of the war party, large bodies of troops are being marched from the South of Italy into the Northern provinces.

The Moniteur Financier continues its examination of the financial condition of the Northern States. In this paper the rapid accumulation of the debt and the corresponding fall in the public credit are particularly insisted on. The writer sees nothing in prospect but repudiation and bankruptcy, and he adds that to this some of the most influential journals of New York are already pointing. The industrial classes, in whose hands is the Government, have, according to the New York Herald, no direct interest in the national debt, and when the weight of taxation falls too heavily on them it will be easy for them to bring about repudiation by raising to power only men who partake their opinions. On the other hand, while the debt of the last three years is already nearly half that of England, the interest to be paid on it equals that paid on the whole debt of England. The interest has to be paid in gold, which at 59 premium bring it in fact to more than 9 per cent. Nor does this by any means represent the whole public debt of the North. The State debts in 1860 amounted to an aggregate of forty millions sterling, paying on the average 6½ per cent. interest. Since then these State debts have increased in an enormous proportion, but the official figures have not yet been published. Mr. Chase probably felt that his statement was alarming enough without this addition to its grand total.

I have said nothing of Denmark, although this is really the subject which now engrosses public attention. You have later news than we have in Paris, and the press of all parties here is so unanimous in condemning the action of the great German Powers, that there is not even room for the controversy in which French journalism delights. The most notable symptom of public opinion which the papers present, is a certain readiness to excuse the Austrians at the expense of the Prussians. The arrogant behaviour of the latter, their treatment of newspaper correspondents, that of the Patrie among others, is contrasted with the polite bearing of the Austrians, who have come "only to make war," and who seem equally anxious to make themselves agreeable to the inhabitants of the duchies and to their Danish prisoners. The Moniteur announced the withdrawal of the Prussian forces from Jutland this morning, but no telegraphic confirmation of this report having appeared the improvement on the Bourse was very feeble.

The confirmation of this rumour is anxiously looked for, because it is remembered that in 1848 the invasion of strictly speaking Danish soil was the signal for both Sweden and Russia to intervene, and that the landing of a Swedish army was only prevented by the retreat of the Prussians. The rumour of an understanding between England and France, which had been at one time believed and was afterwards called in question, seems to have revived this afternoon, but so much uncertainty surrounds the whole question that men of business hesitate to act upon simple reports.

It is announced that the Kearsage, which has made so long a station at Brest, having received important despatches, has left in the direction of Cadiz.

Lent is especially the season of dinner parties. At the great dinner given by the Emperor last week, and at which the deputies were present in great numbers, two of the Opposition members for Paris were present. Four others who had received invitations sent excuses. This act of bouderie is unfortunate, as exhibiting a feeling which can only give their parliamentary opposition the character of a personal and dynastic one. It is this tendency of all Oppositions in France which renders the enjoyment of constitutional liberty impossible.

A CONFEDERATE PREDICTION.

A Richmond letter of recent date, from a gentleman high in authority in the Confederate States, contains the following passages :—

The course of the British Government has been marked with such complaisant deference for our enemies, that it has become almost as hostile to us as though Great Britain were in alliance with the United States, and we have been compelled to notice the subject on this side. We do not attribute this to any unfriendly feeling on the part of the British Cabinet, but to a dread of offending the United States, which has reached such a point in England as to have become morbid in the extreme. How unwise the course of Great Britain has been will become more and more apparent as the war progresses. For fear of a war with the United States she has refused to do us justice in recognising us—has countenanced and respected a blockade known to be invalid—has protected Federal commerce by shutting her ports against access to our prizes, and has instituted a vexatious and illegal prosecution against her own citizens to prevent their sale to us of vessels, while Yankee purchasers of arms and munitions are unrestricted and their shipment unimpeded. She has submitted to insulting violations of her neutral rights, to contempt of her exclusive jurisdiction over her own colonies, and has allowed the insolent aggression of our foes to deprive Lancashire of bread and to paralyse the most lucrative and important branch of British manufacture. All this to avoid war with the United States, which was beyond the reach of possibility, if Her Majesty's Government had joined hands frankly with France in our recognition, which would at once have ended the contest on this continent. The result is that all the patience and long-suffering of Great Britain have been considered by the North as conclusive proof that England fears the United States and dares not resent any insult, while the concessions already made have so inflamed their arrogance and conceit, that no future event on earth is more certain than an early and bitter war between the United States and Great Britain, for which the former has been trained, prepared, and made effective by the long duration of the struggle with us.

THE American news brought by the Canada shows that the prospects of the Federals for the coming campaign are the reverse of hopeful. There is one great fact which stands out conspicuously in the history of the war of secession. It is, that wherever the North have come in contact with the solid mass of the South they have found it an incompressible body, like the deepseated granite rocks of the earth's crust, which it is impossible to penetrate. Indeed, if they could penetrate it, it would probably be going farther to fare worse. A surging, seething ocean of molten matter is said to underlie the lowest rocks of the outer crust of this planet; and within the confines and border defences of the South there appears to exist a resolute and united people, who, were their country overrun and occupied by the Federals, would give them such a reception and assume such an attitude as the Poles of Warsaw would have given and assumed with regard to the Russians if they were twenty millions instead of four. But such a stage of the struggle, if it should ever be reached at all, is far enough off at present. The North has not yet penetrated the crust of the South. At the point where the greatest efforts have been made by the Federals they have absolutely made no progress since M'Dowell was defeated by Beauregard at Bull Run, in the first great battle of the war, three years ago. The same may be said with respect to the contest that has long been raging at Charleston. After knocking down part of a fort, shelling a city, and gaining an unimportant position on the coast, they have encountered a hard, solid, impenetrable mass, upon which they are unable to make any impression. They have come upon the deepest rock of the Southern crust, and cannot perforate it; it is proof against all the boring tools of the Gilmores, Parrotts, and Dahlgrens. A modification of this common type of warfare is to be seen in the west. There the primitive rocks did not lie so near the surface. There was much water in those parts, which were proportionately softer. The gun-boats could make their way up and down the Mississippi. But the softer parts of the western crust of Secessia have now been got through, and again the Federals find themselves against a solid, impenetrable mass. If from the north, the east, and the west, we turn to the extreme south, we find that matters have long been in this condition of fixity. The Federals cannot get farther into the country than New Orleans, and their occupation of this place, which they have now held so long, is an epitome of what their occupation of the entire South would be if they were able to overrun it. The waters of the rivers and the sea which surround the South are as the arable soil, the clay, the loam, the sand, the gravel in the earth's crust. When a less or greater depth of this soft matter is got through, you come upon solid rock, upon which you can make no impression, and which, if you could penetrate it, would let you through into the boiling chaos beneath.—Morning Post.

SOUTHERN PRINTERS IN THE FIELD.—In nearly every paper we pick up we see advertisements for printers, and yet there were, before the war, more papers printed in the State of Georgia than are now published in the Confederate States. The reason of this is that at least 75 per cent. of the fraternity have been, and are now, in the army. Many of them command brigades, regiments, and companies, and are upon different generals' staffs, while hundreds of them have met death upon the field of glory. We venture that there is not an office in the South that has not a representative in the field, and many papers were suspended at the commencement of the struggle, in order that the proprietor, editor, printers, and all might enlist. They are generally men of education, and always of superior intelligence, and therefore fully understand the principles we are fighting for, and the hardships, disease, and death incident to the life of a soldier. It is not to be presumed that they were actuated by blind fanaticism, or from love of change, or from any other cause than the purest motives of chivalry.—Richmond Enquirer.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, February 25.

THE money market has remained in a very quiet state throughout the week. The demand for discount accommodation, both at the Bank and in the open market, has been partly restricted; in fact, within the last day or two, scarcely any business has been doing, in consequence of the prevailing opinion that a further reduction will be made in the Bank rate of discount to-morrow. At present there appears no reason whatever why such a course should not be adopted; but should the demand for India be revived, which is not impossible, an advance would again have to be resorted to. The brokers are not charging more than 6½ per cent. for their advances, and the Joint Stock Banks are disposing of their resources at 6⅜, at which they are doing but little business. On the Stock Exchange money has been advanced at from 2 to 3 per cent.: but in consequence of an increased demand for short loans the terms were raised yesterday to 5 to 6 per cent., and to-day the quotations was 4½ to 5½ per cent. It may be imagined that if hostilities in Denmark were to cease, what would be the activity in trade. In the absence of the legitimate employment of money, there must be a fresh tendency to encourage speculative adventure.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market continues in a satisfactory state; the amount of gold sent into the Bank during the week, including £27,000 this afternoon, has been £220,000, whilst the withdrawals for transmission abroad have been only £82,000. The arrivals of specie have been smaller than usual, being only £78,267, of which £35,374 was from New York and the remainder from Alexandria. The shipments of specie by the late steamer to the East amounted to £69,861, of which £42,451 was in gold and £27,410 in silver. These remittances were £7,441 for India, £34,090 for China, £1,500 for Gibraltar, £24,830 for Alexandria, and £2,000 for Point de Galle. The present demand for gold for exportation to the continent is now very slack. Bar silver has been very flat, and, in the absence of any fresh demand for the East, has declined 61¼, at which it is now nominally quoted. There has been rather more enquiry for Mexican dollars, at a fractional improvement in price, but the market is now steady again. The following are the gold ships on their way from Australia:—The Water Nymph with £56,000; Maid of Judah, £13,000; Omar Pacha, £71,000; Giant Causeway, £20,500; Result, £84,500; Japan, £64,000; Donald M'Kay, £19,000; and the Star of Peace, £75,000; making a total of £403,000.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

There has been considerable animation exhibited in the English Stock Market during the week, and prices have fluctuated considerably. The variations, however, have been almost entirely caused by the nature of the successive telegrams received as to the progress of the war in Denmark. When it was announced that the Federal forces had entered Jutland, there was a large fall in prices, but on the subsequent announcement of their retirement therefrom quotations again improved; and when it was announced to-day that Austria and Prussia had agreed to a conference in London for the settlement of the Danish question, a general impulse was given to all the markets, and a farther considerable improvement ensued. The closing prices of Consols this evening was 91⅛ to ¼ for money, and 91⅛ to ¼ for the account, which as compared with this day week is a rise of ½ per cent. Exchequer Bills show increased firmness, being now up to 5s. dis. to par. A large and somewhat speculative business has been transacted in foreign stocks, at improved prices, nearly all round, but the great advance has been in Mexican, which have risen fully 5 per cent, chiefly in consequence of the news that the terms for the settlement of the debt are in course of arrangement—the terms being the exchange of £60 of Five per Cent New Stock for each £100 of the existing Three per Cents, and £30 of Five per Cents for each twenty overdue coupons of £1 10s. each. A good business has also been done in Greek at an improvement of ½ per cent. Spanish Passives have advanced 1 per cent., but in other descriptions there has not been so much variation. The closing prices were—Greek, 22½ to 23; Mexican, 43½ to 44; Spanish Passives, 34¼ to 34½; Do. Certificates, 13½ to 14; Turkish Six per Cents (1854) 90½ to 91½, and do. (1862) 69 to 69½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

A larger business has been transacted in American, Government, and railway securities than for some time past, and the market generally has exhibited more firmness. The transactions comprised Virginia State Six per Cents at 31, 32, 31½, 31, and 33½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 78, 79, 78½, and 78; Do. do. Pennsylvania do., 79, 79½, 80, 81, and 80; Erie $100 shares, all paid, 63; Do. do. Seven per Cent Preference, 80 and 78½; Illinois Central, Seven per Cent, 70½ and 71; Do. do. $100 shares, $80 paid, 20½, 20, 18, and 20½ dis.; Do. do. all paid, 70; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway, 70, and New York Central Six per Cents, 62.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Although there has not comparatively been so much business doing in the British railway share market as in the other departments, still prices have generally improved, and have still a buoyant tendency. The dealers in this market appear for the moment to have in some measure curtailed their operations, under the belief that money will almost immediately become cheaper. The most important variations as compared with last week are a rise of 2 per cent. in Metropolitan and South Devon; of 1¼ per cent. in Bristol and Exeter, and London, Chatham, and Dover; of 1 per cent. in Great Northern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and West Cornwall; an advance of ½ in Great Eastern, Great Western and Sheffield, and of ¼ per cent. in East Anglesea, London and North-Western, and Midland. On the other hand there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in South-Eastern, and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, North-Eastern (Leeds), and do. (York). Foreign railway shares are quiet, but in general fairly supported, and colonial undertakings remain firm, but without any material alteration in prices.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been firm, and large dealings have taken place—the highest price touched was 57 to 58. There has since been a reaction, the quotations being yesterday 52 to 53. To-day there is a little doing—the closing quotation is 52 to 54. The half-yearly dividend due 1st March, is announced for payment, also the first half-yearly drawing at 2½ per cent. Of the amounts at present unredeemed by cotton we understand that over £150,000 has been thus converted. The amount of bonds to be paid off at par next week is therefore about £71,000.

THE OTTOMAN LOAN OF 1863.

Notice has to-day been given of the issue of the balance of 50,000,000 f. (£2,000,000 sterling) specially reserved at the issue in April last, in 100,000 bonds of 500 f. (£20.) bearing 6 per cent. interest. The terms of issue are 68 per cent., with dividend from the 1st January last payable on subscription 100 f. (£3 19s.) on the 31st May 100 f. (£3 19s.) and on the 1st July 140 f., less dividend 125 f., (£4 18s. 10d.) The holders of the loan of 1863 wishing to claim their rights to a proportional share of this balance, viz., one bond for every three existing bonds, must deposit with the Ottoman Bank the latter, together with the amount due as above on subscriptions between the 25th February and the 3rd March.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the ordinary meeting of the London District Telegraph Company, a report was read, stating that the receipts amounted to £4,328, and the expenses to £5,125, being a deficit of £796. The net receipts for the half-year however showed an increase of £100 over the previous half-year and £327 over the corresponding period of 1862. The report was adopted.—At the annual meeting of the Scottish Provident Institution, the report stated that the new business completed in 1863 consisted of 880 proposals for sums amounting to £455,493, on which the premiums amounted to £17,100. A further sum of £3,528 was raised in purchase of annuities. The gross receipt of the year amounted to £163,122, and the assurances subsisting to £4,479,402, and the realised fund, accumulated entirely from the premiums received, to £938,962.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus of the Imperial Financial Company, Limited, has been issued this afternoon, with an influential board of directors. The objects of the undertaking being the negotiation of loans; concessions for railways and other public works, whether in England, India, the colonies, or abroad. The advance of money on the deposit of approved securities, as well as the purchase and negotiation of the same on commission. Facilities will also be afforded to contractors of undoubted position, who have undertaken the construction of railways and other important works. The capital is to be £2,000,000 in 40,000 shares of £50 each. First issue 20,000 shares. Deposit £1 per share on application and £4 on allotment. It is however not intended in the first instance to call up more than £15 per share.—The General International Agency Company, Limited, have also issued their prospectus this afternoon. The sum required is £500,000 in shares of £10 each, with power to increase. Deposits £1 per share on application and £1 10s. on allotment. The objects contemplated by the company are the undertaking of financial, credit, agency, and exchange operations in England and France, and particularly to afford the further facilities rendered requisite by the operation of the treaty of commerce, for the interchange of commodities and products between the two countries. The transactions will embrace, inter alia the discount of dock warrants and the procuring of the sale of the goods represented by them; the opening of accounts current in goods with manufacturers, merchants, &c., in England, France, and elsewhere; the selling del credere for account of its customers the goods which may be entrusted to it for the purpose; the buying on commission for account of its customers in England, France, and elsewhere; the making of advances on goods which shall be consigned to it pending their sale by the company, and the establishment of periodical public sales in England and France. At the outset, the company will open with head offices in London and Paris, and agencies for the consignment of goods, &c., will be opened throughout the United Kingdom.—Another important undertaking has been launched this evening. It is called the Gellivara Company, Limited, and is established for the purpose of purchasing an extensive property in Sweden, known as the Gellivara estates, with the view of developing its great resources. The property comprises about 1,200,000 acres of land, of which more than 500,000 consist of good forests of red and white pine; 100,000 acres are already under cultivation, or fit for it, and further extensive districts will become available for agricultural purposes. The Gellivara iron bed, probably the largest in the world, extends over nearly three square miles. The ore consists partly of hematite and partly of protoxide of iron, without any visible trace of pyrite, and yielding on the average 65 per cent. of pure metal. There are also on the property 215 farms, nine water, and one steam sawmill, two blast furnaces, four ironworks, and a shipbuilding yard, &c. During the first three years required for the full development of the property, the vendors guarantee an income on the paid-up capital of at least 6 per cent., and they have bound themselves to make up every deficiency in such amounts. The proposed capital is £500,000, in 10,000 shares of £50 each, with power to increase. Deposit £1 per share on application and £4 on allotment.—The Alexandra Park Company is another new undertaking. The capital is fixed at £500,000, in 50,000 A shares, and 50,000 B shares, of £4 each. The debenture capital is £300,000. The project is already favourably known to the public. The debenture capital has been chiefly created for the purpose of paying for the estates and for the purchase of the International Exhibition building of 1862, now erecting in the park by Messrs. Kelk and Lucas, the contractors, while it is anticipated that the whole of this capital will be redeemed by the sale of surplus lands.—The English, Irish, and Foreign Rolling Stock Company has been established for the purpose of introducing important patented inventions for railway wagons and buffer springs, and other improvements in the construction of railway wagons, and of goods, coal, and other wagons, for the building and sale, or letting on lease or otherwise, such wagons to railway companies, coal owners, and others. The proposed capital is £150,000, in 15,000 shares of £10 each. The first issue to be 10,000 shares, with a deposit on application of 10s. per share and 10s. on allotment.—The prospectus has likewise been issued of the Royal Naval and Military Banking Corporation, Limited, with a capital of £1,000,000, in 10,000 shares of £100 each, of which it is not intended to call up more than £20 per share. Amongst the transactions proposed to be carried out are the general agency of regiments, conducting the private affairs of officers generally, taking charge of claims for prize-money, widows and orphans of officers' pensions, discounting of officers' bills and advancing sums of money upon approved security, and assisting them in the purchase of promotions. Branches or agencies in the different garrison towns and camps, both in England and the colonies, will be established, affording officers the utmost facilities for transmitting moneys from place to place without trouble or expense.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Business in most departments has progressed slowly since this day week, but encouraged by the easier condition of money, holders of all kinds of produce have continued firm in their demands, and quotations are almost without exception well supported; whilst for some few articles higher rates have been established. In cotton the variations of prices has been trifling, and the dulness which has prevailed for some past seems to be giving way to a better inquiry at the close. In the grain markets no improvement can be quoted. The oil-cake trade is inactive and quotations stationary. Provisions have met a steady demand. Prime sizeable American bacon sides have sold at 44s. to 46s.; middles offer at 40s. to 44s. Beef still hangs on hand, but lower terms are not accepted. Fine American butters are obtainable at 100s. to 106s., heavy arrivals affecting the market. Sugar, after being inactive for some short time, has again sold freely to-day, and at firm rates; clayed Manilla bringing 11s. 6d. per cwt. The tea market has not as yet been perceptibly influenced by the China telegrams. Cassia lignea has declined 1s. to 2s. per cwt.

Other spices remain without essential change, but meet only a limited inquiry. The demand for linseed oil, principally on American account, has caused an advance of 1s., the price to-day being 35s. 6d. per cwt., with a firm market. Rape oil is also the turn dearer, pale making 42s. per cwt. Sperm is unaltered. Camphor has risen to 107s. 6d. per cwt. In chemicals but a moderate business is passing, and rates are unchanged. The principal feature in metals has been a rapid advance in spelter, which is now quoted £23 10s. on the spot. Scotch pig iron, after receding to 59s. 3d., closed to-day at 60s. 3d. Lead continues very firm. There is less doing in hemp, but for Manilla previous rates are asked; Russian may, however, be bought upon rather easier terms. Since last week several parcels of cochineal have been placed; good Honduras silver grain is now worth 3s. 3d. to 3s. 4d., and some holders refuse to sell at these prices. Indigo moves off in moderate quantity, at last sales rates. The colonial wool sales are to commence on the 3rd proximo, and the market is regarded with confidence, as dealers are known to hold only limited stocks.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, February 24.

On the whole a fair business has been transacted in our cotton market during the week, but nevertheless there has been very little animation exhibited, the generally unsettled state of political affairs still operating prejudicially. There has, however, been very little alteration in quotations; but if anything the turn is in favour of buyers. The sales this week have been 29,000 bales, of which 8,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year, so far, have been 246,840 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 228,270 bales. There have been imported this year 176,732 bales, against 164,701 bales last year. The exports this year have reached 40,020 bales, whilst in 1863 they were only 32,184 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 171,300 bales; last year the number was only 108,600 bales. This year there have been taken on speculation 37,780 bales; and in 1863, 78,610 bales. The present computed stocks are 246,500 bales; at the corresponding period last year they were 415,350 bales. With regard to the future arrivals of cotton, Messrs. Whitworth and Co. have just issued a circular in which they estimate the total arrivals this year at 226,358 bales, and state the quantity at sea from India, China, and Japan, to the 20th February, at 555,651 bales; of which 456,987 bales had been shipped for Liverpool and the remainder for London. Of this quantity, however, upwards of 190,000 were from China and Japan, which are rather small bales. The latest quotations this afternoon were:—American descriptions, 26¼d. to 27¾. Egyptian, 26¼d. to 34d. Pernambuco, 27d. to 34d. Maranhams, 27d. to 34d. Bahia, 27d. to 34d., and Surats, 12d. to 23d.

MANCHESTER, February 23.

The past week has been one of exceeding dulness in our yarn and cloth market, and the tendency of prices has been against the seller.

The continental agents are almost entirely out of the market, owing to the gloomy aspect of German politics. Liverpool cotton market has been very dull all the week and prices have materially given way; this of itself has depressed this market to some extent. Calcutta telegrams are to hand, bringing two days later news than brought by the mail. That market is reported as rather steadier, but with little business doing. China news is also to hand, reporting a monetary panic at Shanghai, with exchange at 6s. 10½d. to 7s.

Here and there offers have been made for India mule yarns at extremely low prices, and only for small quantities. 2s. 5d. per lb. has been offered for No. 40, which is fully 5d. per lb. below the highest point.

Cloths of all kinds are firmer in price than yarns, but in order to make sales lower quotations must be submitted to.

Some contracts have been entered into for delivery in March and April on the basis of 2s. 5d. per lb. for shirtings. So it is reported, but only to a small extent.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6, Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

JACKSON, Mississippi, was occupied by the Federals on the 5th. General Gilmore has returned to Port Royal from Jacksonville, and reports that the Florida expedition "has been successful but unimportant." Such is the sum of the military news of the week. After heavy skirmishing there has been a pause before commencing the spring campaign. But the season for bloodless telegrams is almost over. Winter is disappearing and ere long we shall hear of events which, if they decide nothing else, will show that the military resources of the Confederacy are unimpaired, and that the Confederate soldiers are what they were in past campaigns. There is, however, every reason to hope that the Confederates are on the eve of achieving substantial triumphs.

Two important measures some time since predicted in this journal and fully commented on in advance, have passed the Confederate Congress, and on the 18th February became laws by the approval of President Davis. The Richmond Enquirer of the 19th February gives the following brief outlines of the two bills:—

A BILL TO IMPOSE CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS ON FOREIGN COMMERCE.

This Bill prohibits the exportation of cotton, tobacco, naval and military stores, molasses, sugar, or rice, under the penalty of forfeiture of any vessel or vehicle, or animals, engaged in the transportation thereof. Permits to export may be granted, under rules which may be prescribed by the President.

The Bill also prohibits the sending of any of the above-named articles to any point within the Confederacy in possession of the enemy.

A violation of this law comes within the category of high misdemeanour, and is punishable by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the Confederate States courts.

A BILL TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES INTO THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

This Bill prohibits the importation of luxuries, of which a long list is enumerated, after the first day of March next. A provision in the Bill empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the maximum of foreign prices at which, or within which, all goods made wholly of cotton, flax, wool, or silk may be imported. This is designed to ensure the importation of prime necessity and common use.

It seems incredible that one of Her Majesty's Ministers of State should make such a statement as that made on Tuesday night in the House of Lords by Earl Russell, in a conversation on the subject of Federal enlistments in Ireland. He said, in substance, that the Confederates had dismissed the English consuls for protesting against the habitual conscription—not merely enlistment—of British subjects. We quote, as a matter of record, the exact words of the Times' report, March 1st:—

I must say that though they (the Confederates) are entitled to impartial conduct, they are not entitled to any other conduct at our hands, because, though recruiting for the Confederate States does not take place in this country, as far as we are aware, conscription does take place as regards British subjects residing in the Southern States. When we have endeavoured to obtain redress for this we have found that the Consuls, who were appointed when all the American States were united, have on a sudden been driven from the Confederate States, and there is no one there who can take up the case of British subjects, who are very frequently forced into the Confederate ranks against their own will. This and other hardships are inflicted upon British subjects in the Confederate States, and from the loss of consuls they are not able to make complaints and obtain the redress to which they are entitled. (Hear.)

Leaving out New Orleans as being in Federal occupation, there were four British Consuls within the de facto Confederate jurisdiction, of whom two, Mr. Bunch, at Charleston, and Mr. Molineux, at Savannah, were, quietly and without reason assigned, withdrawn by Earl Russell; a third, Mr. Magee, at Mobile, for doing what he deemed it his bounden duty to do, and what his colleagues had done without reproof, was dismissed by Earl Russell himself. The fourth and only remaining one, Mr. Moor, at Richmond, was requested by the Confederate Government to leave the country, not because of any controversy arising from the conscription laws, but for a flagrant contempt of the de facto authority of the Confederate Government. The reasons for this step were distinctly stated by Mr. Benjamin in a despatch to Mr. Mason, which was duly communicated to Earl Russell, and which, furthermore, was published in several of the London newspapers. The whole of the correspondence relating to this subject was laid by the Confederate Government before Congress, and an official copy of the same is at the disposal of the Foreign Secretary. Every disputed case under the Conscription law has been fairly tried before the Confederate courts, which are entitled to at least equal respect from Her Majesty's Government as Mr. Lincoln's prize courts, and it is demonstrable that the Confederate Government, in its anxiety to prevent any cause for complaint, has purposely countenanced great laxity in the enforcement of the law against persons claiming to be British subjects.

We have heretofore been disposed to explain the peculiar neutrality of the Foreign-office, by the fact that in this great controversy he hears only one side, and to blame the Secretary chiefly for not using the ample opportunities he has, without committing the policy of the country, to learn the facts on the other side. His remarks on Tuesday night, in which he went out of his way to eulogise the conduct of the captain of the Federal man-of-war Kearsage, and to cast a fling at the Confederacy, betray a kind of personal feeling, which is not only unbecoming a Minister of State, but inconsistent with the character of a gentleman.

General Banks has issued an order by which the negroes are to be held to forced labour, and the white men who will not vote for Government candidates driven into exile. It has been truly remarked that the institution of the South is slavery in name and according to the letter of the law, but that in practice it is a mild system of predial serfdom. The scheme of General Banks is in theory a stringent system of serfdom, but in practice will be slavery of the most cruel and oppressive character. The negroes are to labour for ten hours per day in summer and nine per day in winter, and besides rations, &c., are to receive salaries ranging from $3 to $8 per month. As their wages are to be deducted for sickness, indolence, and insolence, it is not probable that the Yankee contractors will pay away much money on that account. To buy clothes from a negro is to be punished by fine and imprisonment. This regulation would be absurd except upon the ground that the negro is the property of the Yankee contractor, and therefore the clothes he earns belong to his owner. Negroes are not to be allowed to visit other plantations. In a word, they will be in a position exactly analogous to that of our convicts, except that English convicts have not so many hours of labour, and are not under taskmasters whose interest it is to grind as much work out of them as less possible.

The free whites are treated with about as much consideration as the free negroes. General Banks orders a free election, and informs the electors that if they abstain from voting, or do not vote the Government ticket, they will be exiled.

Our New Orleans Correspondent gives a graphic account of these proceedings.

As General Banks has not been able to get more than 1400 names on the register, he has devised a plan for the reception of unregistered voters. In a letter addressed to the "Free State Committee," he says, "Any person who takes the oath on the day of election, when administered by properly qualified officers, although his name may not have been previously registered, should be allowed to vote." To confer the right of voting without previous registration is not an ingenious fraud because it can deceive nobody, but it is novel and impudent.

We elsewhere publish a proclamation of President Davis to the Confederate soldiers. It acknowledges the spirit of patriotism which has prompted the troops to offer themselves for re-enlistment. The tone of this document is earnest, affectionate, and hopeful; and is worthy of the writer, of the occasion, and of the gallant army to which it is addressed.

The judgment in the Chesapeake case, from which we give an extract in another column, grants the restitution of the vessel to the original owners upon what seem to us altogether untenable grounds. Judge Stewart admits that the seizure might not have been an act of piracy, and does not offer an opinion on that part of the case. He assumes that the seizure was lawful, but that as the Confederates brought an uncondemned prize into a British port, contrary to the Queen's proclamation, the vessel is forfeited. To whom? According to the law, to the British Government; but Judge Stewart says it would not consort with the dignity of the Crown "to add the proceeds of property which had belonged to the citizens of a friendly nation to the privy purse of the Queen." Therefore he returns the cargo and vessel to the original owners, "not as a favour to them, but as an act of justice to the offended dignity of the Crown; not as recognising any right of the Government of the United States to require such restoration, but as a fit punishment of the offenders, and a warning to others." Yet according to his own showing, the restitution is all favour to the Federals, for the vessel is forfeited to the British Crown. Judge Stewart dwells on the Chesapeake being an uncondemned prize; but he had no evidence before him to warrant the conclusion. He will perhaps reconsider this part of his judgment, when he hears that the British Government has, in the case of the Tuscaloosa, recognised the universal construction of the law of nations, that a vessel may be condemned on the high seas. Nor is it clear that the Chesapeake was taken into a British port as a prize. Judge Stewart says the vessel was brought in "not openly but covertly; not in her proper name, but in a false name," that is, she was brought in as a Confederate vessel, and not as a prize, and British ports are no more closed against Confederate than Federal vessels. Judge Stewart remarked that the Confederate captors did not appear at the bar and were fugitives. We are astonished that he should have made such an observation. Does he not know why? Does he not know that the Government whose subjects he favours in a most gross manner violated the sovereignty of the Crown, and by such acts of violence made flight the only resource of the Confederates? Reading

Mr. Seward's apologetic despatch and Judge Stewart's decision together, we arrive at the following conclusions:—

If the Chesapeake was forfeited at all it was forfeited to the British Government; but though the United States Government has no right to demand its restoration, it is presented to the Federals to punish the Confederates.

That if the Confederates ever so slightly violate the law they are to be remorselessly punished; but if the Federals violate the law ever so grossly an apology is to be accepted, and moreover they are to gain the object for which they trampled on the dignity and rights of the Crown.

The following letter, which deserves a place among the curiosities of political literature, was read by Earl Russell in his place in the Lords on Tuesday night. It will be remembered that the case was first brought to public attention by the excitement produced in Queenstown by the open enlistment of seventeen men for a Federal frigate, and by the publication, in the Times, of the depositions of two rejected applicants, who failed to "pass the doctor," and who described the modus operandi of enlistment to be precisely the same as it would be on any war vessel in a port of its own nationality. Imagine the captain of a man-of-war, who is unconscious of seventeen men coming on board, "passing the doctor," donning the uniform of his service (in which, with truly Yankee wit, they were some weeks after returned to shore) and receiving rations. Admire also the delicate irony of his keeping them out of "temptation" at Brest. We wonder, when the Foreign Secretary apologised for this meek specimen of injured innocence in the shape of a Yankee captain, whether he did not edify the House of Lords with a grimace, not very appropriate in such a place or from such a person, but pre-eminently suitable to the subject. Here is the letter:—

United States' Steamer, Kearsage, at Sea, Dec. 7.

Sir,—A party of men, either by connivance of the crew or otherwise, were concealed on board this vessel on the night of her departure from Queenstown, the 5th ult. These men, I learn, were in expectation of being enlisted in the service of the United States after the Kearsage had proceeded to sea, but found their mistake. To have turned them ashore at Brest would have been to open to them the temptation to enlist on board the Florida. I therefore detained to have them at Queenstown as soon as it was practicable. You will please notify Admiral Jones that I informed him that no enlistments would be made at Queenstown. I have, therefore, sent on shore this party, that no charge of subterfuge may be alleged in the premises.—Very respectfully, your obedient servant, Jno. A. Winslow, Captain.

E. G. Eastman, Esq.,
United States Consul, Queenstown.

The Supreme Court of the United States has given judgment in the case of Mr. Vallandigham. The Court was asked to quash the proceedings of the military commission on the pleas that Mr. Vallandigham was not in the military service of the United States, and therefore not subject to martial law, that the military commission had exceeded its jurisdiction, and that the charges preferred against Mr. Vallandigham were not offences according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. Judge Wayne delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court, which refused the writ of certiorari on the ground that even if the arrest, trial, and punishment of Mr. Vallandigham were illegal, there was still no authority in the Court to grant relief in this mode, and that there is no law by which any appeal, or proceeding in the nature of an appeal, from a military commission to the Supreme Court can be taken. Thus the people of the North are subject to military jurisdiction, and no matter how illegal the arrest, trial, and punishment, there is no appeal or remedy.

The New York Herald asserts that President Lincoln will issue a proclamation of universal emancipation, including the Border States, on the 22nd inst.—Reuter.

General Banks, in an order dated the 3rd inst., re-establishes a system of compulsory negro labour in Louisiana, under specified conditions. He also declares that in the approaching State elections all persons in his department must vote for the Union candidates; that indifference will be treated as crime, and faction as treason.—The Times.

General Banks has issued an order at New Orleans, stating that it is the people's duty to assist in restoring the civil government. Indifference will be treated as a crime. Men refusing to defend their country with the ballot-box or cartridge-box have no claim to the benefits of liberty.

The New York journals consider the equivalent to compulsory voting.—Reuter.

These New York telegrams provoke a smile. It is a peculiarity of the American revolution, that amidst all the carnage and the other horrors that make the sacrifice of human life so enormously disproportionate, the incident of the drama is most welcome to grave and staid spirits. A murder, in a revolution, is a tragedy; Lincoln the lawful representative of the people is the most contemptible of men. Take away the bloodshed, the desolation of country, the ruined homesteads, the crimes committed by a necessarily savage fighting on a foreign soil for pay, for plunder, and for the gratification of those passions which are evoked by such a state of things where there is no restraining discipline, and the whole affair becomes a broad farce. In December the proclamation of the White House produced its effect, and before that earnest was two months old, fifty or another half million of men to spare, or to abolish. Or read the brave New York correspondent. We are told in vain for any precedent for such hideous nonsense, for such an overbearing avowal of hypocrisy. The Federal Government may throw away the flimsy veil with which it has hitherto endeavoured to conceal its purpose, and set forth its enormity without disguise. Mr. Lincoln is about to issue a proclamation of universal emancipation, and simultaneously he is proconsul in Louisiana promulgates an edict which subjects the freed negroes to enforced labour. An election is to take place, and General Banks notifies that men who abstain from voting, or who do not vote the Government ticket, will be treated as traitors. And the New York papers think, they are not sure about it, that this is equivalent to forced voting. We confess that all this does not incline us to mocking and derision. We cannot even for a moment forget the grave aspect of the case. We cannot close our eyes to the affliction which an inferior race is suffering under Yankee rule, nor to the political and social degradation of a people who three years ago were free and prosperous. It may be unavailing, but it is not less a duty to record the first fruits of the despotic Government that now dominates in the United States.

The Federal armies have succeeded in getting a large number of negroes under their control. To describe the fate of these unhappy creatures is impossible. The real and imputed horrors of the middle passage are as nothing compared to the sufferings of the negroes who, by the cruel fortune of war, have been placed under Federal rule. We are not writing from Southern but from Northern accounts. From every quarter we hear of destitution, disease, and a fearful mortality. To-day we publish a letter which describes to what vile uses Benjamin Butler applies the men, whilst he leaves their wives and families to starve and die. Butler, it seems, has succeeded in reviving the barbarous instinct of the negro, which it had taken nearly a century of Southern civilisation to restrain. In this task he is not alone. The negro men are taught that to murder the aged, and the helpless, and to commit offences that are worse than murder, is the way to gain the approval of their Yankee masters. The massacres, such as that at Beckham's Landing, which come to light, and also the hanging of the Yankee officers at Port Jackson, when the negro soldiers turned upon their teachers, show that the Federals are not sowing their devilish seed on barren ground. What becomes of the women cannot be dwelt upon; therefore, suffice it to say, that on the Federal banners is inscribed a licence to rape, and the Federal armies in the South include in their camp followers troops of prostituted negro women. There is a whisper—such things are only spoken with bated breath—there is a whisper that negro women are destroying their children—not their infants only—but children of larger growth, but yet too young to work. The reason for this is, that Federal commanders object to women accompanying the troops with incumbrances, and so it is said the incumbrances are got rid of. We shall be glad if this rumour prove false. With out this horrible climax the condition of the freed negroes is so sad and deplorable, that we suppose no one out of New England can think of it without loathing the authors and perpetrators of such wickedness. And the excuse has been emancipation. Already even that poor apology is given up; General Banks has decreed that the negroes in his department shall be forced to labour. Who, after this, will dare to assert that the Federal armies give freedom to the coloured race, even in name? It may be, and we think it is true, that negroes will not work of their own free will. But will anyone say that Yankee military slavery is preferable to the domestic institution in the South. General Banks's order has a two-fold object: on the one hand, it is hoped that something may be extorted from negro labour to gratify the cupidity of the invaders; and, on the other hand, it is hoped that by keeping the negroes separated on different plantations, and by making them labour, they may be deprived of the time and opportunity for organising a revolt against their ruthless oppressors. It is not improbable that both these expectations may be disappointed.

Whilst we compassionate the wretched condition of the Yankee negro slaves, we are struck by surprise at the readiness with which the white population in the North submits to a military despotism. Personal liberty exists no longer. The Supreme Court has just endorsed Mr. Lincoln's assumption of power by declaring in the case of Mr. Vallandigham that, whilst the war lasts the military overrides the civil authority; but still more remarkable is the way in which a tacit assent is given to the plans for renewing Mr. Lincoln's lease of power by unconstitutional means. A more barefaced fraud than the amnesty cannot be conceived. Mr. Lincoln himself confesses that it was a fraud by ordering a conscription of half a million of men. The amnesty is neither more nor less than an electioneering manœuvre, which will no doubt be effective, but which no government would have ventured on unless assured that it could trample openly and with impunity upon the rights and liberties of the people. Supposing that Mr. Lincoln could have induced a tenth part of the voters in any one of the Confederate States to return to the Union, it was a manifest violation of every principle of self-government to allow such a fraction to represent the whole population. It was also certain that as the elections could only take place under military authority, they would result in the choice of Mr. Lincoln's nominees. Few persons, however, were prepared for the extraordinary proceeding of the Federal commander in Louisiana. It was supposed either that the voters would be intimidated into supporting the Government candidates, or that in case of need Mr. Lincoln's creatures would tamper with the ballot boxes. But, instead, we find General Banks ordering people to vote the Government ticket under penalty of being treated as traitors. To refuse to vote is to be held as a crime, and he says, "Whoever is indifferent or hostile must chose between the liberty which foreign lands afford, the poverty of the rebel States, and the innumerable and inappreciable blessings which our Government affords." It must not be supposed that the Federal Government acts in this manner from choice. The Northern invaders are in an unexampled situation. They did not find any Union feeling in the South, and neither by bribes, threats or barbarity, have they been able to create any. New Orleans has been for nearly two years in Federal occupation, yet the hostility of its inhabitants has not diminished. The people have been beggared and persecuted, but their spirit is unbroken. With the utmost exertion General Banks, who requires 5,000, has only been able to get 1,400 names on the voting list, and it was sure that not a third of that small number would vote. Hence some strong measure was indispensable or Mr. Lincoln's game would be spoilt. Nolens volens the people must go to the polling-places, and as such forced voters were likely to vote en masse against the Government candidates, it was also necessary to decree the compulsory support of that side. General Banks's order is therefore a noteworthy and honourable testimony to the unanimity and unswerving patriotism of the Confederates.

It is altogether indifferent to the South who is the next Northern President, but if there is any choice it would fall on Mr. Lincoln, who has proved his weakness and incapacity. The South, then, is not affected by the means employed to secure Mr. Lincoln's re-election; but the apathy of the North is unaccountable. It was remarkable that the Federals submitted so easily to the loss of liberty, but that they consent to be openly cheated out of the Presidential election is inexplicable. They do not deserve any commiseration, for they have the power, if they had the spirit, to resist the imposition. With the oppression of the negroes it is different. The coloured race is no match for the Yankee, and its sufferings excite the warmest sympathy in the South, as they will do throughout the civilised world. May the day soon dawn when the Confederates will roll back the tide of invasion, and rescue their faithful servitors, who have been and are to them as children, from the cruel oppression of their enemy.

It is stated that a number of Federal officers, including the notorious Colonel Streight, have escaped from Richmond. Some were retaken, but eighteen are reported to have reached the Federal lines.

The New York World explains the purpose of the expedition to Florida. "The conquest of Florida will do no more to put down the rebellion than would the occupation of Yucatan or Coney Island. The object is political. Florida has been marked out as one of the rotten-borough States which is to help to make Mr. Lincoln President."

The steamers Hatfield, Spunkie, Dee, Jenny, Emily, and Fanny are reported to have been destroyed, and the City of Petersburg, captured off Wilmington. The Cumberland has been captured whilst entering, and the Dearleigh destroyed whilst leaving, Mobile harbour.

Mr. Lincoln has declared the blockade of Brownsville, Texas, to be discontinued.

In New York the fluctuations in the price of gold have been considerable, owing to the announcement that Mr. Chase is to be authorised to sell gold in the market, provided he keeps constantly on hand a sufficient amount to pay the interest on the national debt. As Mr. Chase has sold gold without permission this authorisation will not make much practical difference. A bill introduced by Senator Sherman to prohibit speculative sales in gold will not, it is supposed, be passed. The price of gold in Wall-street on the 16th February reached 61¼ per cent. premium. It then fell to 58, and on the 19th February was quoted at 59 per cent. premium.

A letter from our Richmond correspondent, of the 8th February, will appear in our next number.

ENGLAND.

It is now definitely settled that the great annual review and sham fight of the Volunteers of England will take place on Easter Monday next in the neighbourhood of Guildford, in the county of Surrey. An application was first made to Lord Lovaine, as Lord of the Manor of Farley-heath, for the use of that tract of land for the purpose, but his lordship refused to acquiesce in the proposition. Thereupon Lord Truro turned to Lord Grantley, who is lord of the western part of Blackheath, and succeeded in gaining the desired permission. Lord Truro, Mr. Buxton, M.P., and other gentlemen have surveyed the ground, and consider it in all respects suitable to the plan of the day's manœuvres.

The general annual meeting of the National Rifle Association was held on Saturday last at Willis's Rooms, and His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as President, occupied the chair. Earl Ducie, Earl Grosvenor, Lords Elcho, Bury, and Coleville, General Hay, Sir John Burgoyne, G.C.B., Colonel M'Murdo, and other distinguished gentlemen and officers, were present.

His Royal Highness, in opening the proceedings, congratulated the meeting on the prosperous state of the association. The income for 1863 had been £12,004, and the prizes given had been 332 in number and of the value of £4,386. There had been an addition of £1,000 last year in the prizes to the Long Enfield classes. The funded property amounted to £1,209. The entries of competitors for the prizes last year had been 2,739 showing an increase of 1,500 on the year 1862. The National Association had now connected with it 31 county and 14 colonial associations. There had been a difficulty about uniformity in the musketry practice of the various corps, but in accordance with suggestions from the War-office, a committee of the council had been appointed to consider the matter. After the adoption of the report of the council, discussions ensued with reference to the sighting of rifles and the system of targets to be used this year at Wimbledon. The concentric targets were supported by Lord Elcho and opposed by General Hay. At the close of the debate the vice-presidents and members of the council were re-elected, and the Duke of Cambridge was chosen president for the fifth time. The duke, in returning thanks, supported General Hay's view, holding that although great delicacy of shooting was produced by the concentric system of targets, yet that for the practical purposes of war, the oblong target would bring about the most effective shooting.

The Lord Bishop of London has been appointed by the Board of Ecclesiastical Commissions for England to be the Episcopal Member of their "Estates Committee," in the room of the Bishop of Winchester, who retires.

The Lord Bishop of London has invited the clergy of the Diocese of London to meet him in Willis's Rooms this day. He proposes to lay before them the collected statistics respecting the spiritual wants of London, and to consult them as to the best mode of enlisting the sympathy of their parishioners in the efforts now making to supply those wants. Systematic and combined exertion can, as he affirms, alone (under God's blessing) meet the great difficulties of the situation.

A declaration, by way of protest or answer to the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of "Essays and Reviews" is in course of circulation for signature among the English clergy. This document has been put forth by a committee appointed for the purpose at a meeting held at Oxford. The members of that committee were seven in number, namely, Archdeacon Clerke, Archdeacon Denison, Drs. Cotton, Miller, Leighton, and Pusey, and Mr. W. R. Fremantle, the rector of Claydon. The declaration in effect states that "the undersigned presbyters and deacons in holy orders of the Church of England and Ireland hold it their duty to declare their firm belief that the Church of England and Ireland, in common with the whole Catholic Church, maintains without reserve or qualification the inspiration and Divine authority of the whole canonical Scriptures, as not only containing but being the Word of God; and further, teach in the words of our Blessed Lord that the punishment of the cursed, equally with the life of the righteous, is everlasting."

Sir Moses Montefiore has returned from his mission to the Emperor of Morocco, in Her Majesty's ship Magicienne, to Gibraltar. His efforts on behalf of the Jews in that empire have been fully successful, and an Imperial edict has been published under which the position of the Jews will be very greatly improved.

The trades societies of London have caused a deputation of delegates to wait on the Right Hon. Viscount Palmerston to urge the importance of opening public museums and picture galleries to the people on Sundays. About sixty societies of 50,000 members in all were represented. The head of the deputation said that the delegates attended to advocate the opening of the museums and picture galleries, especially the British Museum and the National Gallery, on Sunday. Kew Gardens, Hampton Court, and similar places were open, nd the principle should be extended to places more easy of access. Lord Palmerston said that, speaking as an individual, he agreed with most of the views expressed by the delegation; but that in the country and the House of Commons there was much difference of opinion. In fact, he had no doubt that as soon as the knowledge of that deputation got abroad he should be favoured with another on the opposite side. He could not hold out any hope that the Government would interfere, but he would advise the men before him to enlighten public opinion and thereby attain their object.

On Saturday last Her Majesty the Queen received deputations from the Corporation of London and from the Court of Lieutenancy at Windsor Castle. The principal members of these bodies constituted the deputations, and presented addresses of congratulation to the Queen on the birth of the infant Prince. The city of Edinburgh and the city of Dublin were also represented by the Lord Povost and the Lord Mayorof the latter, from whom also Her Majesty received addresses. The English Presbyterian ministers in and around London and Westminster also presented an address. In each case the principal members of the deputations had the honour of kissing Her Majesty's hand. On Monday similar addresses from the cities of London, Dublin, Edinburgh, and York, were presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House.

On the 1st day of March the jewelled national token from South Wales to the Princess of Wales, was presented to Her Royal Highness at Marlborough House, by the Countess Dowager of Dunraven, Lady Llanover, Lady Frances Pratt, and Lady Jane Walsh. The jewels consist of a badge in emeralds and diamonds, with the leek surmounted by a bouquet composed of trefoil, oak, wheat, and mistletoe, and the motto in Welsh, "From South Wales to her Princess." Also of a bracelet with fine emeralds and diamond centre, the leek in pearls, emeralds and diamonds composing the band, with the motto in Welsh, "God preserve the Princess." The casket is richly mounted in gold.

On the same day an offering to the Princess of Wales from the province of North Jutland was presented by M. de Bille, the Danish Minister. Also an offering of a richly sculptured silver vase from the Danish inhabitants of London, by a committee of Danish gentlemen.

On the same day Lord Harris presented to Her Royal Highness three offerings from South Australia:

1. A flower-stand composed of fine emu's eggs, set in pure gold and supported by a pedestal of pure gold, from the ladies of the State of Victoria.

2. A casket richly wrought in pure silver, from Sir James F. Palmer, President of the Legislative Council of Victoria.

3. A casket formed of a large emu's egg set in pure gold, supported by a pedestal of pure gold, from the ladies of South Australia.

An armour-plated frigate, the property of the Danish Government, was launched last week from the building-yard of Messrs. I. and G. Thompson, at Govan. She is 280 feet long, of 3500 tons burthen, and 600 horse-power; she is covered from stem to stern with armour-plates four and a-half inches thick, upon a strong backing of teak and iron plating. The frigate will not, however, be permitted to leave this country pending hostilities between Denmark and the German Powers. Explanations of the conduct of the Government will be found in our Parliamentary intelligence.

The English Channel is rapidly being converted into an important theatre of war. On Monday a Danish corvette was seen twelve miles S.S.W. of Eddystone, steering across the track of six merchantmen going up the Channel. The Federal war-steamer Kearsage is at anchor off Boulogne, taking in coals. She is supposed to be watching the Confederate war steamer Rappahannock, which is still undergoing repairs at Calais.

From the papers laid before Parliament with respect to the affair of the ship Saxon, it appears that the American ship Vanderbilt was not guilty of any breach of neutrality in seizing the Saxon within one mile and a half of Angra Pequina, for that island does not belong to the British crown. Sir George Grey, the late Governor of the Cape, had proclaimed the island as British territory shortly before his departure for New Zealand, but the proclamation was never ratified. It further appears that Earl Russell has, through Lord Lyons, demanded compensation for the owners of the coal seized by the Vanderbilt, and has remonstrated against the conduct of the officer in taking the coal by force. An inquiry has also been demanded of all the circumstances attending the murder of Mr. Gray, with compensation for his widow and children.

Warren Quinsey, alias Wilson, and G. P. M'Murdoch, alias Kelly, were brought up last week at the Liverpool police-court, on a charge of piracy. On the 10th November last the schooner L. Gerity sailed from Matamoras for New York, having on board a cargo of cotton, valued at more than $60,000, and six passengers, two of whom were the prisoners. On the 17th November the passengers rose and seized the ship, killed the steward, and steered to Brownsville. The vessel was by her captors named the Eureka, and as such sailed for Belize, where the captors, under the British flag, entered the port, and sold the vessel and cargo for $70,000. The captain of the schooner came to England, and, under the Extradition Treaty, arrested the prisoners at Liverpool. They had with them some property belonging to the captain of the L. Gerity in their possession, and were armed with six-barrelled revolvers.

In the early part of the year 1856 a gentleman of the name of George Nuthall, who resided at Matlock, in the county of Derby, died, possessed of considerable landed estates and other property, and by a will executed about two years before his death he bequeathed the larger portion of the same to his cousin John Nuthall, a contractor in the metropolis. Mr. George Nuthall was a man of eccentric habits, not much addicted to company of any kind. His housekeeper, with whom he was on very friendly terms, was one Catherine Marsden. He had, moreover, a friend of the name of John Else, whom he had educated from boyhood, for whom he had conceived a strong attachment, and who resided in a house belonging to the testator, situated but a short distance from that occupied by George Nuthall.

A short time previous to his death the testator made an appointment with his solicitor, Mr. Newbold, for the purpose of making some alterations in the bequests of his will, but at that time Mr. Newbold was unable to attend. The meeting, therefore, was put off to a subsequent date. Meanwhile, George Nuthall fell ill, and was unable to explain the contemplated changes. His death speedily ensued, and there was no reason for supposing that he had in any way altered or revoked the disposition of his property as set out in the will.

On the day of George Nuthall's death the will was found in the cupboard of the room in which he died. On the day of the funeral a second search brought to light a duplicate will, which, however, contained an interlineation, the purport of which was to give an additional legacy to John Else and Catherine Marsden. The testator's papers were carefully searched upon that occasion, and the principal portion of them was conveyed to the office of Mr. Newbold, the solicitor, and the rest, which were composed of highway books and other matters, were given to Mr. Else, for he had succeeded the testator in the duties of overseer of highways. A short period after the death of the testator Mr. John Nuthall also died, leaving a family. After the lapse of about nine months Mr. Else produced a codicil, which he stated that he had found among those papers of Mr. George Nuthall which had been brought over to him at the time of the funeral, and by that codicil he took a portion of the landed estates of which Mr. G. Nuthall had died possessed, and Catherine Marsden also was further benefited by the same. This codicil, together with the will, was admitted to probate, and two persons, named Gregory and Buxton, who were the attesting witnesses, swore positively to the due execution of the same. Nine months after the finding of the first codicil, John Else, who had occasion to search some of the papers of George Nuthall which at the time of the funeral had been handed to Mr. Newbold, found, as he declared, another codicil pinned in a common account-book. Under this new codicil John Else took a very large interest in the property of Mr. George Nuthall, as did also Catherine Marsden. Dr. Adams, a respectable surgeon residing at Matlock, and a Mr. Knowles, were the attesting witnesses, and swore to their own signatures and to that of the testator. This codicil, therefore, was also admitted to probate. Nine months afterwards John Else produced a third codicil, attested by Adams and Knowles, and drawn principally in favour of himself and Catherine Marsden. He found this last codicil secreted in a hole in a wall under a window-sill in the house of George Nuthall. At last, the suspicions of the executors of the will of John Nuthall were aroused, and they determined to dispute the validity of the three codicils and of the interlineation in the will, and boldly asserted that all these documents were forgeries. The matter having been thrown in Chancery, the Master of the Rolls ordered an issue to be tried as to the validity of these contested documents, and on the same coming on before Chief Justice Erle and a special jury of the county of Derby, the jury decided that the codicils were genuine. The verdict, however, was not satisfactory in the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, and he ordered another trial. The result of this trial was that the jury, under the direction of the Lord Chief Baron, found a verdict for the defendant; in other words, they found that the codicils and interlineation were forgeries. The Master of the Rolls having refused a third trial, and the Lords Justices being divided in opinion, the case was taken to the House of Lords, and their lordships unanimously decided that a new trial should be granted. Last week, then, the new trial came on for hearing before the Chief Justice of England and a special jury of the city of London. On behalf of the plaintiffs it was strenuously insisted that the positive oaths of the four attesting witnesses must prevail against the vague impossibilities and theories put forward by the defendants, and that if the jury found a verdict for the defendants they must necessarily find the four witnesses guilty of perjury, and Else guilty of perjury, forgery, and subornation of perjury. On the other side, these astounding facts were conclusively proved—that the testator was a man of education and ability and could spell accurately, whereas the codicils were full of gross blunders, such as the testator could hardly by any possibility have made. The counsel relied especially on the word "daughter," which, though spelt accurately in the will and in all the examined writings of the testator, in the codicils was spelt "Doughter," while John Else invariably wrote "Doughter." Moreover, many documents in the admitted handwriting of John Else were produced, and in them "Daughter" invariably appeared as "Doughter." Great stress was also laid on a very peculiar discrepancy observable in the crossing of the letter "t," and other differences detected by the experts. The peculiar intervals of time that elapsed between the several discoveries, the odd places in which the codicils were hid, and the finding of all by the individual supremely interested in the revelation, formed a combination of powerful improbabilities against the validity of the codicils.

After a trial of eight days in duration the jury found a verdict setting aside the three codicils and the interlineation in the duplicate will. In other words, the jury found that the disputed documents were forgeries effected by John Else.

Such was the result of a series of litigation which, whether regarded as developing a story of marvellous romance, or as illustrating the extent to which legal proceedings may be carried, is unparalleled in the annals of modern causes.

By the latest advices we learn that New Zealand has advanced so far in the path of civilisation as to institute a national debt. The Government has proposed a loan for £3,000,000, and expects that it will be guaranteed by the Home Government. It is to be redeemable in fifty years by a sinking fund. Roads, lighthouses, the suppression of the rebellion, and the planting of settlers on the lands of the evicted tribes will absorb that sum. It has also been determined to remove the seat of government from Auckland to some place in Cooks' Straits.

CONTINENT.

The distrust we last week expressed as to the settlement of the Dano-German quarrel by a Conference has been fully justified. The probability is that the Conference will never meet. It may be taken as certain that if it does it will arrive at no satisfactory conclusion. Austria and Prussia have only accepted the English proposition conditionally. Denmark postpones her determination. France may consent to take part in the deliberations, but she throws no cordiality into her assent.

Meanwhile military operations seem to have been entirely suspended. The allies are waiting for more men and material before they make their grand assault upon Düppel. Jutland has not been evacuated, but the Prussians have not advanced beyond Kolding. As will be seen by our Parliamentary Notes, the Prussian Government repudiates the act, but means to retain all the advantage of it. The officer who crossed the frontier has been reprimanded, but he is to hold the position he had taken because it has considerable strategical importance. The Danish Government has declared the whole east coast of Sleswig and Holstein blockaded, and a Danish force has occupied the island of Fehmern, which lies to the extreme east of Holstein and belongs to that duchy. Supported by Danish gunboats, the Danes occupy here a position which the allies may find inconvenient.

An Austrian naval force has been ordered to the English Channel to protect German commerce, and the Prussian "fleet" is being equipped in hot haste. Unfortunately the Danish navy now bears no proportion to that of former days. It has never recovered the blow England struck it in 1807. A victim then, and again in 1815 to her fidelity to France, Denmark is a victim now to her faith in the promises of England, France, Russia, and Sweden.

Austria and Prussia are not at all daunted by the big words of the Wurzburgers. They succeeded in the last sitting of the Diet in rejecting the two most dangerous of Herr von der Pfordten's proposals—those declaring the Treaty of London invalid; the refusal to receive the Danish Minister, and the instructions to the Committee to report as soon as possible upon the succession question without taking the Treaty of London as a basis, were carried. They have, moreover, proposed that the Federal troops in Holstein should be placed under the commander of the Austro-Prussian army in the duchies, and that they should appoint commissioners to administer the government of Holstein—apparently not to supersede the Saxon and Hanover commissioners, but to act with them—a distinction without any real difference.

It is said that the Austrian and Prussian Governments have a perfect understanding as to their policy towards the duchies, and that Austria, who objected to the invasion of Jutland, has been satisfied by the explanation of General Manteuffel. A deputation of Slesvigers has been received both by the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Austria. William the First gave them an answer of the sympathetic non-committal sort he gave the Kiel professors. Francis Joseph told them that lasting satisfaction would be given to the just claims of their country, but that Providence had imposed upon him duties which he could not permit desires threatening the general peace to override. The prospects of the Pretender do not improve; the middle and minor States, which are ready to recognise him and go to war to put him in possession, can do nothing against Austria and Prussia. And whatever the great German Powers may intend, the elevation of the Pretender to the throne of Slesvig Holstein is not at present among their schemes.

The Danes have not lost a jot of their courage and determination. In reply to an Address presented to him the King said, "I will admit of no abolition of the existing political connection between the kingdom and Slesvig. I wish to be a free king over a free people. A king is only free when his country is independent, and when the constitutional condition is maintained and developed."

Upon the proposition of the Minister of War General de Meza has been dismissed from the army, and General Gerlach has been appointed commander-in-chief. The dismissal of de Meza seems a singular proceeding. According to the reports of impartial witnesses he did everything possible under the circumstances.

Count Hamilton, the Swedish Minister at Copenhagen, has been recalled at his own request. Before the death of Frederick VII., the Count had negotiated with the Danish Government a treaty of alliance, by which Sweden undertook to aid Denmark in repelling Federal Execution. A far greater wrong has been done to Denmark, and the Swedish Government refuses to enter into this alliance. This is one more of the benefits for which the Danes have to thank the English Government.

It is said that there is a ministerial crisis at Copenhagen, that the Ministers are divided upon the question whether concessions should be made or the war continued vigorously. According to the same report, M. Quaade, the Foreign Minister, has resigned.

The elections to the Corps Législatif for the two seats vacant for Paris are fixed for the 20th March.

M. Pietri is dead. He was a warm Napoleonist, and has rendered the Emperor considerable services. He was for several years Prefect of Police, and organised the plébiscite by which Savoy and Nice were annexed to France. He was a senator, and about 54 years old.

The news from Mexico continues to be very favourable.

The trial of the prisoners charged with the conspiracy against the Emperor's life terminated with their conviction. Their guilt was clearly brought home, and, indeed, was admitted by them. Greco and Trabuco were condemned to transportation for life. Imperatori and Scaglioni to twenty years' imprisonment. The Procureur Imperial created considerable sensation by announcing that the house to which Mazzini had directed his letters to be sent was that of an English member of Parliament. The address given by Mazzini was M. Flower, 35, Thurlow-square, Brompton. The subject was introduced into the Senate without the slightest relevancy by MM. Le Verrier and Boissy, and England was abused most vehemently as a den of assassins. If the indignant senators had known that the member of Parliament was also a member of the Government their fury would have been even greater. Mr. Stansfeld, a lord of the Admiralty and a friend of Mazzini, resides at 35, Thurlow-square. It will be seen by the Parliamentary Notes that Mr. Stansfeld indignantly repudiates, both for himself and Mazzini, any part in the conspiracy. Mr. Stansfeld will, of course, be absolved by everybody.

Whilst an Austrian army is fighting for German nationality in Slesvig, the Austrian Government finds it necessary to proclaim Galicia in a state of siege, and adopt the most rigorous measures against the Poles contending for their nationality. It would seem that a most dangerous revolutionary organisation exists in Galicia, and that the Austrian Government, if it means to retain the province, must resort to the same severe measures which have been applied in Russian Poland. This revolutionary organisation exists also, it is said, in Posen, Silesia, and Western Prussia, and the Prussian Government will probably have to employ most energetic means in these provinces. Even in Russian Poland the insurgents are not yet annihilated, and the secret National Government continues to send forth its orders, and, although upon a smaller scale, raises taxes and strikes down its enemies.

The Belgian ministerial crisis is over; the Catholics would not undertake to form a ministry, and the old Administration retains power. The King has consequently been at last able to carry out his intention of visiting England.

The Italian Parliament is discussing the ministerial project for the reorganisation of the land tax.

The Minister of the Interior has brought forward a measure of very great importance. He proposes to suppress all monastic establishments and convert the property to the uses of the State, paying the inmates pensions varying from 600 to 150 francs a year. The number of convents to be suppressed is about 2400, belonging to more than 80 religious orders, with nearly 65,000 members.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

AMERICA.—DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE ABOUT THE STEAM RAMS.

On Thursday night the House of Lords was treated to a most extraordinary specimen of ministerial evasion and forgetfulness. The Earl of Derby complained of papers being refused in one House and granted in the other, and that such a course destroyed that confidence between the Government and Parliament, which induced members to abstain from discussion when a minister announced upon his own responsibility that the production of papers asked for would be injurious to the public service. The papers in the case of the Saxon were refused in the House of Commons and promised in the House of Lords. But the case to which the Earl of Derby particularly called the attention of their lordships was, that when he asked for the correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Federal States respecting injuries to Federal commerce apprehended from vessels that might leave British ports—that is, the diplomatic correspondence relating to the steam rams in the Mersey—Earl Russell refused to produce it on the plea that the law officers of the Crown had advised that it would affect injuriously an action still pending in a court of law. The noble earl did not assent to the argument of the Foreign Secretary, but he deferred to his position, and did not press for the papers. Yet it had been since announced by the Government that the correspondence thus refused would be laid upon the table of the House of Commons. The Earl of Derby wanted to know whether Earl Russell was still of opinion that the production of the correspondence laid before the United States Congress and promised to the House of Commons, would be injurious to the public service, or if not, whether Earl Russell could inform the House "what has occurred since the last discussion to effect a revolution of opinion quite as rapid and complete as that which the noble Earl Russell) has stated to have occurred as to the detention of the steam rams between the 1st and 3rd September."

Earl Russell replied that the noble Earl (Derby) did not "correctly remember the facts of the discussion to which he alludes." He (Earl Russell) had not stated that the production of the correspondence between the two Governments would be dangerous, but that it was the opinion of the Attorney-General that it would lead to an injurious discussion in the House of Commons. It was the Attorney-General who had made the objection, but upon reconsideration his learned friend had come to the conclusion "that the papers could not be produced entirely without mischief, but without all the mischief which he apprehended. The objection of the Attorney-General being waived my (Earl Russell's) objection is waived too, because I have no other objection than that which he stated." His lordship added, "at the same time, I think it very probable that the production of these papers will have some mischievous and bad consequences attached to it."

[This answer is, as our readers will see, altogether at variance with the statements made by Earl Russell on the 10th and 12th February. On the 10th, the Earl of Derby said, "I have seen elsewhere that a considerable amount of correspondence has taken place upon another subject, namely, the remonstrances made as to injuries apprehended or sustained by American commerce from vessels sailing from British ports. I wish to know whether the Government are prepared to lay upon the table that correspondence as well as the despatches relating to the Alabama." To this Earl Russell replied, "If the noble earl refers to any discussions with the American Government about the ironclads at Birkenhead, I can only say that as that matter is about to be brought before a court of law I shall object to produce that correspondence." Here we have from Earl Russell an emphatic declaration that he will not produce the diplomatic correspondence about the steam rams because the matter is under judicial investigation. On the 12th the Earl of Derby, in the hope of inducing the Foreign Secretary to reconsider this answer returned to the subject, and at great length explained that the prosecution of Messrs. Laird was a municipal affair, that it did not relate to international law, that no foreign Power could have any authority in it, and that consequently the case could not be affected by the production of a diplomatic correspondence with the United States. To this Earl Russell replied, "Upon every consideration, upon the opinion of the law-officers of the Crown, and upon the best judgment I can form, I say it would be prejudicial to the course of justice if I were to produce the papers." Yet on the 23rd February Sir George Grey informed the House of Commons that "the Government were ready" to produce these very papers; and that they only objected to produce the correspondence with Messrs. Laird, which, be it observed, Earl Derby had not pressed for. The explanation is easy. If Sir George Grey had not made that announcement just before the division on Mr. Fitzgerald's motion the Government would have been beaten; but this explanation does not remove the Earl of Derby's cause of complaint.]

Lord Chelmsford asked when the Attorney-General had communicated his change of mind to Earl Russell, and why, as from what took place in the House of Commons on the 23rd, it must have been known for some time before that there was no objection to produce the papers, the House of Lords had not been informed "at the earliest moment that a portion of the papers moved for would be given."

Earl Russell replied [we must quote his lordship's words, for it is utterly impossible to show that they have any relation to Lord Chelmsford's inquiry], "I consider the communication between the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General a privileged communication, and shall decline to say when it was made." The Earl of Derby summed up the discussion by observing, "The noble earl has just made out my case, unless he can inform us what was the precise period at which the Attorney-General changed his mind. The noble earl has, in fact, admitted that without any ground, papers refused in the House of Commons have been granted in the House of Lords." [The noble earl here referred to the case of the Saxon.]

The Earl of Carnarvon expressed his surprise to hear from Earl Russell that it would take "two months or upwards" to prepare the promised list of claims made on the United States Government by British subjects, as he believed that "it would be contained in one or two sheets of foolscap."

THE SEIZURE OF THE "TUSCALOOSA."

In reply to Mr. Peacocke, Lord Palmerston stated in the House of Commons on Thursday last that the Tuscaloosa was seized on instructions forwarded to the Cape founded on a former supposed condition of things. When these instructions arrived the Tuscaloosa had departed, but on her return the Governor, acting on them, had seized her. "Upon further representations, however, and a full consideration of the case, it has been determined that there are no proper grounds internationally for seizing her, and orders have been sent out to set her at liberty."

Lord Cecil asked if any compensation would be given for the injury. Lord Palmerston parried the inquiry with a joke, telling Lord Cecil that he must give notice of the question.

On Friday, in reply to Mr. Peacocke, Lord Palmerston declined to explain the instructions that had been sent out to the Cape, but said the Government would produce the papers, which fully detailed them.

FEDERAL RECRUITING IN IRELAND.

The Marquis of Clanricarde moved for copies of any reports that might have been received by Her Majesty's Government, respecting recruiting in Ireland for the Federal army. After commenting on the serious character of the offence, and its notoriety, his lordship remarked that the Irish constabulary were honest and intelligent, and could not have failed to report to the Government what was going on. Besides, Earl Russell had incidentally adverted to the subject in his correspondence with Mr. Adams. The returns of the Emigration Commissioners also furnished additional evidence. The marquis referred to the case of a man who arrived at Galway and engaged men ostensibly for railroad works in America, but who was really recruiting for the Federal army. This man was arrested, and it came out that he was an Irishman who had been in the Federal service, who was wounded, and returned to his native country on the pretext of enrolling labourers for the construction of railroads. This man did not refer to a commercial firm, but to the American Consul at Liverpool. How did the United States act towards England in 1855? The British Consul at New York thought there was no harm in paying the travelling expenses of British subjects, who wished to return home to enlist in the army and navy. The Supreme Court, however, decided that the words of the Act, "hire and retain," were susceptible of a very broad interpretation, and met the case. The United States Government withdrew the exequaturs from our consuls, and insisted upon the removal of Mr. Crampton, the British Minister at Washington. Yet this was a very different matter from enlisting foreign subjects as the Federals are doing in Ireland. His lordship then referred to the case of the Kearsarge, and to the distribution of Federal uniforms in Ireland. "If the Confederates had done one-tenth of what the Federals have done, it would have been put a stop to long ago. But the neutrality of Her Majesty's Government has been from the first a partial neutrality."

Earl Russell did not deny that enlisting soldiers in Ireland for the United States was a serious offence, but he could not proceed without evidence. He said that, as he understood, the Marquis of Clanricarde argued, "that because the American Government acted improperly in 1855, therefore we ought to act improperly now." [This was greeted with cries of Oh, oh!] One case had been presented to the law officers of the Crown, but they advised that the evidence was not sufficient. His lordship said, "My noble friend must perceive that even although it could be proved that many of those young men are arriving in New York, tempted by the large bounty offered to them, many enter the army of the United States, yet if they go from this country without any contract to enter the army, if they go for the purpose of obtaining good employment and good wages, and wait till their arrival in New York to decide whether they will be railway labourers or soldiers, there can be no ground for a prosecution under the Foreign Enlistment Act." [It did not occur to Earl Russell that men who emigrate under contract to do railway work, who have their passage paid, and who receive a handsome bounty, are not quite free to choose their career.] Respecting the Kearsage, his lordship read a letter from the commander of the vessel, which we reproduce in our American Notes. In the same part of our impression will be found some comments on his lordship's assertion that British subjects are oppressed in the Confederacy, and that the British Consuls have been driven out of the Confederacy.

The Earl of Donoughmore compared the conduct of the Government about the steam rams, and about Federal recruiting in Ireland. In the one case Earl Russell did not wait for the advice of the law officers but acted on suspicion; but in the other he had adopted a different policy. Was it because his lordship is friendly to the North, or that he did not care what became of the poor Irish people? The Earl of Donoughmore said he should like to hear from the Government if their attention had been called to the "Fenian" brotherhood? [As we are informed it was, in the first instance, by Mr. Adams.] It might be a contemptible scheme, "but when men were enlisted in the service of a foreign Government, were drilled, and received a military education, then, he thought, not so much in the interest of the State as in mercy to these deluded people, the Government ought to interfere."

Earl Granville said the attention of the police had been directed to the military drilling which was said to be going on in Ireland. He could not then give any detailed information, but he might observe that the police had arrived at the conclusion that the Fenian organisation "was a perfectly contemptible one."

The Marquis of Clanricarde would not press his motion, but he believed that if he had had the opportunity he could have proved that breaches of the Foreign Enlistment Act have been committed, "and he had been informed by a brother magistrate that, to his personal knowledge, men had been seduced from the ranks of the county militia, and were now serving in the United States army."

DENMARK.

On Thursday the Earl of Malmesbury asked Earl Russell to produce the correspondence of 1851 and 1852. There was a wide-spread ignorance of the facts of the case because all the public information had been solely derived "from garbled statements in German papers, from German pamphlets, and from extracts published by the French Foreign-office." He had received a letter from the brother of the Duke of Augustenburg, asking him to retract what he had stated in the House of Lords about the negotiations. He knew his statement was accurate, and therefore declined to retract it. If the correspondence he asked for was produced, it would put an end to mis-statements. Earl Russell said he should like to communicate privately with Earl Malmesbury, to ascertain how far the correspondence can be produced.

In the House of Commons on Friday, Mr. Griffith asked whether the Government had received information that, by order of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, numbers of the inhabitants and almost all the clergymen of Gravenstein and its neighbourhood had been arrested as spies, and a warning issued to the inhabitants, complaining of their Danish sympathies, and informing them that all those arrested as spies in future would be executed; and whether such treatment of the loyal inhabitants of an invaded country was in accordance with the modern usages of war among civilised nations. Lord Palmerston replied the Government had no such information.

In reply to Mr. Forster, Mr. Layard said no formal notice of the blockade had been given by Denmark; and he believed "there was no fixed period for giving notice. A reasonable period was generally allowed between notice and seizure."

In reply to Mr. M'Evoy, Mr. Layard said that under the Treaty of London Her Majesty's Government were not called upon to interfere. Respecting the guarantee of 1720, the Government were of opinion that the case anticipated by that instrument had not arisen. He understood that an application had been made to France for assistance, and that the French Government had not felt called upon to give an opinion. He had no information as to the alleged offer of the Government of Italy to assist Denmark.

Respecting the Conference, Lord Palmerston said Austria and Prussia had agreed to it without an armistice; he believed France was willing to join it, and he fancied Russia was likewise disposed to do so. He was not quite sure about Sweden, and no answer had come from Denmark. Respecting the invasion of Jutland, Lord Palmerston said that on a representation being made at Berlin, the Government was informed that the advance to Kolding was against positive instructions, and that the commander of the forces would be reprimanded; but "it appears that the occupation of that place being of great strategical value for the security of the allied forces in Slesvig, the occupation will nevertheless be continued." [This was received with shouts of laughter. To reprimand a commander for doing what was necessary for the security of his troops, and not to withdraw from the position, is very funny. But what followed was not less curious.] Lord Palmerston did not deny that the invasion of Jutland was an infraction of the guarantee of 1720, but he said that Austria and Prussia still acknowledged the validity of the Treaty of 1852, and the maintenance of the integrity of the Danish monarchy, and, therefore, a case had not arisen under the guarantee of 1720. [According to this, "words not deeds" is the motto of the British Cabinet. A practical violation of a treaty is not an offence, provided the aggressive Powers say they acknowledge the validity of the treaty.]

On Friday, in the House of Lords, Earl Russell, in reply to the Earl of Malmesbury, said the Prussian minister had stated informally that Austria and Prussia had intended to make the war local, and merely to take a material guarantee, but the Danish order to seize German ships made the war general; and if German ships were seized, the Prussian Government might have to occupy Jutland until compensation was given for the vessels and cargoes. He (Earl Russell) stated long ago, that though "a material guarantee" may sound something different from war, the Danish Government were not bound to regard the invasion of their territory in any other light than as an act of war, and would be justified in attacking Prussian ships and making war against them on the high seas.

The same evening, in the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston said the basis of the negotiations would be the integrity of the Danish monarchy. The German Diet had not answered the invitation to be present at the proposed Conference.

In the House of Commons on Friday, Mr. Disraeli made some inquiries respecting our relations with the continent of Europe. He had great distrust of a conference that did not include an armistice. In nine cases out of ten when conferences had been carried on during war they have failed. In this case he (Mr. Disraeli) had more than a theoretical objection, for Earl Russell, nine years ago, was the manager of the Conference at Vienna, pendente lite, and the noble earl failed. It appeared that the British Government had made various offers to France for joint notes and remonstrances and all that "diplomatic rubbish," but it appeared from a despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys that such propositions had been rejected, and seeing how the English Government had led France into difficulty in regard to Poland, the French Government was determined not to interfere unless the English Government was "prepared to proceed further and enter into a course of action." Perhaps France had now consented to the conference and he wanted to know on what terms. The Ministers state that the basis of negotiation is to be "the independence and integrity of Denmark." If that means a mere personal union between the kingdom and the duchies it will not result in peace but in anarchy. Or is Europe to interfere "and by force of arms to render the inhabitants of Holstein and Slesvig loyal and contented subjects of the King of Denmark? But that is a solution not consistent with British policy, nor in my mind, perfectly in harmony with the spirit of the age in which we live." Mr. Disraeli then observed that probably the Emperor of the French would be called upon to settle pending affairs, and possibly might renew the Confederation of the Rhine, or effect the rectification of the Saarlouis frontier. If the Government had been firm the difficulty would not have arisen. If the Government had not brought about an estrangement from France the integrity of Denmark would not have been in jeopardy. Respecting the papers laid before Parliament, the hon. gentleman remarked that he expected that in the recess other papers would be published by Denmark. A similar event had happened twice before to Earl Russell. The papers at present published do not throw any light on the conduct of the Government. In conclusion the hon. member said, "I hear nothing from Her Majesty's Government to guide, to enlighten, to animate the House and the country at the present moment. The drivers have lost the road, the reins have fallen from their hands, and the horses are wild."

Lord Palmerston taunted Mr. Disraeli with finding nothing in the Danish papers on which to found a charge against the Government, and with having to ransack Hansard, the Annual Register, and the blue-books of ten years ago. He thought the country was quite as well governed by the present Ministry as it would be by the Opposition leaders, if credit is to be given them for sincerity in the line of argument they have adopted. We are at peace, and Ministers are told they ought to declare war against Russia for Poland, and against Germany for Denmark. It was hard to please Mr. Disraeli. He complained of not having papers, and when he had them, complained that he was more than ever unable to come to a definite conclusion. The object of the Government had been to conciliate differences. Earl Russell was fruitful in expedients, and when one plan failed he tried another. He thought that this, which was charged against Earl Russell, was really a compliment to his noble friend.

Mr. Fitzgerald complained that Lord Palmerston did not give the information asked for by Mr. Disraeli. The noble lord defended the conduct of Earl Russell at the Vienna Conference, saying that all that occurred redounded to his credit, but "if that were so, the wonder was that the noble lord (Russell) left the Government in 1856." Mr. Fitzgerald also commented on a statement made by Lord Palmerston, that Mr. Disraeli was pursuing an unfair course in attacking an absent man (Earl Russell). "Did the noble lord mean to say that because a member of the Government was a peer therefore he was to be exempt from criticism in that House; and that when the leader of the Opposition rose to call attention to foreign affairs he was to curtail his remarks because the Foreign Minister was a peer, and, consequently, privileged from criticism?"

THE DANISH WAR STEAMER IN THE CLYDE.

Mr. Dalglish, adverting to the statement that a steamer of 3000 tons and 500-horse power, plated with 4½-inch armour from stem to stern, was just launched, and said to be the property of the Danish Goverment, asked whether the Government would seize her as they had seized the Pampero, or would permit her to sail from the Clyde? Mr. Layard replied that shortly before hostilities broke out, the Danish Minister informed Earl Russell that the vessel was being built, and offered to stop the fitting, if the Government wished it. Earl Russell thought it the best course, but at the request of the builders the vessel was finished and got off the stocks, the Danish minister giving his word that she should not leave the Clyde: and the vessel is "detained in this country until hostilities shall have ceased."

MAZZINI AND THE GRECO CONSPIRACY.

In the House of Lords on Monday, the Marquis of Westmeath said there was probably no legal evidence to convict Signor Mazzini of participation in the detestable conspiracy against the life of the Emperor Napoleon; but he hoped, if the Government had a moral conviction that Mazzini, or any one else in this country had been so implicated, they would take the matter up.

Earl Russell replied that without evidence the marquis had no right to say that Signor Mazzini or any other person was guilty of a crime, "and there being no such evidence, and no such powers vested in the executive, as the noble marquis seemed to suppose he, (Earl Russell) could only say that he did not mean to take any steps in reference to the subject." [It is only to oblige the United States Government that the British Foreign Secretary acts upon "moral conviction," or upon the statements of professional spies.]

A very lively scene in reference to the same affair took place in the House of Commons. Mr. James Stansfeld, M.P., for Halifax and a Junior Lord of the Admiralty has before now been charged with complicity in the designs or imputed designs of Italian revolutionists At the late trial in Paris the Procureur-General said, "He (Greco) was to write to that address in London if he was in want of money. It is as follows:—'Mr. Flower, 35, Thurlow-square, Brompton.' I searched the London Directory. At page 670 I found what I was looking for, and it was not without sadness that I recognised the name of a member of Parliament of England, who already had been in 1857 appointed to be the banker of the Tebaldi conspiracy against the Emperor's life." Mr. Stansfeld, lives at 35, Thurlow-square, and Mr. Cox wanted to know if the hon. gentleman's attention had been called to the foregoing pargraph.

Mr. Stansfeld expressed his intense indignation that the Crown Prosecutor of a friendly Power should imagine and venture to insinuate that a member of the British House of Commons and a minister of the Crown should be directly or indirectly implicated in attempts which, if serious, must merit the execration of mankind. He had known Signor Mazzini for 18 years, than whom no man has been "more cruelly and more shamefully maligned." He pledged his "personal knowledge" of Signor Mazzini that he is absolutely incapable of being concerned in such an attempt. He had made inquiries, and he was satisfied that if the case should be tried, the answer to it will be satisfactory in every respect.

Mr. Hennessy said Mr. Stansfeld had no right to defend Signor Mazzini without giving due notice that the subject was to be brought before the House. A few weeks since Signor Mazzini had written to the Times that Greco was "an enthusiastic patriot," yet it was admitted that Greco was a spy and a miscreant of the lowest order.

Mr. Stansfeld said he had no knowledge of letters addressed to "Mr. Flower." He did not know if Mr. Flower was Signor Mazzini. He had never acted as treasurer to a committee for the collection of money to be distributed to Italian patriots.

Lord C. Hamilton wanted to know if Mr. Fiore, the secretary of Signor Mazzini, is not the intimate friend of Mr. Stansfeld; and Mr. Alderman Rose asked if Signor Mazzini has not lived with Mr. Stansfeld. After a few remarks from Mr. Forster, defending Mr. Stansfeld, and Signor Mazzini, the conversation dropped.

THE TAXATION AND CONDITION OF IRELAND.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Colonel Dunne moved for a select committee to consider how far the taxation of Ireland is in accordance with the provisions of the Union, or just in reference to the resources of the country. In doing so, Colonel Dunne made an interesting statement. One of the conditions of the Union was that Ireland should contribute 2-17ths of the taxation; an arrangement which was opposed by a powerful minority in the Irish Parliament as being grossly unjust. At the time of the Union the debt of England was £420,000,000 and of Ireland £26,841,000. It was arranged that the debts should be kept separately; but an unfair amount of the entire debt had been imposed on Ireland. The original debt was taken at £18,000,000. The total debt contracted since the Union was £289,000,000, of which 2-17ths was £34,000,000. There had been deficient revenues to the extent of £9,000,000. Yet Ireland had £107,000,000 imposed upon her as her portion of the debt. On this point, then, he (Colonel Dunne) thought inquiry should be made. Moreover the Act of Union provided that at the end of seven years the proportion might be reviewed and if necessary altered. Now, according to the value of property assessed to the income-tax the portion of the taxes payable by Ireland ought to be smaller than that authorised by the arrangements made at the time of the Union. The last official return gives the taxation of Ireland at £6,845,000, but that does not represent the entire amount. Goods on which customs' dues have been paid in England are consumed in Ireland, the produce of the sale of the Crown lands has been applied to England, the rents of Ireland are spent out of the country, and altogether the real amount of Irish revenue may be put down at £9,000,000. Taxation in Ireland has increased in a greater ratio than in England. In 1816 taxes to the amount of £17,190,324 were repealed, from which Ireland was benefited only to the extent of £163,155. "The property assessed to income tax in Great Britain is £302,380,730, and in Ireland £21,631,975. The gross revenue of Great Britain is £61,360,749; of Ireland, £6,792,606. Thus for every pound of gross revenue Great pays 4s. 6¾d., while Ireland pays 6s. 3½. If however, there were added to the account uncredited customs and absentee rents, there would be a drain from Ireland amounting to at least 10s. in the pound." Therefore Ireland was becoming impoverished, and had lost two millions and a half of her population. He believed it to be quite true that 100,000 fighting men had left Ireland for America. Such an emigration was not a benefit to the country. In ten years the quantity of arable land under cultivation in Ireland had decreased by upwards of 2,000,000 of acres. "Ireland used to export cereals to the value of from £4,000,000 to £5,000,000. She now imported £5,000,000 worth, showing a loss of £9,000,000 on that head alone. The falling off had also extended to green crops and to stock. The diminution of green crops last year amounted to 19,336 acres. Of horses there was in the same period a loss of 23,715, valued at £189,720; of cattle, 93,415, of the value of £1,777,998; of sheep, 153,201, of the value of £147,421; and of pigs, 89,821, of the value of £98,000, making altogether a loss within the last year—that was from within 1862 to 1863—of stock worth £2,207,616." Manufacturing industry has also been declining. Cotton mills have died out. In 1839 woollen manufactures employed 1,231, in 1862 only 862 persons. "According to the report of the inspectors of factories, worsted had sunk even lower than the woollen manufactures." In 1845 the investments in savings banks were £2,921,581, and in 1862 only £2,153,211. The traffic on the railroads has decreased. In 1846 there were 15,932 boats and 70,011 men engaged in Irish fisheries; in 1862 the numbers had fallen to 11,375 boats and 48,601 men.

Mr. Gladstone agreed on behalf of the Government to the appointment of a select committee, though he did not think much benefit would be derived from it. He deplored the distress in Ireland, but he did not altogether assent to the arguments of Colonel Dunne. Ireland paid less than two-seventeenths of the gross revenue, and the calculations based on the assessments of property were in some respects fallacious.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

On Thursday, Lord C. Paget moved the Navy Estimates for the current year. The following gives the principle statistics in a tabular form :—

	Last Year.	Present Year
Cost	£10,736,032	£10,432,610
Number of men and boys	76,000	71,951
Men in the Royal Navy Reserve ..	—	16,000
Line-of-battle ships in commission 1st Feb. in present year	11	10
Armour-plated ships	4	7
Frigates, &c.	41	42
Sloops, &c.	98	99
Guard ships, &c.	82	85
Vessels of all classes	236	243

His lordship informed the House that there are eighteen armour-plated ships in course of construction. Six can be got ready by the middle of the year, six at the end of the year, and six next year; making, with the seven now commissioned, twenty-five. Besides this, the Government proposed to build six gunboats, at a cost of £120,000. These vessels are to be 700 tons burden, to be built on the twin-screw principle, to be armour-plated throughout to the water-line, to have a limited space on deck for turrets, and to carry two powerful guns. These gunboats, it was expected, would be found useful for river purposes and wherever a light draught of water is required. It will be noticed that the estimates for the year are £303,422 less than for last year. This is effected by a reduction in the personnel and in the storekeepers' department; but the reduction would have been much greater except for an increase in the vote on account of the war in New Zealand, and an increase in the wages paid to artificers in the dockyards. But how is it that, as the number of vessels is larger, the number of men and boys required can be less? Lord Paget explained that the armour-plated ships required less men, and that, relying upon the large naval reserve (16,000), and upon the facility for getting seamen, the fleet was being weeded of inferior men. However, the reduction in the number of seamen was only 600, and the total reduction was made up by 1,500 coast-guardsmen and 2,000 boys. The naval officers complained of only having little boys to attend on them, and the Admiralty had determined to allow 700 or 800 servants to supply the place of about 2,000 boys. The boys are divided into two classes, and both have hitherto gone into sea-going vessels, the second class acting as officers' servants. It is now proposed that only the first-class boys should go to sea, and the second-class kept in training ships. Lord Paget informed the House that the repairs of vessels was a heavy item, but that it was indispensable to keep up our wooden fleet. Out of 153 ships on foreign stations, 119 were singly despatched on special services, and therefore the power of armour-plated ships was not a substitute for numbers. Besides, for some purposes, iron vessels were not so advantageous. He did not think, for example, that the Alabama could have cruised so long without being docked, if she had been an iron ship. Respecting the armour-plated ships constructing, his lordship said the Bellerophon is a remarkable vessel. She is 4,200 tons, will carry plates 6 inches in thickness along her entire length, and she will throw a broadside of three-quarters of a ton of iron or steel. Her speed will almost equal that of the Pallas, which will, it is thought, be the fastest ship in the navy. Other vessels in course of construction are not so excellent, but the activity in the French dockyards obliged the Admiralty to go on building without awaiting the results of experiments. The Royal Oak, the Caledonia, the Prince Consort, the Royal Alfred and the Ocean were valuable iron-plated ships, but no longer impenetrable. He (Lord Paget) believed that scarcely any of our ships are impenetrable against the guns that are coming. He altogether denied that the Admiralty had been dilatory. Before the encounter between the Virginia (Merrimac) and Monitor the Prince Albert, a turret ship, was commenced, and immediately after that affair the Admiralty ordered the Royal Sovereign to be cut down and reconstructed upon the principle advocated by Captain Coles.

Sir J. Pakington considered it unwise to reduce the number of seamen. He condemned the reduction in the number of boys, who, being thoroughly trained, were invaluable to the navy, and he regretted the reduction in the coastguard, which was our best reserve. He thought the Government had been wasteful in constructing vessels without awaiting the results of experiments. He wished the pay of naval officers to be increased. When he was at the Admiralty he was much struck with distinguished officers declining the command of ships because they could not afford to accept the commissions.

THE "CHESAPEAKE" AFFAIR.

To the Editor of The Index.

Halifax, Nova Scotia, February 16th, 1864.

Sir,—It has occasioned some little surprise on this side of the Atlantic that as yet no English journal has furnished its readers with any information concerning the affair of the Chesapeake other than that gleaned from the Northern press. Even the Times, with all its enterprise, has simply given the telegrams from the New York journals, which were neither more nor less than a tissue of the grossest falsehoods. There are some points connected with the cruise of the Chesapeake which I think the English public should be informed of; not only that the people of this province may be vindicated from the calumnies showered upon them through the American press, and unwittingly republished in England, but that it may be seen how little the British flag is respected or the laws regarded by those who wear the uniform of the Federal navy.

The incidents connected with the seizure of the Chesapeake are pretty well known in England, I fancy, and need not be referred to now. The ship was taken to St. Johns, New Brunswick, or rather, I should say, to the mouth of that harbour, where the passengers and crew were landed, with the exception of the engineer, who was kept to work the engines. A vessel with coal was to have met the Chesapeake in the neighbourhood; but the person in St. Johns to whom this duty was entrusted failed to fulfil his agreement, and the ship was obliged to put to sea without having coaled. She was next heard from at the south-western end of this province, having passed in sight of the town of Yarmouth, where there is a telegraph-office. Here commenced the blundering and mismanagement which subsequently led to her recapture. Had she gone to the other extremity of the province, she would have found coal in abundance, and no telegraph lines or Federal consular agents. For several days the Chesapeake lay in port at Shelburne and La Flore, her movements watched by Federal officials, and promptly telegraphed to Halifax. Meanwhile a dozen or more of craft, from the frigate Niagara down to the swift blockade-runners captured but a short time previous, were sent in pursuit of the the ill-fated craft. By selling portions of the cargo, the captors of the Chesapeake were enabled to procure small quantities of coal, with which they brought the ship to Sambro harbour (some twenty or thirty miles from Halifax) on the 16th of December; and that evening a small schooner was loaded with coal and sent to her aid, as well as two engineers, who shipped in this city for a cruise. But the time for escape had gone by. The Federal gunboat Ella and Annie, was even then lying in this harbour, and the next morning she slipped quietly down to Sambro, and the Chesapeake fell into her clutch without a struggle. It is to the incidents of this capture that I wish to call particular attention.

At the time of the capture the Chesapeake had finished coaling from a British schooner alongside, and the crew were sitting down to breakfast. Lieut. Braine was not on board. When the Ella and Annie hove in sight the crew left the ship, leaving on board the two engineers shipped in Halifax, the engineer who was on board the steamer at the time of her capture by the Confederates, and another man belonging to her original crew. These latter, when the Federal gunboat was about one hundred yards distant, hoisted the American colours, Union down, as a signal of distress. On boarding the ship the two young men from this city were at once placed in irons by the Federals. An armed boat's crew also boarded the British schooner near by, and commenced searching her, and taking away every movable thing of value which they found on board. When the captain of the vessel asked by what authority this was done, a pistol was presented at his head by the Federal officer, who informed the captain of this British schooner lying in a British port that this (the pistol) was his authority. In the cabin one of Braine's men, named George Wade, was lying sick; he was seized, ironed hand and foot, and flung into a boat to be conveyed to the Federal gunboat. Steam having been got up on the prize, the two ships got under way and were heading for Boston, when they were met by the Federal ship Dacotah, whose commander ordered them to Halifax, where they arrived the same afternoon. I shall not refer to the excitement caused by their arrival, but confine myself strictly to the more important events connected with the recapture.

Contrary to general usage no steps were taken to inform the authorities here as to the cause of this appearance of two Federal ships and a prize in our neutral waters. A demand being forwarded to the senior officer commanding the Dacotah to state the names of the ships under his command, together with the object of their visit and the particulars of the capture, finally elicited a document which afterwards proved to be in many respects grossly inaccurate, if not knowingly false. For the sake of brevity I will refer only to the more important of these mis-statements—mis-statements, too, which must have been made with a full knowledge of the facts. Both in his official communication and in a personal interview with the authorities here, Commander Cleary, of the Dacotah, stated that when captured the Chesapeake had on board only five of her old crew—she being deserted by her former captors. Nothing was said concerning the boarding of the British schooner in British waters, nor with regard to the confinement in irons of three British subjects on board the gunboat Ella and Annie. These facts, however, had meanwhile become known to some of the citizens, one of whom—Dr. Almon, a gentleman of the medical profession who occupies a prominent position in the community—exerted himself to have the matter brought to the notice of the authorities. Acting upon this information, the provincial authorities promptly notified Commander Cleary of the Dacotah that none of the United States ships would be suffered to leave port until the matter was investigated.

He then admitted that he had the men described, and agreed to deliver them up at 1 o'clock on the following day—Saturday, the 19th December. The authorities then notified Commander Cleary that the High Sheriff of Halifax would be in attendance at the Queen's-wharf on that day, at the hour appointed, for the purpose of receiving the men. He was also notified that on the same day, at 2 o'clock, the Chesapeake would be taken formal charge of, on behalf of the Queen's representative. On Saturday morning Captain Cleary transmitted to the Provincial Government the correspondence which had taken place between Lord Lyons and Mr. Seward on the subject, and asked if the Government still adhered to its determination. It was replied that his Excellency the Administrator saw no reason to change his decision as previously expressed, and at the appointed hour the Chesapeake was formally handed over. But it is with the three prisoners that I have to do.

About half-past 1 o'clock a boat arrived from the ship at the Queen's-wharf, in command of an officer wearing the uniform of the Federal navy, and having in her stern-sheets the three men, in irons. They were ordered out of the boat on to the wharf, but the Sheriff refused to receive them in irons, and these were accordingly removed by the officer in charge. The High Sheriff then pronounced the men free. There were at this time standing upon the ship some fifteen or twenty persons, including two members of the Provincial Government, the acting American Consul, an officer of Her Majesty's 16th regiment, and a number of the most respectable and influential citizens of Halifax. On the wharf beside the ship there were some twenty or more persons standing; all citizens of the highest respectability, and among them some leading men. As soon as the men were declared free, Dr. Almon called to a boat, in which sat two fishermen, and which was making out into the harbour from the Fish-market slip, not many yards distant. The boat was then backed into the slip until the stern touched it, when Wade, one of the men just released, was directed to step into the boat. He did so, and just as he had seated himself and the boat was being pushed off, a man in the garb of a civilian rushed down the slip, pushing his way through the people, and calling out, "Stop that boat! Stop that boat!" at the same time drawing a pistol and threatening to fire if the men did not obey. When he reached the water's edge, still brandishing the pistol, he was seized by Dr. Almon, who knocked the pistol into the air, and grasping the man round the body held him fast. The boat was at this time some two or three yards distant, the men laying upon their oars; but the people on the wharf shouted out "Go on! Go on!" and they struck out nobly, soon rounding the wharf and disappearing from sight. I ran to the head of the wharf as the boat started, and Wade, looking up as he passed, twice exclaimed, "Thank God and the Queen for my liberty!" To go back to the struggle on the ship: the pistol held by the man, who was afterwards discovered to be a policeman, was brandished wildly about; sometimes in the face of Dr. Almon, and at others pointing into the crowd, until the fear of bloodshed induced others to interfere. But when the boat had gone the policeman gave in, and so ended the contest. It appeared afterwards that the United States Consul had obtained a warrant from the authorities, under the Extradition Treaty, for the arrest of the captors of the Chesapeake, Wade being one of the number, and he was to have passed from Yankee manacles into those of the civic authorities, had not he providentially escaped.

On the 11th of January, Dr. Almon, Mr. A. Keith, and Dr. P. W. Smith were made to appear before his worship the Mayor, on a charge of obstructing an officer in the discharge of his duty. The investigation lasted some eight or nine hours, during which time the court-room was crowded. Commenting upon the evidence given on this occasion, the Morning Journal of this city, said :—

"The most important facts elicited at this investigation were, that there was no riot, no mob, no preconcerted movement for the spiriting away of Wade, as alleged by Yankee sympathisers in our midst and by statements furnished by the Northern press. The High Sheriff testified that at the time the affair took place not more than thirty persons were present, including the employés of the Commissariat Department; that there was no scuffle until Policeman Hutt presented a pistol; that no one behind him could tell that he was a policeman, and that he came to the conclusion the interference was for the purpose of preventing bloodshed. Dr. Smith declares that his sole motive in seizing policeman Hutt was to prevent blood being spilt. The testimony of Lieutenant Reyne, of Her Majesty's 16th Regiment, in command of the main guard on the Queen's-wharf on the day in question, is very strong on this point. He said: "I thought that the person who first interfered with the supposed policeman would have been shot had not Dr. Smith interfered. I expected every moment to see some one go down, from the manner in which the pistol was held." He also stated that on the day in question there were not above thirty to forty civilians on the wharf when the occurrence took place; and that he saw nothing to lead him to suppose that there was any preconcerted arrangement to prevent the arrest of Wade. From the evidence of several persons present, it was clearly shown that the boat in which Wade got away was proceeding down the harbour at the time it was hailed, and brought to the slip at the Queen's-wharf. Mr. Ritchie, counsel for the accused, gives the gist of the evidence in a very few words: "The facts were, that three men—at least two of them British subjects—were brought on shore manacled, and it was determined not to receive them in that condition, and they were freed; and while free, one of the number escaped in a boat that was casually passing at the time. There was no riot, yet a pistol was presented, and the man holding it threatened to shoot, and it was natural for bystanders to interfere when it appeared that human life was in jeopardy."

His worship the Mayor, however, committed the gentlemen named for trial at the Supreme Court, and they are now under bonds to appear there upon the charge specified.

Trusting that you will publish these facts in justice to all concerned, and that you may give further publicity in your editorial columns to some of them,

I beg to subscribe myself,
Your most obedient servant,
CHARLES A. PILSBURY.

T. W. AND FLETCHER BEAUMONT.

To the Editor of the The Index.

Sir,—It would be gratifying to many friends as well as to the bereaved parents, if you could find space in The Index for the subjoined extracts from the Tennessee papers, containing a well-deserved tribute to the memory of two as gallant youths as ever gave up life in their country's cause.

A FRIEND.

Death of Fletcher Beaumont.—Intelligence of the sad event indicated in this heading reached this community a few days ago, and was received by every one with unaffected sorrow.

Fletcher Beaumont was the youngest son of Mr. and Mrs H. F. Beaumont, of this city. In December, 1861, although only about 17 years old, he volunteered as a private in the 50th Tennessee regiment, and soon afterwards went with it to Fort Donelson, where he shared its glory and suffering in the memorable fight at that place. Here he was made a prisoner, and was taken to Camp Chase, where he was held for about seven months. Upon being exchanged, he wrote to his friends that he had resolved he would never be taken prisoner again. He rejoined his regiment in Mississippi, and was soon sent to Port Hudson. Just before the fall of that post his regiment was ordered up to join Johnston's command, and participated in the fights and other engagements around Vicksburg. Fletcher fought gallantly at Jackson, and was wounded in the fight. He had now been made adjutant of his regiment—an honourable position well deserved.

In the battle of Chickamauga his regiment was again engaged. When General Gregg was wounded, Col. Sugg took command of the brigade, and appointed Fletcher as an aide-de-camp upon his staff.

At the battle of Mission Ridge the 50th bore its accustomed part of hard fighting, and here Fletcher received the wound that caused his death. After several days of suffering he expired at Dalton, on the 27th of November.

Here, where the deceased was known, where he was born and reared, we need say but little of him. He was a young man of fine promise, and, had he lived, one who would have filled an honourable place in society.

His life was a brief one, but it was unspotted; death came to him easily, but it came only as it comes to the brave. The high hopes and the stirring ambition of the young soldier are all stilled in the summons of death, and a manly young form fills a soldier's grave in the field of blood—the Aceldama of his loved South.

There let him rest! The sod on which a soldier falls is a sepulchre more honorable than marble shafts or sculptured urns. No loving hands may plant the jonquil or crocus there, but the coming multitude who shall tread life's highway by his grave will, each one, stop to pay a tribute of tears at the shrine of glory. To the family of the deceased we feel that we can offer not only our own, but the heartfelt condolence and sympathy of this whole community.

The Heroes of the 50th Tennessee Regiment.—The winds of autumn have wafted the smoke of battle from the crimsoned fields of Chickamauga, and to-night the breezes are chanting in Eolian tones a requiem over the heroic dead who sleep beside the "River of Death." The thousand camp-fires which girdle the hills of "Look-out" as with a zone of fire are fast declining, and the soldier, stretched on the ground beneath a starless sky, is visiting in his dreams the loved ones at home. The fierce grapple of the foe is forgotten in the soft embrace of a mother's love. I sit alone, while memory is busy calling up from the battle-field the forms of the noble dead whose names have called forth this tribute of praise. 'Tis a fit theme for memory and tears.

Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas W. Beaumont, of Clarksville, Tennessee, was a young man gifted with no ordinary degree of intellect. To a mind naturally bold and vigorous, he had added all the charms of modern and classic literature. As an editor, for several years preceding the war, of an influential public journal in Nashville, he gained an enviable reputation as a political writer. His style was bold, terse and graceful. His argumentation was clear, cogent and conclusive. His editorial bearing was cordial and friendly. When the alarum of war was first sounded, with all the ardour of a knight of old, he flew to arms and was stationed at Fort Donelson for many months before its fall. As captain of one of the river batteries in that first great conflict with the ironclads of the enemy, he exhibited the coolness and self-possession of a veteran. Shot and shell fell thick around him in that terrible conflict, but bold and defiant he walked from gun to gun, the very incarnation of valour. From the first battle-field he went to a Northern prison, where he spent seven months, the same undaunted, unfaltering friend of Southern independence. When exchanged, he was elected Lieut.-Colonel of the 50th Tennessee regiment, and went through the campaign of Northern Mississippi, thence to Vicksburg, thence to Port Hudson, thence to the bloody field of Raymond, where he received a slight wound on the head; thence through the battles at Jackson, in all of which he displayed the great qualities of the soldier, courage and perseverance. When the order came for his regiment to move to his own beloved Tennessee, to drive from her soil the hireling invader, his eye kindled with patriotic enthusiasm. He marched to the field of Chickamauga on Saturday morning with the elastic tread of a willing martyr to the cause of his native State.

The battle raged furiously. Shot and shell, canister and grape, mingled with the booming of a hundred cannon, made war's grand chorus fearfully sublime, but on through the missiles of death he bore himself, as though he courted death on the threshhold of his State. Evening came, and still high above the din of battle his voice was heard cheering his gallant followers, to "strike for God and their native land." The sun had dipped low down the western sky. The victorious shouts of ten thousand brave Confederates is heard above the storm. Look-out, from her every gorge and lofty peak, answers back to Chickamauga, "All is well." But the gallant Beaumont, with sword in hand, had given his heart's blood to his country.

"Oh, if there be on this earthly sphere
A boon, an offering, Heaven holds dear,
'Tis the last libation Liberty draws
From the heart that bleeds and breaks in her cause!"

He sleeps on the field of Chickamauga, among the honoured dead. Friend of other days, companion of my prison life—farewell!

NORTH CAROLINA.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—You will see from the within extracts from the Rolls-office of England, that as far back as 1788 North Carolina was charged with disloyalty, and how loyal she in truth was, even at that early day, to the cause of freedom and independence.

This gallant State is now again charged in some quarters with disloyalty to the South.

Since this war broke out no soldiers could have shown more bravery in the field, and in the end no people will establish a higher claim to loyalty, to independence, and to free government, than will the people of North Carolina.

STATE PAPER DEPARTMENT OF HER MAJESTY'S PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE.

Extract from a despatch of Josiah Martin, the Royal Governor of North Carolina, to Lord George Germaine, Secretary of State, dated 21st September, 1780.

"Our friends have been intimidated beyond belief by the cruel oppressions of their persecutors. They continue to give great assurance of aid and strength to Lord Cornwallis and myself."—(America and West Indies. No. 313.)

Extract from despatch of Lord Germaine to Governor Martin, dated Whitehall, 9th November, 1780.

"I have much satisfaction in acquainting you that His Majesty is graciously pleased to accept your recommendation of Mr. Lewis De Rossett to be Secretary of North Carolina, as soon as I am informed that province is retored to peace, which I hope will not be long.—(Same, 249.)

Extract from despatch No. 10, from Governor Martin, dated 13th January 1778.

"The port of Occracock has become a great channel of supply to the Rebels; while the more considerable ports of the continent are watched by the King's ships. They have received through it considerable supplies for carrying on their warfare from France and the French West Indies. This has been reported to Commodore Hotham, the naval commander here, who will take all proper measures for shutting up that avenue of succour to the rebels.—(Same, 313.)

BUTLER'S RULE IN NORFOLK.

The following letter, written by a Baltimore merchant to one of his correspondents, has been sent to us for publication:—

"Baltimore, February 13, 1864.

"Yesterday I returned from Norfolk. I utterly failed in making the expected collections. The business of Norfolk is entirely suspended in consequence of the military occupation and the strict regulation against any of the old residents, who are all avowedly "disloyal," or what is the same, suspected of being "disloyal," pursuing their usual avocations. Law, justice, the rights of property and the protection of life from violence are no longer regarded and the place is ruined. The visitor to Norfolk can hardly believe that he is in a civilised, much less in a Christian country. I have read sadaccounts of the desolation of Poland under the rule of Russia, but they are not to be compared to the misery that Butler and his ruthless creature, Wild, have brought on Norfolk. At every turn there is a spy who listens for some words that may be construed into treason, or else tries to entrap you into saying something that is offensive to his employer. You may be very careful; you may resolve to say nothing about the state of affairs, but still it is not certain that you will escape. To rob you of what you possess, or to gratify a fiendish malice, Butler's spies are ready to swear to conversations that never occurred. I will give you two or three instances of tyranny that happened within the last few days. A lady was summoned to the provost-office, was questioned about matters of which she was entirely ignorant, and was sent without further proceedings and without a change of clothes to Old Point, to be kept there until she gives the required information. A gentleman reported to have money was fined $2,000 for speaking disrespectfully of Butler to one of Butler's spies. Major Burroughs a Confederate prisoner, was seized with the smallpox and removed from prison to the hospital. On the way the negro guard warned the sick man he should never again see daylight. The same night he was shot through the back whilst asleep. The negro guard pleaded that their prisoner, who was too weak to move, was trying to escape from a third story window and with an armed guard in the room. A court-martial was held, and it was admitted that the guard, who killed the prisoner, had a little exceeded his duty. But still the negro was acquitted on the score of ignorance, and a medal was presented to him as a reward for bravery.

Norfolk is thronged with negroes, and if many more come thep resent fearful mortality will be greatly increased. Small-pox is carrying off numbers from day to day. When I had the opportunity and when I dared I conversed with negro women. In nearly every instance I heard the same story. They came against their will; they pined for their old homes, and looked upon their husbands being in the Federal army as a final separation. As for the negro soldiers, it is likely enough that they are loyal to Butler, for he permits them to pillage and plunder, and to commit with impunity crimes that are too horrible to be named. But this licence has made them useless for fighting, as Butler will find if ever his body-guard meets the foe. The negroes have possession of many blocks of houses in the town. As the Government does not supply fuel as well as food, they have burnt the fences and outhouses, and have even pulled down habitable wooden houses to make firewood. A large building used as a ladies' seminary was broken into by the negroes. Happily no pupils were there. The negroes remained in the house, and the owner appealed to the authorities. General Wild replied that as the negroes had worked so hard to get possession they might keep the place. Even some Federals told me indirectly that they were rather disgusted with these proceedings. They say the negro must stay in the South, and must be kept out of the North, where he is a useless encumbrance. I see plainly that if the North prevails the negroes will be exterminated.

The chief magistrate at Norfolk, selected for the post by Mr. Seward, was lately a dram-shop keeper, and also a dealer in a quack medicine. He is, however, not an unfair specimen of the Union men of the town, and from what I tell you about him you may guess what becomes of the property that is seized by the officials for the taxes that the citizens have no means to pay. It was suggested to Butler by an ex-dealer in marine stores, and now a loyal spy, that the disloyal people ought to find money to keep the loyal people who are out of employment. Acting upon this hint, a schedule of questions was sent to each of the inhabitants, the answers to which form the basis of the assessment. Amongst other interrogations are:—

What is the amount of your property?
What were your former sentiments?
What are they now?
Have you taken the oath?
Have you ever aided the rebels?
What will you give in the next six months to aid those out of employment?

Six months! If the Federals stop so long, there will only remain in Norfolk soldiers and paupers.

You are aware that Butler is particularly generous in allowing mails to be sent into the Confederacy under a flag of truce. Do you know why? One condition is that the letters may be opened. They are opened, and as many are addressed to Confederate soldiers, Butler gets a few hints as to the position of the Confederate armies. Moreover, he gets information as to the circumstances and sentiments of the writers. It would be better to give up this Southern correspondence. I am sure the Norfolk people would make the sacrifice, for in spite of their bitter persecution they show a proud, unbroken spirit, and they look forward confidently to a time when they will be freed from their oppressors.

The "Chesapeake".—Extract from the jugdment of Judge Stewart of the Vice-Admiralty Court, Halifax.—"If this were an ordinary case of recapture from pirates, the prescribed salvage would have been ⅛ of the value of the property, and this, on the value of the vessel alone (which I am informed is more than $60,000,) would have been $7000, and the owners of both vessel and cargo have been fortunate that they were not destroyed at sea, and so, wholly lost to them. It is unnecessary to recur to the circumstance of the recapture. It suffices to remark that the taking was not an ordinary piratical capture. It is even possible not to have been a case of piracy at all. This court would stultify itself were it to effect ignorance of what is patent to everybody, namely, that those who wrested the Chesapeake from the master and crew, are at the present moment in the adjoining province of New Brunswick, asserting that they made the capture as citizens of and parties duly authorised by the Government of the Confederate States and that they have produced documents and proofs thereo before magistrates there, duly invested with the right to determine the validity of their claim, so far, at least, as affects their alleged piratical character. I allow this claim, and will decree a writ of restitution when moved, to be given to the claimants upon payment of the costs and expenses, as I have before specified."

Confederate Documents.—We have received, too late for use in this impression of the Index, official copies of the Reports made by the heads of Departments, to be laid before the Confederate Congress. It is a suggestive fact that there is none of these papers which bears the slightest resemblance to the pretended "Report of Secretary Mallory," which, notwithstanding a public denial of its authenticity, the Attorney-General quoted as genuine in his place in Parliament. In our next number we shall commence to publish the most interesting portions of these documents, among which are:—Documents accompanying Mr. Memminger's Report; Reports of the Confederate Secretary of War, of the Post-master-General.

Consumption of Coal.—At the last sitting of the Academie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, M. Dalloz gave the following interesting particulars on the consumption of coal:—In 1789 France consumed 500,000 tons of coal, 220,000 of which were imported; in 1811 the quantity was 773,000 tons; in 1830 it rose to 1,800,000 tons, and in 1847 to 76,000,000 tons 2,500,000 of which were imported. At the commencement of the present century England produced 13,000,000 tons; in 1838 the quality rose to 26,000,000 tons, and in 1862 to 84,500,000 tons. England alone produces much more than half the coal extracted throughout the world. The production of coal in the United States is valued at 15,000,000 tons; that of Belgium at 9,000,000; the Zollverein produced upwards of 14,000,000 tons in 1862; so that, if England be omitted, France is one of the richest coal-producing countries in the world. The production of coal is intimately connected with that of iron, in which article England again holds the first rank. In 1789 France only produced 69,000 tons of cast iron. This quantity rose to 115,000 tons in 1812; in 1830 to 347,773 tons of cast iron and 237,379 of wrought iron; in 1847 the figures were respectivels 602,772 and 372,686; ie 1850 the production had fallen to 406,000 tons of cast iron and 249,000 of wrought iron. A new rise occurred immediately after the Republic; in 1859 France produced 856,000 tons of cast iron and 520,000 of wrought iron; and in 1863 is vaguely stated at the enormous figure of 1,180,000 tons of cast iron and 705,509 tons of wrought iron. The production of England is nearly 4,000,000 tons of cast iron; that of the Zollverin, 591,593 tons; of Sweden, 143,000; of Austria, 270,000; and of Belgium, 161,000.—Galignani.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1864.

The Armies on the Move.

The Federal press is, as usual, full of sanguine auguries as to the results of the movements in the South-West. For three years it has been demonstrated in New York and Washington, at the commencement of every spring campaign, that the war would not last six months; and it is not surprising that great faith is placed upon the mysterious marchings and countermarches now reported all along the Federal lines south of Tennessee. We confess we are still in the dark as to their precise object. In some quarters an invasion on a grand scale is talked about, by which the heart of the Cotton States is to be attacked; in others an attack upon Mobile, Charleston, and Savannah; in others the annihilation of Johnston's army, by a simultaneous attack on his left flank in rear and in front. In all, there is a wonderful amount of praise of General Grant's new "Anaconda" scheme, which is to crush the rebellion in the Cotton States in three months, and leave Lee and Longstreet to be finished off in the month of June. So far as we can extract the truth from the confused accounts that have reached us, there are no less than three distinct columns set in motion, all directed towards the same object. General Sherman is moving in a north-easterly direction for Meridian, Mississippi, from Jackson, the Confederate force retiring slowly in his front, and occasionally administering a check. General Grierson, whose raid through Mississippi last year was one of the best conceived and executed exploits of the war, has started from Corinth and Holly Springs, also bound, it is said, for Meridian, at the head of a powerful cavalry expedition. General Logan is starting southward with the 15th army corps from Huntsville, Alabama, with the alleged intention of operating on the left flank of General Johnston's army at Dalton. Now to meet the invading armies in Mississippi, the Confederates have Lee's and Forrest's cavalry, and a considerable force under Polk, and, we believe, Hardee, whilst Logan's force, marching southward unsupported, is itself exposed to a flank movement from Dalton. So far, there is little danger to be apprehended by the Confederates. But there is the Army of the Cumberland to be counted in. Stationed at Chattanooga, with numbers in all probability equal to those of the Confederate force at Dalton, it is said to be watching for the opening effected for it by the withdrawal of troops from Dalton to oppose the advance of Sherman and Logan, and prepared at once to take advantage of it by a direct march upon Atlanta. But, in the first place, the overland route from Jackson, Mississippi, to Atlanta, Georgia, in the face of an active army, and through a hostile population, would be an affair of months, and would give abundance of time for Johnson to deal effectually with Grant. In the second place, we have reason to know that the difficulties of subsisting the troops at Chattanooga and Knoxville are already almost insuperable, and that an advance of another eighty miles through the country in front of Dalton, wasted by the Confederate army, is out of the question. The truth is, Chattanooga is an excellent, easily defensible, advanced post. But the experience the Federals have gained of the difficulty of getting up their supplies, has convinced them of the utter hopelessness of taking the direct road whilst Johnson is in front; and we believe that at this moment, perhaps for months to come, the force at Chattanooga is more likely to have to fight to hold its own than to attempt an advance into Georgia. This view is borne out by the latest news. Logan faces Grant's army threatening Dalton; it is reported that Johnson is preparing to attack Chattanooga; and from all we learn from Confederate sources, we have little doubt that when the fighting begins in earnest the initiative will be taken by the Southern armies. For if Chattanooga is threatened we may rely upon it Knoxville is in serious danger. The attack will be simultaneous, or, at any rate, so concerted as to prevent the despatch of reinforcements to Knoxville. With the Confederate cavalry scouring Eastern Tennessee, capturing the Federal supplies, and gradually creeping up almost within range of the batteries defending the town; with Longstreet making preparations, not twenty miles distant, with an army considerably stronger than the garrison, we are prepared to hear any day of the advance of that general, and a renewed struggle for the possession of that stronghold which, once more in the hands of the Confederates, would be an impassable barrier to any considerable progress of the Federal army in the South-West. Pending these more important operations, there are plenty of rumours of expeditions against Mobile and Savannah, of new combinations under General Banks, who has for the nonce abandoned the field for the council-chamber, and is devoting himself to the task of bringing a new Louisiana into the Union. But nothing is certain, except that unless the Federals send a powerful army as well as a fleet, Savannah and Mobile will teach them the lesson they have learnt at Charleston.

In Virginia quiet is the order of the day in both armies, except with the Federal outposts, which have anything but a quiet time of it, what with bush-whackers and Mosby's horse. But General Butler has made an attempt to immortalise himself by a dash into Richmond, which resulted only in the mere repulse of the army under Sedgwick, with heavy loss, and the return of Butler's force without a fight. Both sides are preparing, however, for an early movement, and here again it seems probable that the South will strike the first blow. Speculation is rife in the Northern press as to the point where the blow will fall. Pennsylvania is in a scare. Ohio is alarmed. At one time it is Longstreet, who is meditating a move through Kentucky; at another, Early and Ewell, who are about to cross the Potomac. All that is known is, that the South is full of fight, and anxious to come to blows; and that, from undeniable sources, the North is informed that the "rebels" were never better drilled and equipped, or numerically stronger, than they are at this moment. Of course the Northern press keeps up its wretched fictions to the last. There are the usual wonderful encounters between Kentucky regiments that want to desert, and Alabama regiments that won't let them go; and there are deserters coming in such flocks as would in the space of six months "deplete" the ranks of the Southern army without the necessity of firing a shot. Our readers must know by this time what value to attach to these reports. We have noticed that whenever the demoralisation of the Southern armies has been most complete, and Southern soldiers were deserting by hundreds, the Confederate commanders were in reality on the point of making their strength felt at some important point, and we have little doubt that something similar will occur now. When Bragg retreated from Tullahoma last year it was said whole divisions had flung down their arms and deserted. The victory of Chickamauga followed almost as a natural consequence. The Federal leaders are probably better informed than the newspaper correspondents. If not, they will be terribly surprised. It is not for us to lay down a programme for the Southern armies. The South stands on her defence, and none but those who know the internal difficulties she has to contend with can decide of what she is capable. But we are sanguine that it is not a mere war of defence to which the army of invasion has to look forward. Great movements, on a scale such as have not yet been attempted by the South; a vigorous initiative; the consolidation of her strength to strike effective blows, and make her blows decisive; the defence of what is vital and abandonment of unnecessary outposts, these we believe to be the objects of the Southern leaders, and we hope to see accomplished. The language of President Davis is full of cheering hope, and he is not the man to speak false words of comfort. He has sometimes been charged with understating his case, with making too much of reverses and speaking too plainly the truth, but never with bombast or exaggeration; and the tone in which he has addressed the Confederacy is ominous of disaster to the Federal arms. Any mail may now bring us important news. The armies are closing. In Virginia, in Eastern Tennessee, in Texas, in Mississippi, and Alabama, they are within skirmishing distance. Federal squadrons are gathering along the coast; and for months and months the Confederate arsenals have been busily preparing for the struggle. But come when and where it may, and last as it may, the issue will be the same. The South has conquered its nationality. Every successive effort of the North will only develope its strength.

Parliament.

Week by week, as the session continues, the position of the Administration becomes worse and more untenable. Every occurrence proves their weakness and unpopularity; every debate damages their character and diminishes their authority. It is becoming a very serious question whether the forbearance of the Opposition, to which alone Lord Palmerston owes his security, can or ought to continue much longer. Lord Derby and his followers have a reputation to maintain, and constitutional functions to fulfil; and it is exceedingly doubtful whether they will not irretrievably damage their fair fame and be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty if they permit a Government in which they have no confidence, and in which we may almost say that the country generally has no confidence, to remain in office on sufferance. There are, it is rumoured, reasons which make the leaders of the Conservative party very loth to eject Lord Palmerston from power; and, not to speak of any other motives, one strong reason for not doing so was indicated by Mr. Disraeli on Monday last. The mismanagement of Lord Russell has brought our European relations into a condition so unsatisfactory that it may be doubted whether either he or any possible successor could now achieve a result satisfactory to the country. The English people do not wish to go to war with Austria and Prussia. English statesmen of all parties are still more reluctant to quarrel with Powers which, however little their conduct of late years may be calculated to render them popular or respected in this country, are nevertheless our natural allies. But both the English nation and the great majority of English statesmen would prefer any extremity of political misfortune to a policy damaging to the influence and disgraceful to the character of England; and there is, unhappily, too much reason to believe that one horn or other of the dilemma must eventually impale us; that Lord Russell has behaved with such signal folly, irresolution, and timidity, that no choice remains but between war or dishonour. Now a Ministry that goes to war with the German Powers will certainly lose popularity by so doing; and on the other hand, a Ministry that for fear of such a war allows Denmark to be conquered and the fair fame of England to be tarnished, will incur very just and indelible obloquy. Feeling that they have not been guilty of sowing the wind, the Conservatives are naturally desirous that it shall not fall upon them to reap the whirlwind; that those who are answerable for the sins and blunders which have brought matters to the present dead-lock should bear the whole blame of the measures—likely in any case to be very unpopular—which may be necessary to untie the diplomatic tangle. This feeling is just and inevitable; but it ought not to prevail over considerations of public interest and constitutional duty. It is highly undesirable that the present state of things should long continue. Night after night the chiefs of Opposition rise to put questions which Ministers will not and dare not answer, or to inflict censures to which no reply can be found. Every discussion leaves the Administration more discredited, less powerful, and less capable of useful action than before, and the weakness of the Government is leading to mischief at home and paralyses the action of England abroad. This will not do. The Opposition should either refrain from exposing the feebleness of their adversaries, because those adversaries are Her Majesty's advisers, and ought at the present moment to be strengthened as far as possible; or if they distrust Lord Palmerston's colleagues too much to do this, they should move a formal vote of censure. It is most unfortunate that, at a critical moment for the destinies both of Europe and America, the power of England should be suspended almost as much by the parliamentary weakness of the Administration as by the unrivalled and dangerous incompetence of the Foreign Secretary. It is the duty of the Opposition to terminate this state of things. A vote of want of confidence would bring them into power, and an appeal to the country—which, this Parliament being in its old age, though convened by them, they are in a position to make—would probably give them strength enough to carry on Her Majesty's Government with vigour and efficiency. If they tried and were beaten, as is possible, though not probable, the victory would strengthen the hands of Lord Palmerston, and enable him either to get rid of or to control the "antiquated imbecility" of the Foreign-office. In either case we should have a Ministry which could speak to Europe and to the world, not only in the name of a party, but in that of the nation; which, relying at once on the trust of the Queen and the approval of the country, would dare to act with vigour and decision, or to await the fitting moment for action with dignity and self-possession. The present situation is thoroughly unconstitutional, and all parties are greatly to blame if they allow it to last.

The scene of Monday last in the House of Commons was very damaging to the Ministry. We do not think much of the attack on Mr. Stansfeld, which was pressed with a vehemence and bitterness that prove how strongly party feeling is excited and agitated, but prove nothing more. What Mr. Cox and Mr. Hennessy are allowed to take in hand cannot be deemed of very serious moment. But so violent an attack on a young man, just rising into notice and into a sphere of public usefulness—an attack more personal than political, and calculated to damage his prospects in public life rather than to gain a party advantage—is so unusual as to call for a few words of comment. We do not admire Mr. Stansfeld, either as a politician or an orator. In the former capacity he is hotheaded, impracticable, and visionary; in the latter, we think—though this is not the general opinion—affected, conceited, and unconvincing. But Mr. Stansfeld is a man of unquestioned honour and no ordinary degree of courage, and he is utterly incapable of lending himself to any proceeding which the most scrupulous conscience could call in question. Weak and unwise he may be, but never treacherous. There is no man in the Government less capable of saying one thing and meaning another. When he denounces schemes of political assassination as infamous, we know that he thinks them so; and when at the same time he energetically defends Mazzini, we know that he believes Mazzini innocent of all these charges. So does the whole English press, almost unanimously. Knowing the man, and being his intimate friend, Mr. Stansfeld has probably so far committed himself as to allow letters to Mazzini to be sent to his address under feigned names; for no letter to Mazzini could pass through a continental post-office except under a feigned address. But if he has done this, it has been in the certain conviction that no such letter would contain anything otherwise than politically criminal; and we have so good an opinion of Mr. Stansfeld as to believe that since he has been in office he has not done even this. The vehemence of the attack upon him probably arose from the notoriety of his friendship for Mazzini, and the very general misconception which exists concerning the character of that eminent misleader of the Italian youth. There is in Mazzini a touch of the prophet and a spice of the madman, but we need not therefore condemn him without trial as an assassin.

We have been thus particular in doing justice to Mr. Stansfeld and his friend, because we are bound to say that we think that, in one respect, the discussion was damaging to the Government. The appointment to office of a devoted friend of Mazzini's was, as regards our Continental allies, not unlike the appointment by the Federal Government of the hero of the Trent outrage to command its squadron in the West Indies. It was not exactly a wrong or an insult, but it certainly was an indiscretion; it would bear an unfriendly appearance, and was on that account much to be regretted; and the collision of Monday night illustrated its extreme inconvenience. It is most unfortunate that it should be possible for the French police to suggest that letters concerning a proposal to murder the Emperor passed through the hands of a Minister of the Crown, and that such suggestion should not be too palpably absurd to obtain credence even in France. The Emperor, who knows England, will not for a moment believe that Mr. Stansfeld had any concern in or knowledge of the scheme of Greco; but he does, unjustly and unfortunately, believe that Mazzini had a hand not only in that but in other similar crimes; and it is deplorable that he should have cause to think that a Minister of this country is the friend and protector of his would-be dethroner and assassin. As bringing into strong light the impropriety of Mr. Stansfeld's appointment, the brief and bitter controversy between himself and Mr. Hennessy was certainly injurious to the Government.

What followed was still more so. Mr. Disraeli, in a vigorous speech, recalled some of the most dishonourable transactions in the past life of Lord Russell, and expressed great alarm with regard to the probable results of the intended "conference without an armistice," and great doubts whether the despatches published contained the whole history of the correspondence and communications on the Danish question; hinting at suspicions of some such suppression as occurred just before the outbreak of the Crimean war, when the confidential communications in which the Czar had made known his intentions were kept back from Parliament, and a totally false impression was consequently produced by the papers which were actually presented. The attack was sudden and sharp; but it was quite within the rules of Parliamentary warfare, and it was exceedingly necessary that it should receive a clear and complete reply. It received nothing of the kind. Lord Palmerston shuffled and retorted, but neither answered nor refuted his assailant; and transgressing the usual bounds imposed by the courtesies of Parliament, he angrily accused Mr. Disraeli of being peculiarly successful in attacking an absent man. This was very absurd. In the absence of Lord Palmerston, not many days ago, Mr. Disraeli saved the Government. He has always been noted for the fearlessness, even more than for the fierceness, of his attacks. And, as Mr. Fitzgerald very justly observed, it is a new doctrine that because a Minister is a peer, and cannot reply in the House of Commons to censure or criticism, therefore his political character and conduct are not to be canvassed by the representatives of the people. Lord Palmerston's reply damaged the Government even more than Mr. Disraeli's attack; and the result of the passage of arms was to shake still more the already unstable equilibrium of the Administration and to diminish its waning prestige.

But by far the severest blow that the Ministry has received was the discussion on Mr. Fitzgerald's motion, on Tuesday week, for the production of papers touching the seizure of the steamships in the Mersey. The division, indeed, was a victory for the Government; and this may have had some effect out-of-doors in counteracting the impression produced by the debate. But this was not the case within the House. In the first place, everyone knew that the division was a foregone conclusion; that the Opposition did not mean to win, and to turn out the Ministry on a question which the country could not have been made clearly to comprehend in all its bearings. In the second place, it was observed that the Government had made a great concession; they had refused, in the first instance, to furnish any papers whatever, and in the course of the debate they consented to produce the most important. The discussion itself was extremely damaging to them. The very clever special pleading of the Attorney-General failed to remove the impression left by Mr. Fitzgerald's speech, that Government had in point of fact yielded to outrageous menaces, and broken the law to conciliate a foreign and very unfriendly Power. The bitter insolence which characterised the reply of Sir Roundell Palmer, usually so calm and courteous, to the very temperate argument of his adversary, and the angry impatience which prompted him repeatedly to interrupt Mr. Fitzgerald by sneers and impertinences, convinced the House that he felt the badness of his cause, and was irritated thereby beyond his self-control. His treatment of the Messrs. Laird also did him great harm. That firm had behaved with great openness and candour; and he spoke of them as if they stood convicted, not only of breaking the law of the land, but of violating the laws of honour. Then Mr. Horsfall, a member who speaks seldom, never but on subjects he understands, and never without being respectfully heard, delivered a speech which hit Lord Russell very hard. He showed that Lord Russell had requested information from Mr. Laird concerning the Alabama; that the questions put to that gentleman were very frankly and completely answered; that the answers were communicated to Mr. Adams; and that Lord Russell then allowed Mr. Adams to use language grossly false and outrageously insulting to Mr. Laird without resenting it. Now the House knows Mr. Laird as a man of the highest and most unblemished character; it knows that he is the most influential and respected man in the second seaport in the realm; and when it heard from Mr. Horsfall how he had been treated it felt that Lord Russell had shown himself sadly wanting in the spirit of a gentleman and the apprehension of what was due both to his own honour and to the feelings of a man who had at his request placed information of great importance in his hands. The House is jealous on points of honour, and this kind of meanness is peculiarly hateful to its feelings. Lord Robert Cecil followed with one of his clearest and most temperate speeches, exposing and condemning the oppression and chicanery practised against Messrs. Laird, and carrying with him the sympathy of his audience. Mr. Forster, on the Ministerial side, was less effective than usual: the Solicitor-General was rude, unscrupulous, and contemptible as usual; and the speech of Mr. Baring lost the effect which it would otherwise have had when the commercial relations of the speaker with the Northern States were remembered by his auditors. Mr. Walpole did terrible mischief to the Ministry. He is one of the most respected, beloved, and impartial men in the House; he would never be induced by party feeling to go one step beyond what he felt to be just and right; and when he expressed his strong disapproval of the conduct of the Government, he virtually summed up the debate, and in the name of Parliament pronounced the Ministers guilty. Only thoroughgoing Northerners or equally devoted Palmerstonians doubted after Walpole had pronounced. But the most crushing blow of all was the clear, logical, and conclusive speech in which Sir Hugh Cairns demonstrated the unconstitutional character of the detention of the rams by Government, without evidence to justify their seizure; and denounced the assumption by Ministers of a right to violate the law on their own responsibility. That speech has certainly settled a great constitutional question beyond the possibility of further controversy, and left no doubt on any honest mind that Ministers have gone further than any law or usage will warrant, and far enough to warrant the severest censure that Parliament can bestow. Lord R. Cecil has given notice of his intention to ask from the House of Commons a formal verdict on the point of constitutional law; and we sincerely trust that, at whatever cost, he will insist on a decision, even though the consequence should be the resignation of the Government. Better a dozen changes of Administration than one unpunished infraction of constitutional liberty.

The Embargo on Cotton.

The readers of this journal will not be surprised at the announcement that after the 1st day of the present month, cotton in the Confederate States can be bought for exportation only with the Bonds of the Confederate Cotton Loan, or with goods of prime necessity to the army and people of the blockaded territory. This is the plain meaning of the intelligence brought by the last steamer, that the Confederate Congress has passed, and the President approved, a Bill virtually prohibiting the exportation of cotton and other produce on private account, and the importation of luxuries. As yet, we have only a meagre outline of the law itself, but this, so far as it goes, describes precisely the measure which was predicted in the letter of Hon. C. J. McRae, the European fiscal agent of the Confederacy, as early as December 15th, 1863, and the necessity and objects of which were discussed under various aspects, editorially and by correspondents, in our numbers of 24th December and 7th January, as well as at subsequent dates. We need, therefore, only refer those who desire a complete understanding of the Bill, to our columns for the last two months and a-half, and a very few additional explanations will suffice.

First, it is obvious that though the prohibition extends equally to tobacco, sugar, molasses, rice, and naval and military stores, it is chiefly directed against cotton, and in this respect alone can it have any practical effects appreciable in this country. Of the other articles of produce named, tobacco is the only one which could be profitably exported abroad, and even in this the prospective profits, with Maryland and Kentucky in Federal possession as competitors, are relatively small. The reasons for embracing these articles in the provisions of the Bill are, therefore, partly to give to the measure that uniformity and impartiality which the Constitution and fairness to all sections of the Confederacy require; but chiefly to reach more effectually by legal penalties, and, indeed, to render almost impossible, an offence which public opinion in the South has always condemned with great severity, viz., trading with the enemy. Under the present Act, not merely the sale of agricultural and other produce to the enemy, but also its transportation with obvious intent of such sale, is punishable by law. It might be thought that the penalties of fine and imprisonment, superadded to confiscation of the property, are unnecessarily harsh, unless it is remembered that the law is in effect designed to shelter patriotism rather than to restrain disloyalty. The number of cases where planters or farmers, rich or poor, have been tempted by Yankee gold to part voluntarily with their commodities is amazingly small, as is proved by the utter failure of the Federals to "re-open commerce" where they obtained lodgments on the coasts or footholds in the interior. It must be fresh in the recollection of many that when the invaders were still hopeful and lavish in promises of supplying the world with the Southern staples, and when the experiment of force had failed before the stern determination with which Southern owners applied the torch, expeditions were sent up the rivers to try the efficacy of fair words and gold. In one instance a steamboat returned with one bale of cotton from an excursion of 800 miles, and in none was the object obtained. To-day the Federals claim possession of the whole length of the Mississippi and the great emporium at its mouth, and yet they depend for cotton on the produce of confiscated plantations, and the Atlantic has become familiar with the phenomenon of cotton going from Liverpool to New York. The quantity of the staple which, braving the risks of blockade, finds its way to Europe, exceeds several fold that obtained by the North with the aid of all its armies and river fleets. It is not, therefore, as a terror to its citizens that the Confederate Congress passes the stringent prohibitory law, but as a protection to the defenceless inhabitants—aged men and females, and faithful slaves—of vast districts of country exposed to predatory excursions of the enemy. These may at least have the shelter of the plea of compulsion—the only plea which Federal rapacity can understand or is willing to listen to.

As far as the Act affects neutral commerce, it is designed to give to the public defence the full benefit of the vast reserved financial strength, which has heretofore been almost unavailable except for the purposes of private speculation. The exclusive right to export cotton, even were the Federal blockade twice as effective as it has been in the past or is likely to be in the future, would be cheaply purchased at a million pounds sterling per annum. Now, from its very nature, a blockade-running trade must always be practically a close monopoly in the hands of a few enterprising men; the public at large, which bears the heavy burden of such a trade, is of necessity debarred from participation in its hazardous profits. It seems fair, therefore, in a country circumstanced as the Confederacy is, that the Government, that is to say, the whole community, should take advantage of every means for lightening its burdens, or at least distributing them more equally. Under the old system the holder of cotton accessible to a convenient place of export had an immense fortuitous advantage over the holder whose property was less fortunately situated; the new system makes the Government the only authorised seller of cotton for export. It does not diminish the inducements for blockade running; on the contrary, it is thought that the trade being placed upon safer bases will considerably increase them. It simply regulates that what of capital and enterprise has heretofore been wasted shall be husbanded for the public good, and the burdens inseparable from a blockade be distributed equally. The prohibition of the importation of luxuries is a logical sequence of this measure. It is not what pays the importer best, but what the State needs most, that should fill the ship-room of the vessels which defy or elude the enemy's vigilance. What does a country, in the agonies of a life and death struggle, want with silks and patés and champagnes? Every bale or box of such commodities takes up room that is wanted for soldiers' shoes and housewives' cards.

The terms of the law leave the Confederate Government free to select the best mode of employing to the public advantage the rich stores of the precious staple. It may either itself assume the duty and risks of exportation, or it may, as heretofore, devolve them on private enterprise. The former would perhaps be more lucrative to the Treasury, the latter certainly more safe and more consonant with the views of those in authority. Assuming, as we may safely do with the information at present in our possession, that the latter is the plan contemplated, the Government has a two-fold machinery already in operation. It may either sell its cotton in the European market for cash, as is the case with the Erlanger Bonds, or it may sell it at the port at specified rates for specified descriptions of goods. In both cases the risk of exportation devolves on private enterprise, and is covered by the margin between the Government price of cotton and the European price, a margin which will probably never be less than 1s. 6d. per pound. In the former case, that of selling cotton bonds for cash, the risk of importation is of course represented by the difference between the cash price of goods here and the contract price on delivery at the blockaded ports. To the merchant dealing with the Confederate States the only change, therefore, is that henceforth he deals with the Government directly, instead of through intermediary speculators. As the Government has always been the largest purchaser of imported goods, the change will be generally welcomed, as simplifying and rendering more secure the transactions of that portion of the commercial community.

The only immediate effect of the measure here will be a rapid recovery of the Confederate securities based on cotton, which indeed was perceptible already in January on the mere announcement that such a measure was in contemplation. In December last Mr. McRae stated the sum total of all the cotton obligations of the Government afloat, including the Erlanger Loan, to be in round numbers £3,200,000. Of these about £150,000 worth have since been redeemed with cotton; £71,300 more were redeemed with cash at the semi-annual drawing of the sinking fund on the 1st instant; so that the total amount of these securities is now rather less than the sum originally contracted for, when three times as much was offered. It is well known that the Confederate Government, without making further purchases, holds nearly 150,000 bales of cotton more than is necessary to redeem these obligations, which, since the 1st day of March are, besides goods of prime necessity, the only medium for foreign purchases of cotton in the Confederacy. As to the price of cotton in this market, we do not believe that it can be materially affected by the legislative enactments of the Confederate Government, whose obvious interest it is to bring it through the blockade as expeditiously as possible. Until other countries approximate more nearly to supplying the present demand, the price of cotton must mainly depend on the degree of efficiency of the American blockade; and here it may be observed that if all the larger ports were hermetically sealed, blockade running would merely alter its tactics, not its dimensions. There are innumerable small harbours and inlets tapping the richest cotton regions of the Confederacy, which are comparatively neglected only because vessels of larger draft have a chance elsewhere.

The exportation of cotton during the year 1863 amounted to about 130,000 bales, for obvious reasons distributed unequally among the different seasons of the year, being largest in the autumn, and smallest during the summer months. We do not apprehend that the receipts from this source during the current year will be less, and many competent judges expect it to be larger.

We have before met the objections of those who, arguing upon principles of political economy, forthwith condemn all interference on the part of a Government with the industrial system of a country. Their principles are abstractly infallible and undeniable; but they err in the application of those principles. The Confederate Government in the present case does not interrupt the course of free trade—the enemy's cruisers had done so already; it simply adapts itself to the necessities of a situation which it neither desires nor wishes to perpetuate, and which, being abnormal, requires abnormal measures to meet it. The Confederate States, hemmed in on all sides, are like one huge camp, and its relations with the outside world must be regulated accordingly.

POEMS BY DR. MACKAY.*

THOSE who are familiar with the former works of Dr. Mackay will not wait for critical commendation before they read the new volume of his poems that has just been published; and if our brief notice should meet the eyes of anyone hitherto unacquainted with the poetry of the author of "Egeria" and "A Man's Heart," the best criticism we can offer is to remark that "Studies from the Antique" is, in the true sense of the word, a collection of poems, and not merely prose translated into verse, according to the rules of art and with the aid of a rhyming dictionary. An admirable feature of Dr. Mackay's poetry is its high-toned morality. We do not mean that, after the manner of Mr. Tupper, he writes verses for the sake of a moral tag. We are not impressed in Dr. Mackay's case with the idea that the versification is only a mask for inflicting on us some of those dreary lithographed sermons, which are sold by accommodating booksellers at so much per dozen to clergymen who eschew the labour of composition. The moral influence of Dr. Mackay's poetry is not apparently the purpose, but the happy incident of it. Thus, in "Studies from the Antique," a series of poems, founded on mythological stories, the author avoids the rock on which so many have split, and does not attempt to invest heathen traditions with the semblance of a kind of Christian apocrypha, but allows the stories to give their own moral lessons. Take, as a specimen, the following extracts from "The Eumenides: a Vision of Thales," which we select for no better reason than its being the first in the book:—

"I, Thales, sitting on the seat of Judgment,
And striving to distinguish Truth from Falsehood,
To uncoil the tangled knot of human Error
And solve the riddle of capricious Fortune,
Beheld a vision.

"Suddenly before me,
Instead of busy mart and swarming people,
I saw on level of mine eyes, uplifted,
A mountain summit, bathed in light Eternal,
With sharp cold pinnacles of ice and granite,
'Mid which there stood, each touching close the other,
Three thrones of adamant with golden footstools,
And on them seated three celestial maidens,
In robes of grey, with crowns upon their foreheads,
And in their pale white hands three silver sceptres.

"Most beautiful they were, but sad and solemn.
Their brows were heavy with supernal wisdom;
Their deep dark eyes shone passionless and starlike,
As if the great world-pageant spread beneath them,
And mirrored in their orbs, were but the shadow
Of mighty purpose hidden in the silence
Of their inscrutable will, on which for ever
And evermore they turned their inward glances.
Serene and calm they seemed, and yet most mournful;
As men might be if God had given them knowledge
Of misery to come, but had denied them
All right or power to lessen or avert it.

* * * * * *

"The three calm sisters saw me not, nor heeded:
But gazing there alone, and sore bewildered,
I felt the need of human speech and counsel,
And found them suddenly. Beside me standing,
Partakers with me of the heavenly vision,
I saw a little child, a five-year infant,
With mild blue eyes and hair of golden lustre;
A youth in prime of over lusty vigour;
And an old man, bowed down with care and sorrow,
And hoary with the weight of eighty winters.

"'See!' said the child, and plucked me by the garments
'How beautiful they are—the lovely maidens—
Smiles on their lips and crowns upon their foreheads!'
The young man shuddered; his right hand was bloody:
I saw the stains of murder as he raised it
To cover up his eyes. 'Their hair is snaky,
Their looks assassinate, their breath is poison,
They read my inmost secrets to denounce me.
Oh! let me fly to darkness and the Desert,
To Hell itself, if only to escape them—
The furious, terrible, avenging Horrors!

"The old man sighed: 'They look on me reproachful—
They speak to me, although thou canst not hear them,
And tell me of my miserable errors—
My promise unfulfilled—my glory tarnished—
My opportunities misused, perverted,
And lost for ever! More than this; they tell me
Of grievous wrong committed, unatoned for—
Of life that had no object but indulgence
In selfish passion. I would die most gladly
If they would only cease to look upon me,
And let me pass into the quiet Hades,
As the stone sinks into the deep sea caverns,
And lies untroubled and forgot for ever."

"'Behold the sisters three!' a soft voice whispered,
Far in the upper air; or in my spirit:
'Behold the Fates! the dreadful yet auspicious;
Regents of Earth and Heaven, of Man and Nature;
Good to the good, and terrible to the wicked,
Just and inflexible. Behold, and fear not!'

* * * * * *

"The still voice spake no more—my soul was silent,
And lifting up my head from mine abasement
I looked around; and lo! I sat in judgment
On mine accustomed seat, and heard around me
The murmur of the people.—Heed the vision,
Ye who come up to me to plead for Justice!
Those who miscall the pleasant Fates, the Furies, Condemn themselves. The Fates are as we make them."

There is a somewhat saddened tone pervading many of the pieces, but we can forgive a little sadness when it is not egotistical, particularly if we perceive that the poet is blithe of heart on fitting occasions, and rejoices in the good as well as deplores the evil. Thus "Heart-sore in Babylon," which consists of twelve cantos, is, as the title suggests, very mournful, but in the last canto, called "The Last Estate," hope triumphs over sorrow:—

"What signify the care and pain
That I must yet endure,
The loss of Love—the Love in vain,
The crime of being poor?

"I've an estate of solid earth,
Nor broad nor very deep,
Where cold winds blow and daisies grow,
And moonlight shadows sleep

"'Tis six feet long and two feet wide,
Shut out from sorrow's call
It shall be mine some happy day
Enough, though it be small.

"Till trump of doom it shall be mine,
And make me rich for all—
Lost health, lost heart, lost love, lost hope,
More than amends for all."

There is in this volume of Dr. Mackay's a great variety of subject and style, though the grave pieces are never morbid, and the gay ebullitions are such as the gravest of us can read without the slightest offence. We shall conclude by quoting a song, entitled "The Little Man":—

"There was a little, very little,
Quiet little man,
He wore a little overcoat
The colour of the tan;
And when his weekly wage was earned
On Saturday at night,
He had but half-a-crown to spare
To keep his spirit light;
'But that,' quoth he, and twirled his thumb,
So blithe he was, and free,
'Is quite enough for happiness
For a little man like me.'

"And oft this little, very little,
Happy little man,
Would talk a little to himself
About the the great world's plan:
'Though people think me very poor,
I feel I'm very glad,
And this I'm sure could scarcely be
If I were very bad.
Rich knaves who cannot rest o' nights
At every turn I see,
While cosy sleep unbidden comes
To a quiet man like me.

"'For though I'm little, very little,
Do whate'er I can,
Yet every morning, when I shave,
I shave an honest man;
And every night when I go home,
My winsome little wife
Receives me smiling at the door,
And loves me more than life:—
And this is joy that kings themselves,
If thoughts were spoken free,
Might give their sceptres to exchange
With a little man like me.

"'And I've a little, quite a little,
Bonnie little child,
A little maid with golden hair,
And blue eyes bright and mild;
She sits and prattles on my knee,
She's merry as a song,
She's pleasant as a ray of light,
She keeps my heart from wrong.
And so, let kingdoms rise or fall,
I'll earn my daily fee,
And think the world is good enough
For a little man like me.'"

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

New Orleans, February 6.

THE "FREE STATE CONVENTION."—THE CANDIDATES: THEIR CHARACTERS AND ANTECEDENTS.—THE FEDERAL COMMITTEE MEN.—THE "CONSERVATIVE UNION PARTY."—ORDER 23.—YANKEE NEGRO SLAVERY.—FREEDOM OF ELECTION.—CASES OF "DISLOYALTY AND SEDITION."—THE LATE H. E. WALWORTH.

Social and political questions absorb for the present the attention of all in this Department. The military situation is regarded as of secondary importance by the side of the fast consummating restoration fraud, or the adoption of Mr. Lincoln's "decimal system," as the one-tenth scheme is termed. The so-called Free State Convention, composed mainly of adventurers from the North, met on Monday last, but the hungry place-hunters quarreled over the distribution of the anticipated spoils, and fully one-half withdrew to a "Convention" elsewhere. Both wings have now their tickets in the field, all the candidates in both being pledged to "wipe out slavery." It is being "wiped out" very fast in the freedmen's camps along the Mississippi, where slavery is buried at the rate of several hundred per day. For the amusement of the Louisianians abroad I subjoin the two tickets of the "Free State men." For Governor, Michael Hahn; for Lieutenant-Governor, J. M. Wells; for Secretary of State, J. Wrolnoski; for Treasurer, Dr. Balden; for Attorney-General, Charles W. Horner; for Auditor of Public Accounts, A. A. Atocha; for Superintendent of Public Education, John McNair. The above ticket is understood to receive the support of the commanding-general. The candidates of the seceders are:—for Governor, B. F. Flanders; for Lieut.-Governor, J. M. Wells; for Secretary of State, John. C. White; for Treasurer, Dr. A Shelley; for Attorney-General, Charles W. Horner; for Auditor of Public Accounts, William M. Abbot; for Superintendent of Public Education, B. L. Brown. Many of these are new and strange names to the citizens of this city, but they, with the few unprincipled residents who have sold their birthright for a mess of potage, are the only tools to be found willing to consummate the fraud, treachery, corruption, and executive despotism involved in the "restoration." Michael Hahn is a notary public, publicly noted as a demagogue of much pretension among the masses. He is a German by birth, but has resided here since infancy. His character may be judged from the fact that he voluntarily took the oath of allegiance to the Confederate States, and was prominent before the fall of New Orleans as a speaker on the occasion of presenting flags, swords, &c. B. F. Flanders is a Yankee peda-

[redacted] who was cast out of [redacted] General Lovell, after having been [redacted] by [redacted] and [redacted] through Western Louisiana. A [redacted] power[ful] [redacted] Constitution, which [redacted] and [redacted] to the [redacted] here some twelve months. It would be [redacted] that he is therefore a citizen of the state. [redacted] reasonable for Banks and his gang to claim [redacted] in Louisiana. Old citizens tell me that [redacted] Orleans, his father being at that time a [redacted] ball room in the French part of the city. [redacted] for the North soon after the birth of [redacted] had not returned until General Banks' arrival [redacted] paying them "honour even unto" to rebel [redacted] to each candidate. With few exceptions, [redacted] citizens of this State, have no interest here, never had, never intend to have any. They are the purchased tools of the Lincoln Government, bought to do the work of a party that laughs at honesty, honour, and principle, as well as the restraints of law and the Constitution. In civil communities like that now agitating this country, it is no uncommon thing to see just such wretches as these rise to prominent positions in the State. Being without principle, and wholly unscrupulous in the pursuit of their aims, their advancement is rapid, and their career of success may be taken as the true measure of how far society has departed from its normal condition. Curran has aptly described such accidental demagogues as, "buoyant by putrefaction, rising as they rot."

And yet it is to these men the restoration of Louisiana to the Union is entrusted, and it is with them the commanding general corresponds relative to so weighty a matter, and to the qualifications of voters, virtually conceding to them (vide Letter to the Free State Central Committee) the right to decide whether or not those who took the oath of allegiance within the sixty day proclamation (under Bailey's regime) should vote at the coming election without also taking the ironclad oath, as it is called, appended to Lincoln's Proclamation of December last. The social character of some of these "Free State men" is such that no gentleman should recognise them. Banks has selected from among them a committee to report upon the basis of representation, with a view to the abolition of the three-fifths (of slave population) basis. One of the said committee is a quack, or herb "doctor," who hawked his simples—villanous poisons—around the streets of New Orleans on a wooden tray strapped around his neck, and a card on his breast bearing in large letters the advertisement, "DEATH TO RATS," a poison for the destruction of this vermin being his chief article in trade. Would that there were some social poison for ridding the body politic of such vermin as he!

Remember the character of the Unionists in Louisiana when you hear the Yankees talk of the people of Arkansas and Tennessee, of St. Augustine, Florida, and of Newbern, North Carolina, returning to the Union. Ere this reaches you the Federal governor, supported by Federal bayonets, will have been inaugurated here. Yet will Louisiana still cling with unfaltering faith and unconquerable love to the fortunes of her sister Confederate States. The Federal employés and Yankee adventurers here can go through the mockery of electing a governor, but he cannot be, and dare not try to be, anything but a puppet in the hands of military power—an unsubstantial sham that passes away with the power that called it forth. I enclose a copy of Banks's letter to the Free State Central Committee, upon reading which you will learn with how lordly an air these Jacobins carry themselves, and what cant and deference the commanding general pays them. Banks is a presidential aspirant, and Louisiana, restored to the Union, will have several votes to give in the nominating convention.

A number of very respectable gentlemen, styling themselves the "Conservative Union Party," are trying to stem the torrent of Jacobin Radicalism which has set in upon us from the North; but they might as well attempt to put out a fire on the prairie with a watering-pot. They will be overwhelmed, and with them, every vestige of civil liberty that bars the progress of the fanatics and mobocrats of the North. They held a very imposing meeting on the evening of the 4th instant in the St. Charles theatre, a very large building, which was filled to overflowing. The attendance was of a highly respectable character, hundreds of Confederates being present to hear what one faction of the Unionists had to say of the other, and truth to say, the "Rebels" were well pleased with what they heard. The speakers were J. Ad. Rozier and Christian Roselius, Esqs., two eminent members of the bar of New Orleans, and to their credit be it told, they uttered many brave words in defence of the citizens' civil and political rights, not even shrinking from severe but just criticism of certain positions taken by General Banks in his recent proclamations. They bitterly denounced the "ironclad oath" and the dicta of the commanding general in General Orders, 23, that "indifference was crime and faction treason." But what boots it—all this indignant denunciation of tyranny? Might makes right; and General Banks wields as absolute a power in this department as does the Czar in Russia. He sets aside the Constitution and the laws made in accordance therewith, anticipates and ignores the actions of Congress, robs the citizen of all appeal to the courts, and forestals even the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. Look at the condition of affairs in this State, read the orders and edicts he allowed to see the light, and then say whether I have done him injustice.

The latest edict is of the date of the 4th inst., prescribing "regulations for the information and government of all interested in the subject of compensated plantation labour, public or private, during the present year, and in continuation of the system established January 30th, 1863."

Not content with prescribing regulations for plantation labour, the general launches forth into frothy declamation, interspersed with glittering generalities about social and political economy, the social compact, civil rights and duties, obligations of resident aliens, capital and labour, with all the "spread-eagle" fustian and jargon usual in stump oratory, closing after the manner of the Mexican patriots' pronunciamento, "God preserve the Union of the States! By order of Major-General Banks,"—a very singular mingling of the Creator and the creature. I subjoin the main portions of "the Regulations":—

"I.—The enlistment of soldiers from plantations under cultivation in this department having been suspended by order of the Government, will not be resumed except upon direction of the same high authority.

"II.—The Provost-Marshal-General is instructed to provide for the division of parishes into police and school districts, and to organise, from invalid soldiers, a competent police force for the preservation of order.

"III.—Provision will be made for the establishment of a [redacted]

"VI.—[redacted]

"VII.—[redacted]

"VIII.—[redacted]

"IX.—[redacted]

"X.—[redacted]

"XI.—[redacted]

"XII.—Labourers shall render to the employer, [redacted] during 10 out of each 24 hours, [redacted] hours [redacted] winter, or [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] clothing, quarters, fuel, [redacted] for children; wages per month [redacted] half of which, at least, shall be [redacted] the year:—

For first-class hands	.. ..	$ per month.
For second-class hands	.. ..	6 "
For third-class hands	.. ..	5 "
For fourth-class hands	.. ..	4 "

Engineers and foremen, when faithful in the discharge of their duties, will be paid $2 per month extra. The [redacted] of wages may be commuted, by consent of both parties, at the rate of one-fourteenth part of the net proceeds of the crop, to be determined and paid at the end of the year. Wages will be deducted in case of sickness, and rations also, when sickness is feigned. Intolerance, insolence, incumbrance of others, and crime, will be suppressed by forfeiture of pay, and such punishments as are provided for similar offences by army regulations. Sunday work will be avoided when practicable, but when necessary, will be considered as extra labour, and paid at the rates specified herein.

"XIII.—Labourers will be permitted to choose their employers, but when the agreement is made, they will be held to their engagement for the year, under the protection of the Government. In cases of attempted imposition, by feigning sickness, or stubborn refusal of duty, they will be turned over to the Provost-Marshal of the parish, for labour upon the public works, without pay.

"XIV.—Labourers will be permitted to cultivate land on private account, as herein specified, as follows:—
1st and 2nd class hands, with families .....one acre each;
1st and 2nd class hands, without families, one-half acre each;
2nd and 3rd class hands, with families....one-half acre each;
2nd and 3rd class hands, without families....one-quarter do.;
to be increased for good conduct at the discretion of the employer. No exemption will be made in this appointment, except upon imperative reasons, and it is desirable that for good conduct the quantity be increased until faithful hands can be allowed to cultivate extensive tracts, returning to the owner an equivalent of product for rent of soil.

"XV.—To protect the labourer from possible imposition, no commutation of his supplies will be allowed, except in clothing, which may be commuted at the rate of $3 per month for first-class hands, and in similar proportion for other classes. The crops will stand pledged, wherever found, for the wages of labour.

"XVI.—It is advised, as far as practicable, that employers provide for the current wants of their hands, by per quisites for extra labour, or by appropriation of land for share cultivation; to discourage monthly payments so far as it can be done without discontent, and to reserve till the full harvest the yearly wages.

"XVII.—A Free Labour Bank will be established for the safe deposit of all accumulations of wages and other savings and in order to avoid a possible wrong to depositors, by official defalcation, authority will be asked to connect the bank with the Treasury of the United States in this department.

"XVIII.—The transportation of negro families to other countries will not be approved. All propositions for this privilege have been declined, and application has been made to other departments for surplus negro families for service in this department."

Can any unprejudiced man read the above and tell me the system of slave labour is destroyed in Louisiana? So absolute a system as this, enforced as it will be with the iron hand of military power, was never dreamed of by the worst of Mrs. Stowe's ideal "lords of the whip and branding iron." Surely poor Sambo has reason to cry out "Save me from my friends!" Such are the fruits of the dishonest abolition philanthropy of the North, of the people that vaunt themselves as the Heaven-elected labourers "in the interests of God and humanity." The honest Abolitionists of England should be undeceived. The North is not fighting for the abolition of slavery nor for a restoration of the Union, but to possess itself of the property of the South, the land and negroes, and thereby retain the control of the great staple productions of this region. The Yankee Puritan's shibboleth of "the flag," "the glorious Union," "the crime of slavery," "the best government the world ever saw," &c. &c., ad nauseam, is all fudge, and he has but a poor opinion of any man that believes in the sincerity of his declarations.

The Yankee is a money-making animal. How he makes or gets it, provided he does get it, does not matter much to him. Just now he finds it quite profitable to proclaim himself a labourer "in the interests of God and humanity."—an Aminadab Sleek on a grand-national-e-pluribus-unum-manifest-destiny-esto-perpetua scale—pretending to the broadest philanthropy, while his heart is filled with malice and all uncharitableness towards those he was once proud to call his fellow citizens, his brethren.

The decree of extermination proclaimed against the Southern people, the Emancipation Proclamation, so-called, and the Confiscation laws, were begotten as much in rapacity as in hate, as so many aids to a gigantic scheme of spoliation and robbery.

In this Order, No. 23, General Banks says:—

"Those who profess allegiance to other Governments will be required, as the condition of residence in this State, to acquiesce, without reservation, in the demands presented by Government as a basis of permanent peace. The non-cultivation of the soil without just reason will be followed by temporary forfeiture to those who will secure its improvement. Those who have exercised, or are entitled to the rights of citizens of the United States, will be required to participate in the measures necessary for the re-establishment of civil government. Open hostility cannot be permitted. Indifference will be treated as crime, and faction as treason. Men who refuse to defend their country with the ballot-box or cartridge-box, have no just claim to the benefits of liberty regulated by law. All people not exempt by the law of nations, who seek the protection of the Government, are called upon to take the oath of allegiance in such form as may be prescribed, sacrificing to the public good and the restoration of public peace whatever scruple may be suggested by incidental considerations. Whoever is indifferent or hostile must choose between the liberty which foreign lands afford, the poverty of the rebel States, and the innumerable and inappreciable blessings which our Government confers upon its people."

A good deal of this is so vague, so very Delphic in its structure, that one is at a loss how to construe it definitely. It is plain, however, that the planter will be forced at the point of the bayonet to grow cotton and sugar for the benefit of the Yankee manufacturers and commission merchants and the internal revenue. It is clear, too, that foreigners are not regarded with much favour, and it is equally clear that the declaration that, "indifference will be treated as crime, and faction as treason," is not an idle threat, at least as far as the Federal minions in power here can have their way. I quote the following from the True Delta newspaper, a Union journal edited by Michael Hahn, Banks's candidate for governor:—

"Neu trality Objected to.—A tall, red-faced individual and a much younger one, were before the court to-day on the charge of using treasonable language. Recorder Vennard investigated the matter, and it became clear that the taller and elder proclaimed to be a citizen of the United States and his neutrality as to the approaching election. For this the younger one had rebuked the other, with the remark that it was the duty of every citizen to comprehend and comply with the 24th section of the proclamation of the commanding general, dated 3rd instant. He held that it was a crime for a citizen of the United States to stand by pretended neutrality between the Government and its wise purposes. Recorder Vennard said that was sound doctrine; in times like these men take sides, and he who is not for the Government is against it. The recorder commended the young man for his patriotic instructions, and left the other one the choice to pay a fine of $15 or to go for a term to the workhouse for controverting patriotic doctrines."

A rather amusing case of "sedition" is thus reported in the same journal:—

"Sedition.—Two little darkeys had made up their minds to abuse each other. In this duel of mortifying insinuation the one called the other 'cross-eyed Butler.' This was too much for the other party to stand. He applied to the law and prosecuted his adversary for seditious language. Recorder Beaumont heard the case, and appeared to consider whether to send both to prison or not. He solved the point by sending the accused for five days."

There are few Louisianians who have not heard of H. F. Walworth, of Baton Rouge, now deceased. He was a warm friend of the Confederate cause, and proved his zeal by frequent liberal contributions. The New Orleans Picayune thus speaks of his will:—

"Yesterday the will of Horace Fayette Walworth, of East Baton Rouge, was admitted to probate in the Second District Court of this city. Deceased was a man of great wealth, his property in real estate and money, being estimated at $400,000. Several years before his death he became blind, and in the darkness which followed this afflicting visitation he reflected much on the advantages of books for the blind, and resolved to devote a portion of his fortune to the procuring of a proper supply. Of his estate he gave $250,000 to an adopted daughter and another lady, and most of the residue he devoted to the purpose of establishing a printing-office for the weekly publication of 'a paper or magazine to be distributed gratuitously among the blind of the Confederate States of America, or for sale to such as are able and willing to pay for the same.'" Item six of the will provides, that in the event of the death of the legatees before him, and without their leaving issue, then and in that case he devotes all the property that he shall die possessed of to the support of the paper or magazine above mentioned. The legatees named to carry out the benevolent intentions of the testator are, the Governor of Louisiana, the State Auditor, the Treasurer, the Chief Justice, the Mayor of New Orleans, the minister of the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, the rector of the oldest Episcopal Church of New Orleans, the Bishop of the Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Louisiana, and the ministers of the oldest Methodist Church of New Orleans for the time being, and their successors in the several offices and positions for ever.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York, February 16.

PROSPECTS OF THE SPRING CAMPAIGN.—THE MORALE OF THE CONFEDERATE AND FEDERAL ARMIES.—THE FALSE REPORTS OF THE NORTHERN PRESS.—THE FLORIDA EXPEDITION.—THE SHAM ELECTIONS IN LOUISIANA, ARKANSAS, AND TENNESSEE.—LESSONS TAUGHT BY THE ACTS OF THE WASHINGTON ADMINISTRATION.—THE CONFISCATION BILL.—THE ENROLMENT BILL.—THE WHISKY TAX.

The extremely mild weather which has been prevailing for several weeks gives promise of an early opening of the campaign in the spring. There is great activity in preparation on both sides, and there will undoubtedly be gigantic efforts made on both sides, such as have not been made before during the war, to bring it to a close in some decisive way during the summer. It is the Northern hope to do this by overwhelming the Southern armies at all points by superior numbers, pushed on with a vigour not yet put forth by any of the Federal generals. General Grant is the "coming" man by whom these crushing triumphs are expected to be directed. The South, on the contrary, looks to baffle superior numbers by superior discipline, by concentration, activity, and the indomitable energy which inspires men fighting on their own soil for freedom and independence against a cruel invasion, which menaces them with utter ruin and degradation, the seizure of their possessions, and political slavery under the stranger in their own land.

Concurrent accounts from the South, which have at length made a deep impression on the public mind here, show that the Southern armies, instead of being disorganised by despondency and depleted by desertion, are largely recruited, and will present a formidable and well-disciplined front at all the principal points at which the invading columns may aim. The stories of mutinous regiments and crowds of deserters seeking their way into the Union camps, with which Northern confidence of a speedy dissolution of the Confederacy was lately so much inflated, have tapered off into rumours repeated and discredited until they are laughed at as absurd exaggerations by a few runaways, such as are to be found in all armies, and who shift their places from one side to the other either for ease or plunder. In the Southern accounts appear—what is of course never repeated on this side—reports of the swarming in certain localities of great numbers of deserters from the Federal ranks, coming into the Confederate lines, or lurking in squads on debatable grounds, and depredating as the chances turn up on either side.

There is lurking confession of the existence of this state of things near Washington City, in the explanation lately made in the Government papers of the probable authors of a late audacious attack upon an express train near Harper's Ferry, and the robbery of the passengers by a party of armed men. It was immediately surmised that it could not be a force of Confederates, but must have been a "gang of robbers" from the loyal States, and probably deserting Federal soldiers. There is no longer any faith seriously entertained that there is any discontent in the Southern army or in the Southern people with the cause in which they are engaged, or that there will not be the most powerful and concentrated effort possible made and continued to fight this battle out, for independence, to the last extremity; and that, whatever may be the issue of an engagement or a campaign, there will never be among the masses of the Southern people, now, or among their children after them, anything but inextinguishable animosity and perpetual resistance to the North.

You will see in the journals the proclamation of Jefferson Davis, returning in a few, simple, and eloquent words the thanks of the Government for the unanimity with which the Confederate soldiers have re-enlisted for the war. Well does he appreciate the contrast between this spirit of heroic and self-sacrificing devotion by the Confederate soldier of heart and arm to the holy cause of a country which cannot pay and can but scantily feed and clothe him, with that of the despotic and sordid North, which, with four times the numbers of the South, can only fill up its armies by tempting mercenaries from abroad, and holding out to the unemployed labourers, whose conscience it first constrains and then debauches, the lure of such extravagant bounties as were never given before for bloodshedding in war, and the promise of such plunder as never before glutted the rapacity of a freebooter.

In this difference between the character of the material of the opposing forces in the immense advantage of being on the shorter lines of a defence, and with the power of more rapid concentration, and above all, in the difference of morale between the contending forces, rests the faith which seems to pervade the Southern mind, and to be received here among the few who are faithful to the cause of civil liberty which the South is fighting for, that the new invasion will be signally repulsed, and that the close of the next campaign will find the conquest of the South as remote as ever, and the North again foiled, and possibly turned from its fell purpose of destroying and enslaving the people of the South, to consider how it may save itself from internal convulsions, bankruptcy, and ruin.

In the near prospect of the commencement of active operations, the journals affecting inspiration from the War Department are speculating on the plans for the campaign, and pointing out how, and from what quarters, the devoted Confederacy is to be assailed and overwhelmed. These are idle—or artful—men's fancies, or possibly the promptings from official quarters, meant to mislead. It has during the last season been repeatedly found that the press has been systematically used by the authorities to create false impressions of military movements. An idle notion seems to have filled the heads of the Secretary of War and the generals that a good way to deceive the "rebels" is to cause false intelligence to be published in the newspapers, and to create, by accounts which might be taken as official, the expectation of movements not intended to be executed, as well as to give false versions of the results of what has been attempted. There is an inside inducement for this: that a knowledge of what is really true—such as is not given to the public, but confided to a few confidential friends—helps them to speculate safely and make fortunes out of this official imposture, which makes deliberate lying one of the indispensable virtues of loyalty. But the practice has grown stale. Little credit is given to statements which emanate from these sources; and the nearer any statement of what the Government intends to do comes to a "semi-official," a "thoroughly well-informed," or "entirely reliable source," the more it begins to be scrutinised as probably containing a premeditated mystification, out of which some favourite of the Government calculates to make money; the excuse for which, if it be afterwards questioned, is, that it was meant to mislead Jefferson Davis, or General Lee, or General Beauregard: as if those personages are guided by what they read in the Yankee newspapers.

I see no change in the military position worth advising of. The expedition from Charleston sent down into Florida is not a military, but a political expedition. Florida is a large State in area, with a very sparse population; it is of no military importance, and is not defended by any Confederate forces. Its fate, as a member of the Confederacy, depends entirely on the result of the great combinations elsewhere. The occupation by a Union army, in large numbers, detached from the forces already engaged elsewhere, has the only intelligible purpose of prosecuting the Government project of creating new States out of the subjugated portions of the old States, to represent in the Congress of the United States and in the elections the party now in power. The President's theory of reconstruction has a very clear field there. Florida cast at the Presidential election of 1860, 10,357 votes. If the army of the United States can occupy enough of the territory to include one-tenth of this number—that is to say, 1036 voters—these men may, under Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, accepting his terms of amnesty, erect a new State, to be received into the Union, with two senators in Congress and one representative to vote at the next election for President, casting the three votes of the State in the Colleges, and if the election fails there, to give one vote for the State, potential as the vote of the largest of the States, in the final election in the House of Representatives.

The example of what is going on in Louisiana shows that there is a fixed determination by the authorities that the requisite number of voters to satisfy the President's purpose shall be obtained. The manner of securing it exhibits the last shape in which the theory of republican government clothes itself in this country.

The election in Louisiana for a new State Government on the model prescribed by Mr. Lincoln, has been ordered by the commanding general to take place on the 22nd of February. About 5000 votes of persons qualified under the laws of the State, are needed to make up the tale of the new constituency. It had become evident that the old inhabitants of the State would abstain from voting. Not merely those hostile in their feeling to the foreign rule imposed upon them were disposed to keep aloof from the creating of a new government for which they have no sympathy, but moderate Unionists revolted from voting under the dictation from Washington for a form of government to which they have conscientious scruples, as adverse to the true interests and territorial rights of Louisiana, as a State already in existence and not yet lawfully extinguished. In all of Louisiana within the Federal control the Government despaired of obtaining, with all its facilities for multiplying voters, the 5,000 Louisianians to record themselves as the pardoned convicts of Mr. Lincoln, doing his will in an election instead of their own.

A new order has come forth by which neutrality and silence are made as criminal as opposition. It had been already decreed that no person shall be allowed to vote who does not, in addition to the general oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States, take the oath to support the proclamation and other edicts of the President, and all the acts of Congress, and to aid in enforcing them everywhere in the State. It is now further ordered that every man who refuses or omits to vote on these terms, shall be held as a declared enemy of the United States, and must forfeit his property and quit the State! The privilege of quiet submission is refused to the vanquished. The privilege to have a choice among the various shades and parties of the conquerors is denied to the conservative loyalist who has the slightest scruple in regard to any of the acts of the Government party at Washington. A "Free State" is be formed by putting the power to control the whole population into the hands of one-tenth of the number; and this tenth are to be oath-bound to do the will of the President, and their allegiance to him made the condition on which alone they are permitted to remain in the State.

The following are among the passages of the military orders by which the commanding general of the district regulates this process for creating a vassal State.

"It is a solemn duty resting upon all persons to assist in the earliest possible restoration of civil government. Let them participate in measures suggested for this purpose. Opinion is free and candidates are numerous. Open hostility cannot be permitted. Indifference will be treated as crime, and faction as treason. Men who refuse to defend their country with the ballot-box or cartridge-box, have no just claim to the benefits of liberty regulated by law.

"The amnesty offered for the past is conditioned upon an unreserved loyalty for the future, and this condition will be enforced with an iron hand. Whoever is indifferent or hostile must choose between the liberty which foreign lands afford, the poverty of the Rebel States, and the innumerable and inappreciable blessings which our Government confers upon its people."

This is the brief but terrible code, to be promulgated in this boasted land of republican freedom.

Every man must vote on the "measures suggested" by the Government. Opinions are free as to candidates, but opposition to measures will not be tolerated. Men may think what they please, but they must vote as directed. Indifference will be treated as a crime, and faction as treason. A refusal to vote as directed will be held as proof of the crime and the treason. The penalty for the offence is banishment from the State, and confiscation of property follows of course.

Old original Unionists, the very few among respectable citizens who have held to the Union from the beginning, remonstrate against this "iron" rule, but in vain.

The march of a large body of troops into thinly populated districts of Florida has the same reconstructing process in view. If one thousand of the inhabitants can be found so abject in spirit as to welcome the invaders, or so utterly helpless as to be unable to abandon their homes to escape from the "iron-hand" with which General Banks threatens the indifferent within his province—can be seduced or terrified into becoming the sworn followers of the head of the Government—there is another State made ready to vote for its master at the next election.

Arkansas is nearly reconstructed under the same rule from Washington. It has had its Convention framed on the Administration pattern, with the additional fact that after the Constitution was framed and thought to be sufficiently loyal, the President disapproved of a part of it, and altered it by his own mere order.

Tennessee is undergoing a similar process, under the superintendence of its military governor, Andrew Johnson, who is in Washington, representing that the Government is not rigorous enough with the rebels and the indifferent there, and asking additional power to compel men to vote on the Administration standard of loyalty, or be held to the penalties for treason—banishment and confiscation.

These are a few of the latest public manifestations of the true character of that ferocious despotism which, in the name of "republic," administers at Washington an autocracy as stern and remorseless as that of Russian or Turk. They may help to enlighten the English public on the "innumerable and inappreciable blessings"—to quote the boasting words of General Banks—which the successful imitation of this model, recommended so strongly by their Cobdens and their Brights, would confer upon the people of England, whenever a frenzy of desire shall seize upon a majority in numbers to oppress and plunder the others. Another practical conclusion useful to them in estimating the moral power of the Southern cause is, that even within the reconquered territory not even one-tenth of the inhabitants can be brought to take sides with the intrusive Government, except by the employment of the most tremendous engines of persecution and terror. Another is, that a real revolution in the whole character of the Government has been effected, and that if there were not enough in the original provisions to their injury of which the South complained, and to resist which they determined to withdraw and seek better protection in independence, there is enough in the terrible developments of Northern tyranny, rapacity, and lawlessness, to justify revolution, or rebellion, if the word be preferred, in order to escape from such associates.

The leading measures of legislation before Congress have been further debated, but are not yet completed. The confiscation scheme has got through the house, by a majority of eight votes—small, but sufficient. The effect is to take off the limitation imposed by the Act of 1862 upon the operation of the power of confiscation therein contained, so as to confine it, in respect to real estate, to the lifetime of the offender. There is substituted a declaration that the confiscation shall be as unlimited as the Constitution will permit. To make it universal and perpetual a further declaratory clause was added. Confiscation, by the Act of 1862, was made by the President, under the military power, on the proof of treason afforded by the neglect to accept the terms of pardon offered by the President in a proclamation he was directed to issue, giving sixty days to the inhabitants of insurgent States, within which to make their submission. The time of the proclamation expired in September, after which all persons who had neglected to take advantage of it were liable, as confessed traitors, to all the penalties of the Act. The declaratory resolution which has passed the House, enacts, in substance, that no other public proceedings shall be required than that proclamation to determine the status of a Southern "rebel," and to forfeit his property. In this way the confiscation policy is thought to be made universal and perpetual, and to escape the constitutional inhibitions, which are construed as being directed only against persons convicted after judicial trial. The theory is, that by condemning before trial, or without it, the penalties may be inflicted which the Constitution forbids after judgment. There is no doubt that the Senate will concur in these provisions as soon as they read the Bill. The Enrolment Bill for conscription has also passed the House, in a form to be reconsidered in the Senate, where it originated. It is thought certain that it will finally be adopted, with the commutation clause of $300 included; but that the exemption for that sum shall only last for the single draft, and only until the numbers drawn therein shall be exhausted, when the names of the exempt by commutation shall be added. The enrolment is to be made of all able-bodied free men, between the ages of 20 and 45, and all able-bodied slaves between 18 and 45. It is a very severe bill, and causes great apprehensions among both poor and rich. There is immense difficulty in getting recruits with the lure of enormous bounties and the terrors of drafting. The volunteering is not even so brisk as it seems to be, for large numbers take the bounty and are not to be found when the regiment is called to march. One regiment here reported itself full after a short recruiting, and when the order came to move less than a hundred men appeared, and it was sent to quarters until enough could be gathered in to make a respectable show.

The Senate, under the influence of the speculators, struck out the House-tax on whisky "in hand," which would put some millions of dollars into the pockets of some shrewd politicians, who, acting on some hint of what was going to be done, bought largely of whisky for a rise, not expecting the tax to reach their purchases. Mr. Fernando Wood, a city member, in opposing the Senate measure of relief, stated that he knew of three men in New York, "not traders," who had nearly a hundred thousand barrels. Thus the release of the tax would give them nearly, if not quite, two millions of profit, which would otherwise be paid to the Government. There was a large ring formed of politicians for this speculation; and, notwithstanding the opposition in the House of Representatives, which still holds out against the Senate, I think it will succeed. The tax will be removed, or a compromise effected between the two Houses, by which they will get at least half. They are too strong at the political headquarters to be defeated.

The Lower House of Congress passed an Act creating the office of Lieutenant-General, intending it for General Grant, and made a special request to the President to confer it, conferring the command of the army in chief on that general. The Senate demurs, and the President is said to demur, and General Halleck, the present general-in-chief, is said also to demur, and the resolution, therefore, hangs in the Senate. There is great envy of Grant as a possible and probable candidate for the Presidency, and some doubt whether the Congress is not too fast in rewarding him for what he has done, before a test comes by which it might be shown that they make a mistake in setting him up so high.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

Manchester, March 2.

Whether or not the exertions of the friends of the Confederacy are in all particulars as well directed as they might be, there is happily no doubt that the Southern cause is becoming every day more unquestionably indebted to the action of its enemies. The most recent move of the Northern sympathisers here is notably characterised by this curiously beneficent tendency. The avowed object of their new scheme is neither more nor less than to cajole us into making some substantial return to the Yankees for their generosity to us in the matter of the George Griswold. "Manchester," says one of those ever ready letter writers who seem to be always at the elbow of the editor of the Examiner, "should not forget that the Americans sent out a great quantity of flour to relieve the distress in Lancashire," and, overlooking the fine opportunity of protesting against the Rev. Arthur Mursell's wish that the ship had been scuttled in the waters of the Mersey and her owners indemnified twofold for the vessel and her freight, the correspondent contents himself with adding that "he encloses a sailing's worth of stamps," in the hope that "some of the leading men in the city will feel themselves moved to carry out his suggestion." And what does his "suggestion" amount to? Why, this: that the miseries of the wretched negroes, the so-called "coloured refugees"—the aged, the sick, the helpless women and the young children—who, having been philanthropically deprived of lawful guardianship, protection, and care, are perishing by hundreds in daily testimony of their "deliverance,"—might be judiciously capitalised by the pro-Federal party in Manchester, who, while forging out of such pathetic materials a public appeal to our pity and our purse, could, by a side wind, turn our philanthropy to account in such a way that, unless the deception were too apparent, Mr. Adams would not feel it incumbent upon him to expose the trick to his Government! One's first thought upon the mere statement of such a suggestion is—alas, for the poor negro! Three years ago, while he was in the enjoyment of all he now so sorely misses, it was for his happiness' sake we were implored to sympathise with the only enemy he had: to-day, it is for his miseries' sake we are asked to sanction the unparalleled atrocities which have ended in his undoing. His case is indeed a hard one, and in nothing harder than this: that, in its most pitiable phase, it is about to be traded upon by philanthropists, who postpone compassion to politics. Sympathy for the forlorn wretches, one might hope, a feeling common to us all, but the idea of deriving political profit from the extremity of suffering they have helped to bring upon us could only have originated with the people of the Confederate Emancipation Society, and might safely be sworn to as their private property in a court of law.

The natural contempt inspired by the contemplation of artifices such as these is tending to unite a liberal minded men more and more on the side of the Confederacy. The aversion felt for the North would not be nearly so rooted and general but for the damning advocacy of its friends. It one were to disassociate in his mind the warlike policy of President Lincoln from the mixture of hypocrisy and humanitarianism attempted to be inculcated by the pro-Federalists in England—and not less by those in Lancashire than by those in London—it would be surprising to find how much of the unpopularity of their cause the Yankees owe to Messrs Cobden, Bright, Baptist Noel, Forster, the Star, and the President of the Union and Emancipation Society (Mr. T. Potter). Even to this day, President Lincoln, when addressed by any of our local anti-slavery associations, whether for purposes of condolence or congratulation, has the honesty and good sense not to speak of his emancipation proclamation as other than a war measure, although in a somewhat curious instance which has just come to my knowledge he appears to have instructed Mr. Adams to throw some sort of sop—so far as mystifying words go—to the anti-slavery Cerberus. The case was this: early in the year, when the Right Hon. Milner Gibson was down at Ashton, it occurred to the executive of the local branch of the Union and Emancipation Society that it would give point to Mr. Gibson's speech if the newspaper report of it were to reach Washington accompanied by an anti-slavery address, from such of the right hon. gentleman's constituents as were of his way of thinking. An address was accordingly despatched through the United States Legation in London, and the following reply to it has just been received:—

"Legation of the United States,
London, February 23, 1864.

"Sir,—I am directed to apprise you of the reception by the President of the United States of the interesting address of citizens of Ashton-under-Lyne, which was transmitted to him some time since through this legation. It is with lively satisfaction that he accepts their assurances that under all the disadvantages of a distant position they have not been unable to understand the policy of the Government, and to comprehend how a fixed and unswerving determination to rescue the State from the assaults of domestic faction is compatible with the policy of lawfully extinguishing the chronic evil of African slavery.

"I have, &c.
(Signed) Charles Francis Adams.

"Mr. John Tucker, Secretary of the Union and Emancipation Society, Ashton."

Since the opening of Parliament, the Manchester Southern Independence Association has received a vast accession of strength. From every county in the United Kingdom friends of the South are sending in applications from to day to day requesting that their names may be added to the members' roll. The Irish gentry are swelling the list in great numbers.

The exodus from Liverpool for the United States is assuming larger proportions from month to month. It appears from the returns made up for the month of February that the number of steerage passengers was upwards 6,000, of whom nearly two-thirds were Irish.

The "deliberate opinion" expressed by Mr. Commissioner Farnall in his recent report to the President of the Poor-Law Board, viz., that by the end of this month the Central Executive Committee might terminate their labours, is not favoured by the present facts of the case. At the last meeting of the executive, the commissioner reported an increase of 1,763 in the number of distressed operatives, as compared with the returns of the previous week, and at a meeting of the Board of Guardians at Ashton a motion has been unanimously adopted by way of correcting Mr. Farnall's "deliberate opinion." The motion is at follows:—

"That the report of the cotton districts, dated January 4 and February 11, which Mr. Farnall has forward to the Poor-law Board, misrepresents and does not apply to this union. The actual condition of the trade of this neighbourhood is such that the guardians do not consider that the manufacturers have either mastered their difficulties or have passed the climax of the grave calamity that has befallen them. The present high prices ruling and the uncertainty as regards the future supply of the raw material have led to a greater curtailment of the time worked in its manufacture. This has not only increased the pressure upon the rates, but is compelling a larger number of persons to seek relief. 15,281 persons were relieved during the week ending November 30, and not fewer than 16,898 were relieved during the week ending the 25th instant. The guardians, therefore, consider the prospects of this district such as to cause great anxiety; and they cannot determine upon what grounds Mr. Farnall was justified in the report alluded to in asserting, as his deliberate opinion, that the Central Committee in Manchester will be in a position to abandon their onerous duties at the expiration of March next."

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris, March 1.

The trial of the conspirators against the Emperor's life occupied only two days, nearly the whole of the first being devoted to the interrogatories of the prisoners. Greco and Trabucco were the most remarkable of the group; the former a handsome young fellow, with the air of an opera brigand; the other a perfect buffo, a fellow whose every expression has something irresistibly comic. In the rambling speech he addressed to the jury, he drew tears of laughter even from the judges—the tones, the grimaces, and the action, all belonged to the best order of Italian low comedy. The entire interest of the trial turned upon the proofs of M. Mazzini's participation in the plot, and I believe here no one entertains the shadow of a doubt that M. Mazzini was really the instigator or abettor of the conspiracy. Whether, if tried by the forms of English law, there is proof enough to obtain a conviction, is a question on which opinions sdiffer; for there is many a loophole through which to escape from the meshes of the law, even when most guilty. The Anglophobist senators, Marquis de Boissy and Le Verrier, have also taken occasion, in remarking on certain petitions to the Emperor from English societies for the protection of animals, to say that while Englishmen are so tender-hearted to the brute creation, their humanity does not prevent them from harbouring assassins.

The debates on petitions in the Senate prove how important a part the petitions to plays in every institution of life. When the right of petition to the Senate was the rule in the Constituent Assembly it was not anticipated that this would open the door to a discussion on every possible question, and that while the functionaries of the Legislature were so carefully circumscribed, the Senate might indulge its garrulity at pleasure. Yet it is the great talkers to whom so long as the two great men also distinguished themselves on this last, as on so many points of resemblance, remain in the land of the living.

A man of many a political ebb, the Senator Pietri has just died at the ripe age of 81. He represented Corsica in the Constituent Assembly, and made the first step to the position of Senator by proposing the abrogation of the law which excluded the Bonaparte family from France.

The Archduke Maximilian is still expected here, and the delay in his arrival is likely to shorten his stay. In the meantime the Emperor continues the system of parallelism in which he excels, by appointing a scientific commission, similar to the Institut Egyptien, to examine the natural resources and artistical wealth of Mexico. The work, of conquest by arms being completed, the aim of the new experiments is to effect another by the useful and fine arts. There can be no question that a rich harvest of historical discovery awaits the labours of men of science, working under the protection of Government and learned really the learning of modern Europe.

The last news from America is considered here to be very favourable to the South, as indicating for the spring a great movement, which it is hoped will be more decisive than military operations have yet proved in this war. But, excepting by the Southerners in Paris and a few ardent friends of Southern independence, little heed is given to any news from America. Denmark, in its heroic struggle against the legions of Germany, attracts exclusive attention, and a sort of apathetic sympathy. At another time the feeling of imagination at the abuse of great force would have been louder, but the invasion of Denmark places England in so humiliating a position in Europe, a position seemingly so monstrous, that the French press and public may be excused if, in the enjoyment our embarrassment affords them, they overlook the danger of an old and faithful ally. We, although so large a portion of kindred blood flows in our veins, have never been so influential in Danish counsels as France. It has always been her policy to protect the weaker Powers, and one with such sustaining abilities as Denmark was sure to obtain all her sympathies. This traditional feeling may probably prevail with the Emperor in the end, but in the meantime he leaves England to make the discovery how difficult it is for a country whose Ministers have not a friend abroad to exercise the influence in Europe which she once enjoyed. In the higher financial circles, generally so well informed of the intentions of Government, no doubt is entertained that the Emperor is only biding his time to prove that he is really the Napoleon of Peace.

The telegraph has just brought the summary of last night's debate, but those of the evening papers I have seen content themselves with referring to it without any comment. Probably to-morrow they will show Lord Russell that the want of legal proof against M. Mazzini is no reason for not applying to him the law which entitles the Government, without reason given, to remove from the soil of England an alien whose presence is so likely to embroil her with her neighbours. It strikes me that Lord Russell and the Times have said some very clever things on the duties of a great nation, apropos of the Alabama and consorts, which would be very applicable here. It cannot be that they know the Emperor Napoleon to be more enduring than the Emperor Lincoln, and take advantage of his amiable weakness; but this is the interpretation which it is in the nature of things that foreigners should put upon the inaction of a Cabinet which does not hesitate to go beyond, if not to violate, the law, as well as the rules of fair play, in favour of a very troublesome bully, who, unfortunately, is the too near neighbour of a distant possession.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT DAVIS TO THE CONFEDERATE ARMIES.

Soldiers of the Armies of the Confederate States!

In the long and bloody war in which your country has been engaged you have achieved many noble triumphs. You have won glorious victories over vastly more numerous hosts. You have cheerfully borne privations and toil to which you were unused. You have readily submitted to restraints upon your individual will, that the citizen might better perform his duty to the State as a soldier. To all these you have lately added another triumph—the noblest of human conquests—a victory over yourselves. As the time drew near when you who first entered the service high, well have expected to claim relief from your arduous labours and restoration to the endearments of home, you have heeded only the call of your suffering country. Again you come to tender your service for the public defence—a free offering, which only such patriotism as yours could make—a triumph worthy of you and of the cause to which you are devoted.

I would in vain attempt adequately to express the emotions with which I received the testimonials of confidence and regard which you have recently addressed to me. To some of those first received separate acknowledgments were returned; but it is now apparent that a like generous enthusiasm pervades the whole army, and that the only exception to such magnanimous tender will be of those who, having originally entered for the war, cannot display anew their zeal in the public service. It is therefore deemed appropriate, and it is hoped will be equally acceptable, to make a general acknowledgment, instead of successive special responses. Would that it were possible to render my thanks to you in person, and, in the name of our common country, as well as in my own, while pressing the hand of each war-worn veteran, to recognise his title to our love, gratitude, and admiration.

Soldiers! By your will—for you and the people are but one—I have been placed in a position which debars me from sharing your dangers, your sufferings and your privations in the field. With pride and affection my heart has accompanied you in every march; with solicitude it has sought to minister to your every want; with exultation it has marked your every heroic achievement; yet never in the toilsome march nor in the weary watch, nor in the desperate assault have you rendered a service so decisive in results as in the last display of the highest qualities of devotion and self-sacrifice which can adorn the character of the warrior patriot.

Already the pulse of the whole people beats in unison with yours; already they compare your spontaneous and unanimous offer of your lives for the defence of your country with the halting and reluctant service of the mercenaries who are purchased by the enemy at the price of higher bounties than have hitherto been known in war. Animated by this contrast, they exhibit cheerful confidence and more resolute bearing. Even the murmurs of the weak and timid, who shrink from the trials which make stronger and firmer your noble natures, are shamed into silence by the spectacle which you present. Your brave battle cry will ring loud and clear through the land of the enemy as well as our own; will silence the vainglorious boastings of their corrupt partisans and their pensioned press, and will do justice to the calumny by which they seek to persuade a deluded people that you are ready to purchase dishonourable safety by degrading submission.

Soldiers: The coming spring campaign will open under auspices well calculated to sustain your hopes. Your resolution needed nothing to fortify it. With ranks replenished under the influence of your example, and by the aid of representatives who give earnest of their purpose to add by legislation largely to your strength, you may welcome the invader with a confidence justified by the memory of past victories. On the other hand, debt, taxation, repetition of heavy drafts, dissensions occasioned by the strife for power, by the pursuit of the spoils of office, by the thirst for the plunder of the public treasury, and, above all, the consciousness of a bad cause, must tell with fearful force upon the overstrained energies of the enemy. His campaign of 1864 must, from the exhaustion of his resources of men and money, be far less formidable than those of the last two years, when unimpaired means were used with boundless prodigality, and with results which are suggested by the mention of the names of Shiloh, Perryville, Murfreesboro, and the Chickahominy, Manassas, Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville.

Soldiers: Assured success awaits us in our holy struggle for liberty and independence, and for the preservation of all that renders life desirable to honorable men. When that success shall be reached, to you, your country's hope and pride, under Divine Providence, will it be due. The fruits of that success will not be reaped by you alone; but your children and your children's children in long generations to come will enjoy the blessings derived from you that will preserve your memory ever living in their hearts.

Citizen defenders of the homes, the liberties and altars of the Confederacy: That the God whom we all humbly worship may shield you with his fatherly care, and preserve you for safe return to the peaceful enjoyment of your friends and the associations of those you most love, is the earnest prayer of your Commander-in-Chief.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE BIRTHDAY OF WASHINGTON.

WE have received the following from an American correspondent in Paris, writing under the signature of "Chronicler":—

On the occasion of the anniversary of Washington's natal day (February 22) it may not be either unseasonable or without interest to reproduce in your columns a short recital of the circumstances under which he received his first military commission from the Crown and in the colonial army of Virginia. The statement on the subject is to be found at pages 3 and 4 (in a note which I subjoin) in Marshall's Life of that great and good man, yet the most illustrious rebel of any age or country. It will be seen that his first essays as a soldier were made when wearing a British sword and royal uniform. In that service he acquired the experience and the prestige which subsequently raised him to the head of the rebel levies of Virginia, and thence to the command of the Confederate armies of the thirteen revolted colonies. Actuated as he was by the loftiest motives, seeking no selfish ends, but looking singly to the weal and independence of his country, it can hardly be doubted on which side he would have been found in the present unholy crusade of the New England Puritans against the very rights and liberties he so generously aided them in securing for themselves as well as the children of his native Virginia and her sisters of the South. That in the defence of these, in resistance to injustice and a sordid lust of power, he would again have approved himself a rebel, like all of his name and race at this day, will not be questioned by any Southern man of sound affections and a purified understanding. The following is the statement above referred to:—

"With an unaffected modesty which the accumulated honours of his after life could never impair, Major Washington, though the most distinguished military man then in Virginia, declined being a candidate for the command of this regiment. The following letter, written on the occasion to Colonel Richard Corbin, a member of the council, with whom his family was connected by the ties of friendship and affinity, was placed in the hands of the author by Mr. Francis Corbin, a son of that gentleman:—

"'Dear Sir,—In a conversation at Green Spring, you gave me some room to hope for a commission above that of a major, and to be ranked among the chief officers of this expedition. The command of the whole forces is what I neither look for, expect, nor desire; for I must be impartial enough to confess it is a charge too great for my youth and inexperience to be entrusted with. Knowing this, I have too sincere a love for my country to undertake that which may tend to the prejudice of it. But if I could entertain hopes that you thought me worthy of the post of lieutenant-colonel, and would favour me so far as to mention it at the appointment of officers, I could not but entertain a true sense of your kindness. I flatter myself that under a skilful commander or man of sense (which I most sincerely wish to serve under), with my own application and diligent study of my duty, I shall be able to conduct my steps without censure, and in time render myself worthy of the promotion that I shall be favoured with now.'

"The commission he solicited was transmitted to him in the following laconic letter:—

"'Dear George,—I enclose you your commission. God prosper you with it.—Your friend,

"'RICHARD CORBIN.'"

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, March 3.

ALTHOUGH money has been easier since the reduction in the Bank rate of discount, the demand for accommodation has greatly revived within the last few days, in order to meet the requirements of the 4th, which are expected to be rather heavier than usual. The applications both at the Bank and amongst the brokers, have been equally pressing, and out-of-doors the terms are now fully up to the Bank minimum of 6 per cent. The joint-stock banks are fairly supplied with capital, but they will not dispose of it under 5¾ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money continues in fair demand, and short loans on Government securities command from 5 to 6 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market continues in a very satisfactory state. For the present most of the arrivals of specie find their way into the Bank, whilst the withdrawals for transmission to the Continent have ceased. The amount sent in this week has not been particularly large, being only £121,000, but there have been no sets-off in the shape of withdrawals. The arrivals of specie have been large, the total reaching £390,667, of which £168,644 was from the Australian colonies, £208,823 from the West Indies, and £13,200 from New York. The specie taken out by the Delta on Saturday last amounted to £264,308, of which £20,000 was in gold for Alexandria, £69,460 gold for Bombay, and £174,348 silver, also for Bombay. The silver market has been subjected to some fluctuations in consequence of the demand for the East. That which arrived by the previous West Indian packet was disposed of at 61¼d., but on the receipt of accounts advising a considerable rise in the China exchanges, the price advanced to 61⅜d., at which it is at present firm. Mexican dollars have also been in good demand, but there are scarcely any in the market. The gold ships known to be on their way from Australia are the Water Nymph, with £56,000; the Giant Causeway, £20,500; the Japan, £64,000; Donald McKay, £19,000; and the Star of Peace with £75,000; making a total of £234,500.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta, 22,00,000 rupees; to Bombay, 16,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras; and 1s. 11¾d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 237 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11¾d., will receive about 11 per cent.; on Bombay, at 2s. 0⅛d., about 16 per cent.; on Madras, at 2s., about 44 per cent.; and all above these prices in full.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English funded securities has been somewhat depressed during the week, the advices with regard to the war in Denmark continuing to have an unfavourable influence, and the anomalous state of affairs, as respects the proposed conference, being looked upon as anything but assuring, adds to the depression. The dealers are acting with great caution and seem indisposed to enter into extensive engagements. Consols closed this evening 91 to 91⅛ for money, and 91⅛ to 91¼ for the account, which is a decline as compared with this day week of about ⅜ per cent. Exchequer Bills are without alteration, at 5s. dis. to par. There has been a little more animation in the foreign stock market, but still little business has been exhibited. The largest business has been done in the more speculative descriptions, which have also shown the greatest variations in prices. Mexican have declined 1½ per cent., but Greek has improved ½, and Spanish Passives 1 per cent. Turkish are unchanged. Greek closed at 22¾ to 23; Mexican, at 42¼ to 42½; Spanish Passives, 35 to 35½; Do. Certificates, 13¾ to 14; Turkish Six per Cents (1854) 90½ to 91¼, and do. (1862) 68¾ to 69¼.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

A rather more animated business than usual has been transacted in American Government and railway securities, the recent advices from New York inducing operators to deal with more freedom, and in general prices exhibit an improving tendency. The official dealings are recorded as follows:—Virginia State Six per Cents., 33½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 78, 78¼, 79, 80¼, and 80½; Do. do. Pennsylvania Section, 81 to 81½; Erie $100 shares, all paid, 63½, 64, 64¼, and 65; Illinois Central, Seven per Cent. 71½ and 72; Do. do. $100 shares, $90 paid, 18¼, 18½, 18, 15, 14, and 15½; Do. do. all paid, 71, 71½, 74, 75, 74, 73½, and 73¾; Pennsylvania Railway Bonds, first mortgage, 60½, and Do., second mortgage, 87.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

On the whole a good business has been transacted in British railway securities, but although in some few instances prices showed an advance, the general tendency of the market is towards lower values. The decline has been 1 per cent. in Bristol and Exeter and North London, of ¾ per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick), and of ½ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and Blackwall, London and North-Western, Sheffield, Midland, North British and North-Eastern (York). On the other hand there has been an improvement of 1 per cent. in Glasgow and South-Western and Chatham and Dover, and of ½ per cent. in Great Northern and Great Western. In foreign railway shares there has been rather less doing, but prices are steadily sustained. For shares in undertakings in the British possessions a better inquiry has existed, but there has been no material alteration in prices.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security, apparently, after the settlement of outstanding "bear" accounts, has undergone a reaction, and after touching 41 to 43 ex. div. and drawing, the market closes 43 to 45, with a firm market. The half-yearly dividend became due yesterday, and the first half-yearly drawing likewise took place yesterday, particulars of which will be found in our advertising columns.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the first general meeting of the shareholders in the International Financial Society, Mr. R. A. Heath in the chair, the report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the accounts embraced the operations of the society to the end of December last, and showed that the net profit amounted to £199,950. The directors being of opinion that it would be unwise to declare too large a dividend at present, recommended that the balance should be applied as follows: £19,934 to payment of interest at 5 per cent.; £77,568 to bonus, to make together a dividend of 13s. per share, free of income tax; £18,000 to the reserved fund which would leave a balance of £76,680, to be carried to new account.—At the ordinary general meeting of the Oriental and General Marine Insurance Company, a dividend was declared at the rate of 5 per cent., and the chairman intimated that they were in a position to divide a larger sum, but they deemed it prudent not to do so. A much larger dividend might be expected for the next year.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The Thames Iron-Works, Shipbuilding, Engineering, and Dry Dock Company has just been brought forward, the object being the purchase of the business of the Thames Iron-Works and Shipbuilding Company at Blackwall, and transferring to the new all the old Company's contracts, assets, goodwill, and effects, together with its liabilities from the 1st of January last, in consideration of the payment of the sum of £275,000, of which £150,000 is to be given in fully paid up shares, and £125,000 in debentures of the new company, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum. It is proposed to extend the business by purchasing eight acres of freehold land immediately by adjoining the works, and to construct graving docks, which will be situated in the vicinity of the East and West India and Victoria Docks, and also to erect an establishment for carrying on engineering operations. The capital to be raised is £500,000, in shares of £100 each.—The prospectus has been issued of the Tunbridge Wells Hotel Company, with a capital of £50,000, in shares of £10 each. The object is the purchase of the Royal Sussex Hotel, with the adjacent pleasure grounds, and the erection of a new establishment at the rear of the present building, commanding uninterrupted views of the surrounding country, and containing billiard, reading and club-rooms, with a gymnasium and racket-ground. Part of the property will be sub-let, from which an adequate fund will be provided for the payment of interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on deposits, allotments, and upon calls paid in advance.—The Queensland Sheep Investment Company, Limited, has just been announced, under the auspices of the Mercantile Credit Association. The capital is to be £400,000, in 10,000 shares of £40 each, but it it proposed only to call up £20 per share, £1 per share to be paid on application, and £3 on allotment. A provisional offer, it appears, has been made to the directors for the purchase of the leases of certain stations on the Darling Downs, now in full operation, comprising an area of upwards of 1,500 square miles, with the sheep and cattle located thereon, the vendors taking payment for a considerable portion of the purchase in the shares of the company. Large returns will thus be immediately secured, which it is estimated will pay an early and satisfactory dividend, independent of the accumulated profits to be derived from the increase of the breeding flocks, which in ordinary seasons may, it is said, be calculated at about 80 per cent.—The Financial Discount Company, Limited, has just issued its prospectus. The objects, in the first instance, will be the purchase of the business of Messrs. Feltham and Cooper, which has been successfully conducted for nearly fifty years. The senior partner retires, but an arrangement has been entered into with Mr. Cooper, the acting partner, by which his exclusive services are secured on satisfactory terms, his remuneration being to a certain extent dependent on profits. Mr. Cooper, in order to show his confidence in the undertaking, has, on behalf of himself and friends, guaranteed to subscribe for one-fourth of the entire capital, which is fixed at £300,000, in 60,000 shares of £50 each, with a deposit on application of £1 per share, and £4 on allotment.—The prospectus has been issued of the Frontino and Bolivia South American Gold Mining Company. The object of the undertaking is to purchase and work the well-known Frontino and Bolivia gold mines, in the province of Antioquia, New Granada. The capital asked for is £100,000 in 50,000 shares of £2 each.—Another new undertaking is the National Marine Insurance Company, Limited. The operations of the company will, it is expected, be chiefly directed to the country districts, and while the head office will be in London, immediate connexions will be opened with Bristol, Cardiff, Gloucester, Hull, Leith, Liverpool, Newcastle, Sunderland, and other towns whose commercial importance affords a large and profitable scope for this description of business. The capital proposed to be raised is £500,000 in 20,000 shares of £25 each; but the first issue will be 10,000 shares only; £1 per share to be paid on application and £1 10s. on allotment.—The prospectus of the Credit Mobilier, Limited, has been issued this afternoon, with a proposed capital of £1,000,000 in 20,000 shares of £50 each. First issue 10,000 shares; deposit on application £1 per share and £4 on allotment. It is not intended to call up more than £20 per share. The principal objects of the undertaking are, to co-operate with other first-class and financial undertakings; to negotiate Government and municipal loans; to aid in carrying out concessions based upon Government guarantees and subventions; to make advances to responsible contractors for English and foreign railways, and other public works; and to lend on the security of stocks, funds, shares, debentures, and other approved securities, with special reference to the requirements of the Stock Exchange. The company will also receive money on deposit, for long or short periods.—The United Merthyr Collieries Company, Limited, has also issued its prospectus to-day. This company has been started, as alleged, in consequence of the extraordinary demand for Welsh steam coal, and which has induced the proprietors of two of the principal producing collieries in South Wales, whose properties adjoin, to enter into arrangements with this company for uniting their respective holdings and plant, with the object of making the whole of their outlying fields of coal available to meet such demand. The properties are known as Forchamman and Cwm Neol. The capital sought to be raised is £120,000 in 6,000 shares of £20 each.—The prospectus has likewise been issued this evening of the Cleveland Iron Company, Limited, with a capital of £100,000 in 5,000 shares of £20 each. The company is formed for the purpose of working and winning the iron ore lying under the estates of Skeldusken and Fowle Green, in Commondale, in the Cleveland district, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, and for the erection of blast furnaces, rolling mills, &c.

MEETING OF CREDITORS.

At a meeting of the creditors of Mr. Richard Birkett, trading under the firm of Daniel and John Birkett and Co., in the corn trade, a balance sheet was presented, showing unsecured liabilities amounting to £21,476, and the assets about £18,000. It was agreed to accept a composition of 15s. 6d. in the pound: 7s. to be paid in fourteen days, 5s. in a month, and 3s. 6d. in three months.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In most descriptions of produce trade progresses rather slowly but steadily. The export demand is retarded by the unsettled state of politics on the Continent, but home buyers operate to a fair extent, and sufficient is doing in this way to lend good support to prices, which, as a general rule, are very firmly maintained. The clearances from warehouse do not keep up to those of last year in all cases, but are very good, and indicate a healthy undercurrent of trade which could not but produce an extension of activity in the leading markets if the prevailing uneasiness in reference to politics were removed. Cotton arrives freely and prices have a downward tendency. American provisions find buyers to a fair extent at about previous rates; fine butter, 88s. to 106s.; Bacon sides, 38s. to 46s., and cheese, 48s. to 60s. per cwt. The corn markets continue as dull as ever, and prices are still drooping in the face of very moderate arrivals. Petroleum is in less demand, owing in some measure to the advance of the season, and refined American now offers at 1s. 11d. per gallon. French turpentine has been nearly stationery at 74s. since our last report. Rosin continues firm at 5s. 6d. to 25s. 6d. for French; linseed oil has again met a fair demand at 35s. 9d. to 36s. on the spot; brown rape has advanced to 40s., and pale is very firm at 43s. per cwt. Rather a large business has been done

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.
